The Great master probably coniecturing, that the Turkes would in short time assault both the towne and castle of S. Michael, thought good by his presence to encourage and strengthen the garriſon; and therefore was about to haue gone thither by a bridge made of boats from the one point of the land to the other, betweene S. Michaels and S. Angelo: but quickly vnderstanding the certaintie thereof, returned againe into his castle. Some there be that thinke, For him to haue so done, had been a venturous part and full of danger, and therefore to haue been discommended; for that great things are performed, not so much by strength of bodie as of mind, by politike counsell and direction, wherewith a Generall (although absent) may yet with his forces be alwaies present: but the Generall oncelost (which may easily happen, if he will present his person to the danger) we see most commonly all fall together with him, no otherwise than doth all parts of the bodie when the soule departeth: But other some are of contrarie opinion, That the Generals presence, especially in great dangers, is both praise wortheie and most necessarie; for that he as the soule, cannot provide for or rule the bodie, except it be present; yea placed therein: and that Valletta in so doing, followed the examples of the greatest kings and most famous Generals; as of Alexander the great, Julius Caesar, Themistocles, Marius and others: whose words vnto their souldiours were these, I my selfe will be your conductor in the field, in the battell partaker of the danger with you, you shall be in all things as my selfe. Besides that, who knoweth not, that as in other things, so most of all in martiall affaires, all things are better, more orderly and more easily done when the matter is present: neither was the learned Poet his meaning any thing else, when in the warres betwixt the Latines and the Rutilians, he saith, Præsentia sumi? whereupon they concluded, that the Great master in going, had done both valiantly, wisely, and according to his dutie. But this we leaue for martiall men to determine.

At the same time the king of ALGER came to aid the Turkes with seauen gallies and ten galliots, and in them 2200 souldiours: who sorie that he was not there at the beginning, and desirous rous to doe some notable act, and withall to make prooffe of the valour of his souldiours, requested the great Bassa to bestow vpon him the first place in the besieging the castle. S. Michael, which he not only granted, but joynd vnto his forces two thousand of his owne best souldiours. These things obtained, he commaunded ninetie small yessels by deuices to be carried ouer land out of the port MARZA MOXET to AQUA MARSA, for that he purposed on that side to besiege the castle by water. But Valetta perceiuing the enemies purpose, both by seeing what was done, and also aduertised thereof before by a Christian fugitiue; presently called vnto him two faithfull and skilfull shipmasters of MALTA, and imparting the matter vnto them, aduertised what they thought best to be done to keepe the Turks from landing; as it seemed they purposed at the wals foot. They quickly conceiuing the matter, answered, That in their opinion, if a chaine were made of masts and saile-yards or sparres joyned together with yron rings, and so drawne all alongst from the corner of the castle of S. Angelo to that place where the enemies thought to land, their purpose might be so defeated. This their deuice so pleased the Great master, that the night following such a chaine was made; and fast more in the appointed place. The Turkes as soone as it was day perceiuing this barre, stood as men doubtfull, not knowing how by any meanes to land their men, as they had before purposed. Whilest they stood so abashed, a Christian fugitiue, a most desperat villaine (in which kind of men foolish hardinesse is accounted a vertue, and desperation constancie) came to the king, and promised him to breake the chaine, and so with a hatchet in his hand cast himselfe into the sea, after whom followed two or three more to helpe him: who swimming to the chaine, got vp vpon it, and began to heu. apace with their hatchets. Which the Christians beholding, suddenly five or six of the Malteses swam thither with their drawne swords in their hands; & hauing slaine two of them, caused the other to flie: after which time none of the Turks was so hardie as to attempt the same. The barbarous king for all that gaue not ouer his purpose so, but with wonderfull diligence prepared for the siege, which the fifteenth day of Iuly began both by sea and land. But the defendants turning their great ordinance vpon that place from whence the galliots came, with the furie thereof (in the space of three houres, which the assault endured) slew two thousand Turkes and sunke twelue of the galliots: the rest comming as farre as the chaine, when they could get no farther nor land their men, turned their prowes vpon the corner of the castle, but were glad at last to reite and leaue that they came for vndone. The assault by land also endured five houres, wherein many of the Turkes were slaine, and of the defendants two hundred: amongst whom was Federicus the Viceroy of SICILIA his sonne, stricke in sunder with a great shot, Gordius a Frenchman, Franciscus Sanoghera, and his nephew Iohn, Spaniards; all knights of the Order. Medina was also wounded, whereof he afterward died. But Valetta considering into what danger the state of MALTA was like to fall, if he should be constrained to fight many such fights, where his souldiours wearied day and night without rest, were still to encounter with fresh men, & heard nothing of any aid or new supplie: the seuenteenth day of Iuly he sent a messenger into SICILIA, who swam from the castle to the farthest part of the bay to AQUA MARSA, and from thence escaped vnknewne thorow the midst of the enemies vnto the cite of MELITA, and so in a little frigot came to MESSANA; by him the Great master sent letters to the Viceroy, requesting him to send him his owne two gallies, with those knights which were at MESSANA, and such other souldiours as might in them be transported: willing them, that as soon as they came to the island, they should houer off aloofe before the haven, readie vpon a signe giuen to thrust in. The same time that this messenger arrived at MESSANA, came thither also the fleet from SPAIN, wherein were many of the knights of the Order from diuers nations. The Viceroy desirous to send those two gallies to Valetta, sent letters before vnto him in secret characters by two frigots wherein he certified him that he would send the gallies, requiring to haue from him some signe, whereby they might at their comming know whether they should enter or reite: which frigots taking diuers courses, one of them laded with medicines, as was afterwards knowne, was intercepted by the enemy: the other although she came in safetie to MELITA, yet for as much as all the passages betwixt the castle of S. Michael and the cite of MELITA were certaine dayes before by the diligence of the enemy shut vp, and three which had vied to passe too and fro, intercepted and most cruelly executed, and besides that the haven straightly kept; the knights of MESSANA could haue no further direction from the Great master for the safe sending of the two gallies: yet neuerthelesse, because he had requested them, and they themselves were of the same opinion (as he had before written) that where all is in question, the aduerture of a little part is lesse to be feared: they thought it good to aduerture them: yet with this regard, not to expose all those knights to so great a danger, but of them all to send onely sortie, with a conuenient number of other souldiours, and with them Salazar a Spanish capitaine was sent by the Viceroy to be landed in the island of GAULO, who should afterwards from thence in a boat (for that purpose towed along by the gallies) passe ouer into the island of MALTA as a spie, to take view both of the cite and enemies campe.

In the meane time the Turks mindfull of the losse receiued in the assault of the castle S. Michael, and desirous of reuenge, did so violently batter the castle with their great ordinance, that what the defendants repaired by night, that they still beat downe againe by day: and in time of the battérie made a bridge, which the twentieth day of Iuly before the Sunne rising they laid ouer the ditch, that they might as if it had been vpon euen ground come to fight hand to hand with the Christians. Which scene and quickly perceiued what danger it might bring, by and by Parisot the Great masters nephew, and Agleria, both knights, with certaine mercinarie souldiours sallied out to haue burnt the bridge, but were so receiued of the Turks, that they were almost all slaine together with Parisot and Agleria, and yet the exploit vnperformed. The Turks without ceasing continued their furious battérie vntill the eight and twentieth of Iuly, which day in the afternoon they in diuers places assaulted the castle, thrice they with fresh and new supplies relleued their repulst and wearied souldiours, and so fiercely maintained the assault, that they made no doubt but that day to win the castle. But the defendants with no lesse resolution withstood them, repulst them with their weapons, with shot, fire, and force, and at length enforced them with no small losse of their men to reite from their wals. This victorie so encouraged the besieged, that now they made small reckoning of the enemy: but so far as much as our men alwayes spared their great ordinance but in time of fight, and sallied not out as they were wont, the Turks thought that the garrison was but weake, and that shot and powder grew scarce in the castle. Yet deceived in both, for that it was rather of purpose than for want to be commaunded by the Great master: who hearing nothing of the comming of any aid, and seeing the enemy to giue dayly more fierce assaults, would not vainely spend his most necessarie helpes. The Turkes perceiuing what little good they had done with their often assaults, determined now to proue what might be done by vndermining the castle; and had almost brought one of their mines to perfection, before it was by the Christians discovered: and to the intent they should the lesse marke it, they caused two gallies to come as neere as they could to the wals, and to batter that place, in hope that whilest our men gazed vpon that was done openly, they should the lesse regard what they were working in secret, that so they might in the meane time more easily get into the castle. But the besieged careful of all that was to be cared for perceiuing their purpose, with a countermine defeated their mine, and by the couragiousnesse of certaine of their souldiours, but especially of one ancient, drew out the enemy, who hauing cast certaine pots of wild fire before him into the mine, and following presently after with a peece of firework in his hand, forced them out. For which good seruice he was by the Great master rewarded with a chaine of gold of five pound weight: and because of yertue springeth vertue, which still resteth vpon difficulties, the next day, which was the first of August, the bridge which we said the enemy had made ouer the ditch, was by a sallie made by the defendants burnt downe with fire and gunpowder cast vpon it: which was in good time done, for the next day the Sunne now declining, the Turkes againe assaying that part of the castle where Carolus Rufus had the charge, were by our men valiantly repulst. This assault endured three houres, in which time three hundred of the Turks were there slaine: and of the knights Rufus himselfe and Baresus with certaine mercinarie souldiours. At this time the Christians were by the enemy so shut in with the multitude of great ordinance, that they could not so much as looke into the ditch or shew themselves, much lesse sallie out, but they were by and by set off. Yet did they not for all that make spare of their liues, when occasion was giuen them to performe any notable exploit: as appeared by Calderonius a Spaniard, who seeing some viewing that part of the wall, which the enemy had most battered and shaken at the castle bulwarke, doubted not to sallie out, but was presently taken with a bullet and slaine: which mischance when it might seeme of right to haue terrified the rest from attempting the like, did indeede the more incense them: so that when they saw the enemy exceeding busie in filling the ditch, they resolutely set downe to offer themselves to most assured death rather than to fall into the hands of the merciesse enemy, agreed to fallie out by night, and to meet with his designs. G

V hereupon an hundred, part knights, part other souldiors, falling forth, caused the enemy to forsake the ditch and betake himselfe to flight, of whom they slew about fourescore; and lost of their owne ten men: amongst whom were Ioannes and Macrinus, two knights, whose heads the Turks the next day set vp vpon two speares vpon their trenches, that they might be seene by the Christians.

The same day they of the citie of MALTA at night made at one instant a number of fires; and as if it were in triumph discharged great vollies of small shot, with many other tokens of joy: which as well the besieged as the Turks thought verely to haue beene done vpon the discouerie of the Christian fleet, or els the landing of such forces as were come to remoue the siege; whereas indeed it was neither, but done onely to shew their cheerefulness, and to keepe the Turks in H suspence with the noueltie of the matter: who for all that were not slacke in their businesse, but with earth filled vp the ditch at the castle bulwarke: whereby it came to passe, that they could not be hurt by the flankers, made in that place to scoure the ditch, but might thereby as vpon plaine ground, without stay passe vnto the wall, now opened and ouerthrowne with their continuall batterie, and with two great peeces (which they had planted vpon a high mount, which they had newly cast vp on the right hand the bulwarke SALOMON) they began to play vpon the castle, and at the first shot, shot into the loupe where Franciscus Castilla commaunded. Ioannes Bernardus Godinetius, a Spanishe knight, was there slaine with a small shot. The same day Franciscus Aquilates, a Spaniard, one of the garrison souldiors, perswaded by feare and hope (in dangers two euill counsellors) fled out of the towne S. Michael to the enemy; perswading the Turks colonels to giue a fresh assault, assuring them that they should without doubt win the towne, because there was but foure hundred souldiors left aliue in it, and they (as he said) almost spent with labour and wounds, all the rest being dead. VVhich the Turks hearing, and seeing faire breaches both in the wals of the new citie and of the castle S. Michael, wide ynough for carts to goe thorow, they determined with all their forces to assault both places at once, and to proue if there were yet so much strength left in those holds, as againe to repulse them: so the seuenth day of August at one instant they assaulted the new citie at the castle bulwarke, and the castle S. Michael at the breach, with such a multitude, that all the earth seemed to be covered with men round about. The thundering of the great ordinance, the noise of the small shot, with the clattering of armour, and noise of trumpets, drums, and other warlike instruments, with the crye of men on both sides, was so confused and great, as if heauen and earth should haue beene confounded together. VVhich when the knights in the citie MALTA heard, and saw the heauens obscured with smoake, fearing that the Turks (as at the castle S. Elmo) would neuer giue ouer the assault, vntill they had woon both the towne and the castle; presently all the garrison horsemen issued out of the citie, and to auert the Turks from the assault, set vpon those Turks which lay at AQVA MARTIA: who all surprised with a sudden feare, fled; the Christian horsemen hardly pursuing them with bloudie execution, and they in their fight piteously crying vnto their fellows for help. VVhereby it came to passe, that they which were assailing the citie and castle, to rescue their discomforted fellows, were glad to giue ouer the assault: so with great slaughter foiled on both sides by the Christians, they returned to their trenches, when they had lost about fiftene hundred at the assault, beside them which were slaine in the chase by the horsemen of MALTA. Of the defendants of both places were lost about a hundred, and almost as many wounded. This fight endured about five houres: Valetta deliuered off so great a danger, that day and certaine others caused publick prayers to be made, & went himselfe with the multitude of the citizens to the church, to giue thanks to Almighty God for that victorie.

VVhilest these things were in doing, Garzia the Viceroy was aduertised from CALABRIA, that certaine ships laded with men, victuall, and other provision necessarie for the warres, were coming from CONSTANTINOPLE to MALTA; wherefore he forthwith sent Alfandra and Gildandrada, two noble men, with five gallies to meet them: who being come within thirtie miles of MALTA, met with no such ships, but only one frigot and a galliot; the frigot they took, but the galliot escaped to the enemies fleet at MALTA.

Mustapha the Turks Generall now thinking no man so strong which might not with continuall labour and watching be wearied and overcome; resolved not to giue vnto the besieged any time of rest, but commaunded his souldiors againe to assault the breach at the castle of Saint Michael.

Michael; where they were by the valour of the defendants, with no small slaughter quickly repulsed: Neither did the Bassa giue so many assaults, for the hope he had to win those places; but rather to performe the dutie of a valiant Generall, and to satisfie Solyman's pleasure, who had expressly commaunded, either to win that island, or there all to lose their liues. He also sent a galliot in hast with letters to Solyman; wherein he shewed him the state of the fleet, with what difficulties the armie was distressed, what small hope there was of winning the places besieged, how well the Christians were provided, with many other such things.

In the meane time those two gallies of MALTA (which we haue before spoken of) departing from MESSANA, came to SIRACUSA, where they staid a day: The next day after, in going out of the haven, they met with one of MALTA in a small boat coming from POZALO. B fore wounded: he being demanded how he was so hurt, told them, That landing by night with his boat and one companion, he was requested by two Sicilians which dwelt there, to rest there that night, which they doing, about midnight five Turks brake into the house vpon them, killed his companion, carried away the Sicilians, and he wounded as he was; hardly escaped by the benefit of the night: moreouer he said, That the Sicilians had told the Turks, that two gallies were come into that port, with souldiors and other warlike provision bound for MALTA: Whereby the knights perceiued, that their coming would be discovered vnto the enemy, and that it was a most dangerous thing, or rather impossible, to get into the haven of MALTA, as they had before purposed: neuertheless, to conduct Salazar with his little boat, they kept on their course. But as they were sayling, they descried two gallies and one galliot going before C them, who seeing the gallies coming after them, made with all speed to MALTA: and were no doubt those gallies, from whence those five Turks came, which had done those things which the wounded Maltese reported. For all that, these gallies kept on their course as farre as POZALO; from whence they certified the Viceroy by letters, all that had happened: and not daring to put to sea, the South wind blowing with a stiffe gale against them, they returned backe againe to SIRACUSA, expecting there farther direction from the Viceroy. For which cause, they forthwith sent one of the knights to him to MESSANA; by whom they receiued answer, That they should go no farther, but to stay for the coming of the whole fleet, readie in short time to passe ouer to MALTA. But Salazar brought by the gallies to POZALO, resolved with his little boat to go on: and although the day he departed thence, the aire was troubled with great wind, thunder and raine, yet the daies following prouing more calme, he in short time arrived in the island D of MALTA, and came in safetie to the citie MALTA; and there disguised himselfe in Turkish apparel, and taking with him one companion who could also speake the Turkish language, by night got into the enemies camp: where diligently marking all things, they perceiued that there was in all the Turkes armie of land souldiors scarce foureene thousand, and of them many wounded and sicke; and that the rest was but an vnseruiceable and feeble multitude, for that the course of wars had (as commonly it doth) consumed their best souldiors. VVhen they had thus viewed the campe, they returned againe to the citie; from whence Salazar with one Petrus Paccius a Spaniard; a venturous and valiant man, went to a certaine place nere vnto the watch towre of MALTA: which when they had curiously viewed, Paccius was there left, that obseruing the E signes from the island of GAVIOS and the citie of MELITA; he might giue knowledge of all things to the Viceroy at his approach, as he was by Salazar instructed. As for Salazar himselfe, he in his little boat (which at his coming into the isle he had there left) happily returned to MESSANA, and there declared vnto the Viceroy all that he had seene: constantly affirming amongst other things, That the Turkes fleet was but weak; lame, and disurnished both of men and munition, farre vnable to encounter with 10000 Christians. About which time also, one of the two frigots which were before sent to MALTA, returned with another Spaniard; and a fugitive from the Turks campe: and foure gallies before gone from MESSANA, were also come in with foureene Turks, taken about the island of MALTA, who all confirmed the same that was by Salazar reported: which was, That the Turkes armie was with often assaults wonderfully F weakened, both in number and strength; so that they could not with stripes be enforced to the assault, for which the Bassa had with his owne hands slaine diuers of them: and that which more increased their feare, they saw none of their men wounded, but that they died thereof. Besides that, they saw the Christians with inuincible courage to defend their strong places; and not to spend one shot in vaine: wherefore they were forie, and repented that they euer tooke in hand that that expedition; they detested such a war, shrinking as much as they could from the assault, and as they might stealing quite away, which many of them did, especially such as had before abjured the Christian faith. For which cause diligent watch and ward was kept, and commandment given by the great Bassa, that they should resolve with themselves either to win the towne, or there all to lay vp their bones; for that the great Sultan Solyman had so commaunded, whom to gain, say was in it selfe death. These and such like persuations, caused the Viceroy somewhat the sooner to thinke of the bringing forth of his fleet: the besieged in the meane time did what men might for defence of the place and themselves. There was in the castle one Franciscus Givara capitaine of the vanguard, a noble and valiant gentleman, of a great conceit; he about ten foot from the towne wall which the enemy had with their great ordinance beaten downe, caused a curtaine to be drawne fiftie foot long, and siue foot thicke, with flankers at both ends; which in two nights was brought to perfection, and was afterwards a great helpe to the besieged. The enemy in the meane time began a mine vnder the corner of the towne ditch, where Bonifegna a Spaniard and a most valiant knight had the charge: which the besieged perceiuing, by a counter mine defeated the same. It happened in the meane time, that as a fugitive was swimming to the towne, he was taken by the enemy; which much grieved the besieged, desirous to haue vnderstood something of the state of the enemies campe, and of their purposes. Now when the former mine had taken so euill successe, part of the Turkes assailed the castle S. Michael, and part with gunpowder thought to haue blowne vp the castle bulwarke: but by the carefulnesse and courage of the defendants, all their attempts were disappointed; for many of the Turkes were in both places slaine, and certaine bags of powder taken from them in the mine. With these and other such difficulties, Mustapha and Piall the Turkes Generals disappointed of their hope, consulted with the other great capitaines of the armie, whether they should there still continue that desperat siege, or depart: where most were cleere of opinion, That it was best betime to depart. Yet for all that, the old Bassa said, He would there stay, vntill the galliot (which he had before sent to CONSTANTINOPLE) were returned with answere from Solyman, and in the meane time both by force and pollicie to seeke after victorie: which thing he often did, than stood with the broken estate of his armie, or of the besieged; neither resting himselfe nor suffering others to take rest: for one while he battered the wals, another while he wrought mines or else made bridges; sometime he cast vp mounts, and then againe filled the ditches; and euer anon gaue one assault or another. In all which doing he vsed such industrie, that whatsoever he tooke in hand, was in short time brought to such perfection as might haue carried a stronger place, had not the valour of the defendants far exceeded all his strong and polittike deuises.

Robles Gouverneur
of the castle of *S.
Michael*, slaine.

It fortuned, that as Robles the camp-master and Gouverneur of the castle S. Michael, was by night viewing the ruines of the wall, he was strucke in the head with a small shot, and slaine; leaving behind him to his fellowes, the great desire of himselfe: for why, he was a man for many his good parts (wherewith he had many times stood the defendants in great stead) worthily beloued. In whose stead the Great master sent one of the Colonels that was with himselfe, a most expert and resolute capitaine, to take charge of S. Michaels castle; who by his vigilant care and prouidence so well discharged the charge committed vnto him, that as often as the Turkes attempted the place, so often they were with losse repulsed.

The two gallies with the galliot, descried by the gallies of MALTA (as we haue before said) told Piall Bassa the Admirall, that the Christian fleet was readie to come forth: wherefore he fearing the sudden comming thereof, caused seauentie gallies to be in readinesse; besides which, fortie others lay in the haven MARZAMOTTA vnseruicable; as wanting both men and other equipage, for that was spent in making bridges, mines, and other such things necessary for the siege: as for the men, they were part with sickness, and part with often assaults consumed. Wherefore Piall for certaine daies kept himselfe by day in the port MARZOTTA neere the shoare, and by night put forth to sea, expecting the comming of the fleet. But after long looking, when he saw no man appeare, he againe landed his souldiors: and because at land the Bassa began to want powder, of euerie thirtie barrells of powder in euerie gallie, he tooke out twentie, and of some twentie siue, or according to that proportion. After which time, the Turkes began with greater furie than at any time before, to batter the wals of both townes, especially with those great pieces which they call basilisks, whose shot of two hundred pound waight was seauen hands about; whereby the wals of the castle of S. Michael were beaten flat. And at the same time,

A time, the Bassa at the castle S. Angelo, had with continuall batterie so shaken the castle bulwarke, that it was almost fallen quite downe. These breaches thus made, when the Turkes saw both townes bared of wals and other defendants; and laid so open, that nothing seemed now to let them to looke vpon their enemies, they made no longer stay, but the eighteenth day of August (the sunne being now at the highest) with all their power fiercely assaulted both the townes. Thrice they were repulsed, and still came on a fresh; yet at length beaten downe on euerie side with great slaughter, they were glad shamefully to giue ouer the assault, and againe to retire to their trenches. In this most cruell fight (which endured siue houres) the inuincible courage of the Great master notably appeared, who armed with a pike in his hand, and dreadfull to behold, was still valiantly fighting in the face of the breach, whose presence encouraged not the souldiors only, but euen boies and women to fight: For so it is, that men are more moued with example than with words. Yet of the great number of the Turkes, part stood still in the towne ditch; and to save themselves from the shot of the castle bulwarke, had with wonderfull celeritie cast vp a defence of earth, fagots, and other like matter, which they did of purpose to approach and to vndermine the wals, and had therefore inclosed the space of fiftene elnes: which when the besieged perceiued, they bent certaine pieces of artillerie vpon it, and slew many of them, and with fire consumed what was left. The next day the assault was at the same places by the enemy renewed, who by reason of his number of souldiors might easily send fresh men in stead of them which were wounded or wearie: and first, after their wonted manner, they battered both the townes all that day vntill night; afterwards, the moone arising, about midnight with a horrible crye they began a most terrible assault, which at the first much troubled the Christians, who yet still mindfull of their wonted valour, did so much with their weapons and fire-works, that the enemy euill intreated, was glad after three houres fight to retire to his trenches. The same day a mine was by the defendants perceiued, at the castle bulwarke, wherein a hundred Turkes there found, were almost all slaine, and the mine destroyed. Yet for all this did not the enemy rest at all, but the next day seauen times assaulted the same breaches, vsing now not weapons only, but fire-works also; wherewith Bonifegna had his face so burnt, that he lost one of his eies. At the same time also, the Turkes at a place called the S. P. V. A., laboured mightily to haue gotten into the castle: where Centius a knight of an inuincible courage, got vp vpon the rampier, and with a pike courageously thrust them downe that were climbing vp, and thrusting thorow one, discouraged the rest; but was himselfe wounded in the arme with a small shot: Yet when he had a little withdrawne himselfe to haue his wound bound vp, he came againe to the rampier, and neuer departed from the fight vntill he had (as a valiant conquerour) preferred the place. So the Turkes with great slaughter on euerie side repulsed, left the victorie to the Christians, of whom were slaine almost a hundred, and most of them (as at other times) with shot: amongst whom were these most valiant knights, at the castle Angelo, Fragus, at the castle of S. Michael, Scipio Piatius, Io. Baptista Soderinus, Paulus Bomportus, Marius Fagianus, Ruffinus, and certaine others, men worthe of longer life. The Turkes had also at the same time wrought a mine at the castle S. Michael, which was at once both discouered and destroyed.

With these so many and so great assaults, certaine of the knights (and those not of the meanest sort) fearing least that which was so often attempted by the enemy, should at length be effected; told the Great master, That they thought it conuenient and necessarie, to remooue all the records, all the pictures and reliques of the Saints, and other their religious things into the castle S. Angelo, there to be kept as in a place of more strength and assurance. The Great master, although he well knew that they which thus said, spake it of a good mind, was for all that with that speech exceedingly moued: wherefore he shortly answered them, That so to doe, were nothing else but to appaule and discourage the minds, not of the Malteses onely, who had hitherto valiantly behaued themselves, and done more than any man could haue hoped for; but also of the mercinarie souldiors, if they should perceiue it: wherefore he was resolved, either together to keep all, or lose all; and because none should from thenceforth repose any hope in the strength of the castle S. Angelo, he said he would bring all the garrison out of the castle into the towne, that there they might together with others withstand the enemy; and that he would leave in the castle none but gunners, who should as need required shoot at the enemy. An answere truly well becomming a man of his place, and to be to all posteritie commended: for how can the souldior hope, which seeth his captain dispaire? or aduenture, where the chieftaine seemeth to be stricken with that expedition; they detested such a war, shrinking as much as they could from the assault, and as they might stealing quite away, which many of them did, especially such as had before abjured the Christian faith. For which cause diligent watch and ward was kept, and commandement given by the great Bassa, that they should resolute with themselves either to win the towne, or there all to lay vp their bones; for that the great Sultan Solyman had so commaunded, whom to gain, say was in it selfe death. These and such like persuasions, caused the Viceroy somewhat the sooner to thinke of the bringing forth of his fleet: the besieged in the meane time did what men might for defence of the place and themselves. There was in the castle one Franciscus Giura capitaine of the vauntguard, a noble and valiant gentleman, of a great conceit; he about ten foot from the towne wall which the enemy had with their great ordinance beaten downe, caused a curtaine to be drawne fittie foot long, and fivie foot thicke, with flankers at both ends; which in two nights was brought to perfection, and was afterwards a great helpe to the besieged: The enemy in the meane time began a mine vnder the corner of the towne ditch, where Bonifegna a Spaniard and a most valiant knight had the charge: which the besieged perceiuing, by a countermine defeated the same. It happened in the meane time, that as a fugitiue was swimming to the towne, he was taken by the enemy; which much grieved the besieged, desirous to haue vnderstood something of the state of the enemies campe, and of their purposes. Now when the former mine had taken so euill successe, part of the Turkes assailed the castle S. Michael, and part with gunpowder thought to haue blowne vp the castle bulwarke: but by the carefulnesse and courage of the defendants, all their attempts were disappointed; for many of the Turkes were in both places slaine, and certaine bags of powder taken from them in the mine. With these and other such difficulties, Mustapha and Piall the Turkes Generals disappointed of their hope, consulted with the other great capitaines of the armie, whether they should there still continue that desperat siege, or depart: where most were cleere of opinion, That it was best betime to depart. Yet for all that, the old Bassa said, He would there stay, vntill the galliot (which he had before sent to Constantinople) were returned: with answere from Solyman, and in the meane time both by force and policie to seeke after victorie: which thing he often did, than stood with the broken estate of his armie, or of the besieged; neither resting himselfe nor suffering others to take rest: for one while he battered the wals, another while he wrought mines or else made bridges; sometime he cast vp mounts, and then againe filled the ditches; and: euer and anon gaue one assault or another. In all which doing he vsed such industrie, that whatsoever he tooke in hand, was in short time brought to such perfection as might haue carried a stronger place, had not the valour of the defendants far exceeded all his strong and polittike deuises.

It fortuned, that as Robles the camp-master and Gouveriour of the castle S. Michael, was by night viewing the ruines of the wall, he was stricke in the head with a small shot, and slaine; leauing behind him to his fellowes, the great desire of himselfe: for why, he was a man for many his good parts (wherewith he had many times stood the defendants in great stead) worthily beloued. In whose stead the Great master sent one of the Colonels that was with himselfe, a most expert and resolute capitaine, to take charge of S. Michaels castle; who by his vigilant care and prouidence so well discharged the charge committed vnto him, that as often as the Turkes attempted the place, so often they were with losse repulsed.

The two gallies with the galliot, desferied by the gallies of Malta (as we haue before said) told Piall Bassa the Admirall, that the Christian fleet was readie to come forth: wherefore he fearing the sudden comming thereof, caused seauentie gallies to be in readinesse; besides which, fortie others lay in the haven Marza Moxart vnseruiceable; as wanting both men and other equipage, for that was spent in making bridges, mines, and other such things: necessarrie for the siege: as for the men, they were part with sicknesse, and part with often assaults consumed. Wherefore Piall for certaine daies kept himselfe by day in the port Malta neere the shoare, and by night put forth to sea, expecting the comming of the fleet. But after long looking, when he saw no man appeare, he againe landed his souldiours: and because at land the Bassa began to want powder, of euerie thirte barrels of powder in euerie gallie, he tooke out twentie, and of some twentie fivie, or according to that proportion. After which time, the Turkes began with greater furie than at any time before, to batter the wals of both townes; especially with those great pieces, which they call basilisks, whose shot of two hundred pound waight was seauen hands about; wherby the wals of the castle of S. Michael were beaten flat. And at the same time,

A time, the Bassa at the castle S. Angelo, had with continuall batterie so shaken the castle bulwarke, that it was almost fallen quite downe. These breaches thus made, when the Turkes saw both townes bared of wals and other defendants; and laid so open, that nothing seemed now to let them to looke vpon their enemies, they made no longer stay, but the eighteenth day of August (the sunne being now at the highest) with all their power fiercely assaulted both the townes. Thise they were repulsed, and still came on a fresh; yet at length beaten downe on euerie side with great slaughter, they were glad shamefully to giue ouer the assault, and againe to retire to their trenches. In this most cruell fight (which endured fivie houres) the inuincible courage of the Great master notably appeared, who armed with a pike in his hand, and dreadfull to behold, was still valiantly fighting in the face of the breach, whose presence encouraged not the souldiors only, but euen boies and women to fight: For so it is, that men are more moued with example than with words. Yet of the great number of the Turkes, part stood still in the towne ditch; and to saue themselves from the shot of the castle bulwarke, had with wonderfull celeritie cast vp a defence of earth, sagors, and other like matter, which they did of purpose to approach and to vndermine the wals; and had therefore inclosed the space of fiftene elnes: which when the besieged perceiued, they bent certaine pieces of artillerie vpon it, and slew many of them, and with fire consumed what was left. The next day the assault was at the same places by the enemy renewed, who by reason of his number of souldiors might easily send fresh men in stead of them which were wounded or wearie: and first, after their wonted manner, they battered both the townes all that day vntill night; afterwards, the moone arising, about midnight with a horrible cry they began a most terrible assault, which at the first much troubled the Christians, who yet still mindfull of their wonted valour, did so much with their weapons and fire-works, that the enemy euill intreated, was glad after three houres fight to retire to his trenches. The same day a mine was by the defendants perceiued, at the castle bulwarke, whereto a hundred Turkes there found, were almost all slaine, and the mine destroyed. Yet for all this did not the enemy rest at all, but the next day seauen times assaulted the same breaches, vsing now not weapons only, but fire-works also; wherewith Bonifegna had his face so burnt, that he lost one of his eies. At the same time also, the Turks at a place called the Serra, laboured mightily to haue gotten into the castle: where Centinus a knight of an inuincible courage, got vp vpon the rampier, and with a pike courageously thrust them downe that were climbing vp, and thrusting thorow one, discouraged the rest; but was himselfe wounded in the arme with a small shot: Yet when he had a little withdrawne himselfe to haue his wound bound vp, he came againe to the rampier, and neuer departed from the fight vntill he had (as a valiant conquerour) preserved the place. So the Turks with great slaughter on euerie side repulsed, left the victorie to the Christians, of whom were slaine almost a hundred, and most of them (as at other times) with shot: amongst whom were these most valiant knights, at the castle Angelo, Fragus, at the castle of S. Michael, Scipio Piatu, Io. Baptista Soderinus, Paulus Bomportus, Marius Eagianus, Ruffinus, and certaine others; men worthe of longer life. The Turks had also at the same time wrought a mine at the castle S. Michael, which was at once both discovered and destroyed.

The Turke at once assaults the townes S. Angelo and S. Michael, and are at both places repulsed.

Another assault.

With these so many and so great assaults, certaine of the knights (and those not of the meaneest sort) fearing least that which was so often attempted by the enemy, should at length be effected; told the Great master, That they thought it convenient and necessarrie, to remooue all the records, all the pictures and reliques of the Saints, and other their religious things into the castle S. Angelo, there to be kept as in a place of more strength and assurance. The Great master, although he well knew that they which thus said, spake it of a good mind, was for all that with that speech exceedingly moued: wherefore he shortly answered them, That so to doe, were no thing else but to appaule and discourage the minds, not of the Malteses onely, who had hitherto valiantly behaued themselves, and done more than any man could haue hoped for; but also of the mercinarie souldiors, if they should perceiue it: wherefore he was resolved, either together to keep all, or lose all; and because none should from thenceforth repose any hope in the strength of the castle S. Angelo, he said he would bring all the garrison out of the castle into the towne, that there they might together with others withstand the enemy; and that he would leaue in the castle none but gunners, who should as need required shoot at the enemy. with feare: Whilest the Grand master with this answer doth both ashamen them and also encourage their quailing minds: the Turkes (that this day as the other three before should not passe without assault) with the dawning of the day assailed the very same places with the greatest furie possible, especially at the ruines of the castle: where San Romanus an Aueignoie, which had the charge of that place, lost this short and transitorie life, winning thereby immortal fame: and at S. Michaels, Adurnius one of the knights, and Fagio, with certaine others, were grievously wounded: for the enimie suddenly retiring from the assault, presently so thundred into the breaches with their great and small shot, that all the island seemed to tremble, the heauens to burne, and the aire to be darkened with smoake. In the meane time Valetta thorowly wearied with the mornings fight, had withdrawne himselfe a little to breathe himselfe: when suddenly a Spanish priest, with his hands cast vp to heauen, came running to him, foating and crying out, That all was lost and forlorne, and that three or foure ensignes of the enimies were by the castle breach broken into the towne. VVhich the Great master hearing, suddenly clapt his helmet vpon his head, and with a pike in his hand said vnto them that were about him: Loe fellow souldiours, the houre is come wherein you may shew your selues the most valiant champions of the Christian religion, if it be so, that you now also retaine the same valor which you haue in other battels shewed. There is no cause wherefore you should doubt of this last, for the enimie is the same; and the same God which hath hitherto preferred vs, will not now forsake vs: wherefore follow me valiant hearts. This said, he hastned to the place where most danger was, and with him all the souldiours, all the citizens, men and women, old and yong, yea the very children, all against the common enemy. There was fought a most dreadfull and dangerous battell: some kept the enimie from entering, some set vpon that were already entred, whom they wounded, chased, and slew, although they notably resisted. VVithin without, all was couered with darts, weapons, dead bodies, and blood. The Great master was carefull of all, & in euery place present, commending, exhorting, directing, as occasion required, performing at once all the duties of a most valiant souldior and worthie Generall. At length the Turkes with the setting of the Sunne retired, and so the assault ceased. Thus was the Great master the vndoubted victor, but not without much blood of his people, considering his small number: for in this fight he lost about 200 men, whereas of the enimies, beside them which were entred, whereof not one escaped, were slaine about 2000. These are those foure terrible assaults, presently giuen one after another vnto the besieged.

Garxias the Viceroy in the meane time taried for nothing els to transport his armie to MALTA, but for the coming of Io. Cardona, who with twelue gallies was gone to PANORMO, to conduct thence foure ships laded with prouision: but when he saw him stay long, he sent to him in post, That if he could not with such speed as was required tow forth those ships, he should spend no longer time, but take out the prouision into his gallies, and with speed to come away. So the Viceroy with a fleet of threescore and twelue gallies the twentieth day of August set forward from MESSANA to SIRACUSA, wherein he caried ten thousand select souldiours, amongst whom were about two hundred knights of the Order of S. Iohn, and about fortie of the Order of S. Stephen, which is an Order of knights instituted by Cosmus Medices, duke of FLORENCE, to the imitation of the knights of MALTA in the yeare 1561, and haue their residence at COSMOPOLIS, a new built citie in the island of ELBA in the Tuscan sea, oueragainst PIONBI-NO. Besides these knights in this fleet were diuers noble and valiant gentlemen of ITALIE, SICILIE, and other countries. The fleet being arriued at SIRACUSA, the Viceroy sent Auria with one gallic and a boat to MALTA, to land a man, to know of Paccius (left, as we haue before said, for a watch in the island at MALICA) what newes, or what he had seene. By whom it was vnderstood, That no ship was seene at sea, but one galliot, which the one and twentieth day of August in the morning made towards GAVLOS, and the same day towards night as he was informed by the watchmen of MALICA, sixteene gallies came to water at SALINE, but what became of them afterwards, by reason of the coming on of the night could not be descied.

In this while the besieged had notably repaired the breach at the castle bulwarke, and had in sundry places aptly placed certaine great pieces to flanker the ditches and to beat the mount cast vp by the enimie at the bulwarke of BONINSEGNA, that they might from thence annoy all the plaine of the castle with their small shot. But the Turkes hauing determined with all their forces at once to assault both the townes as before, brought an engine made of spars and boords, able to couer thirtie men, vnder the breach at S. Michaels: whereby it came to passe, that none of the

A defendants could without danger shew themselves in the breach: which when they could by no means endure, they suddenly sallied out, and putting them to flight which were there couered, set fire on the engine and burnt it. In like manner, they which besieged the new citie, were repulsed at the castle breach, and another like engine burnt. The next night certaine of the watch of the castle issued out, and hauing destroyed the Turkes engines prepared for the assailing of that place, and slaine them that were set for the keeping thereof, returned in safetie into the castle. But when the enimies both that day and others following rested not, but repairing their mines, mounts, and engines, laboured in both places to haue beaten the Christians from the wals; all their endeavour and labour was by the industrie and valor of the defendants made frustrate. The besieged had at the castle breach made a mine, and laid in it eight barrells of powder, that if the

B enimie should again assault that place, he might there be blowne vp: but whilest the Turkes were for like purpose working a mine in the same place, they chanced vpon the mine before made, which they spoyled, and carried away all the powder. Thus whilest they labour both on the one side and the other, Mustapha the Generall, a most expert and famous commander, considering that Summer now so farre spent, he was not to vse longer delay; and withall, that resolute perseverance oftentimes in warre findeth out a way to victorie; determined with all his power once againe to assault the castle S. Michael. VVherfore displaying the stately standard of the Turkish emperour, vpon the point whereof was fastened a globe of gold; he commaunded his souldiours to enter the breach, who now like desperat men attempted to haue performed his command, and were by the Christians valiantly encountered: so that in the breach was made a most terrible and

C doubtfull fight. But when the Turkes had now bene twice rejected and beaten downe, Mustapha perceiuing his souldiours as men halfe discouraged but faintly to maintaine the assault, came himselfe to the places, praying and exhorting them not to be discouraged, but that day to confirme their former labours and victories, and not to suffer their vanquished enemies to triumph ouer them: he told them that the enimie had now no defence left wherewith to couer himselfe, that all was beaten downe flat, and that there remained onely a few wearie and maimed bodies, which were not able long to endure the edge of their swords; that with such resolution they had before woon the castle of S. Elmo: last of all he by promising to some mony, to some honour and preferment, threatening some, and requesting others, encouraged some one way, some another, euery one according to his qualitie and disposition: who moued either with their Gene-

D rals presence, promises, or threats, gaue a fresh and fierce assault. The fight was on both sides terrible, yet at length the Turkes were againe enforced to retire: for the defendants had cast vp a rampier, whereon they had fitly placed two field pieces, wherewith they sore troubled the enimie, and at the first shot strucke in sunder one of those wooden engines, which the enimie had made stronger than the rest, couered with raw hides to keepe it from burning; and rent in pieces fortie souldiours which were vnder it: and the same night they which were in the other town and the castle bulwarke, tallying courageously out, destroyed all the enimies defences, & draue them from a mount, which they had made vpon the fortifications of the Christians: whereby they perceived plainely, what small courage the Turkes had to fight, for vpon that mount they were almost three hundred, whereas of our men was but fife and twentie, with which small number for

E all that they had no mind to deale. The defendants had for like purpose as before made another mine at the castle bulwarke, but perceiuing that it was in danger to be found by the enimie in repairing his fortifications without, they suddenly put fire vnto it, by force whereof threescore Turkes which were within the danger of the place, were blowne vp and slaine.

Garxias the Viceroy, in the meane while that these things were in doing, departing with his fleet from SIRACUSA, with a prosperous wind kept on his course toward PACHYNVM, where they descied a tall ship at sea, driuen thither (as was afterwards knowne) by tempest: she out of the island MENIN was carrying a great supplie of shot and powder vnto the Turkes campe at MALTA; but now overtaken by the Christian fleet, easily yielded, and was by the Viceroy sent by other mariners to SIRACUSA. And now the Christian fleet caried with a faire gale towards F MALTA, suddenly arose such a tempest from the East, that they were driuen to the island AEOLIA, two hundred and twentie miles West of MALTA, from whence the first of September letters were brought from the Viceroy to the Great master, certifying him, That he would in short time come with his fleet and relieue him. The same day also a Christian fled out of the Turkes gallies, wherein he was captiue, to the citie S. Angelo; who reported, That in the Turkes campe were were few men able to fight, most of the armie being with wounds, famine, sicknesse, and other G miseries brought to extreame weaknesse: and besides that, that infinite numbers of them died daily: yet for all that he said moreover, that they were determined to besiege the cite of MALTA, and had already for that purpose mounted five great pieces of artillerie for batterie; and that they had but a few dayes before taken Melite, and the last day of all foureteeen hostes of the garrison souldiours of that cite. In the meane while the fleet which was driuen (as we said) to AGOS, the rage of the sea being now well appeased, came to DREANUM, and from thence toward GAVLOS, as was before intended: where by the way the two gallies of MALTA light vpon two of the Turkes galliots, and tooke them.

The Christian fleet commeth to GAVLOS.

The fifth day of September the Christian fleet came to GAVLOS, where the Viceroy perceiuing not the appointed signes from MALTA, whereby he might safely land, returned forthwith H backe againe to POZALO, whether Auria immediately following him, told him, That he had seene the signes, and assured him of safe landing in the island of MALTA: wherewith the Viceroy encouraged, the next day towards night returned againe to GAVLOS.

A fugitive discovereth the enemies purpose to the Great master.

The same day a Christian captiue fled from the Turks to S. Angelo, and told the Great master, That he was come to bring him good newes, how that the Turks had determined to proue their last fortune in assaulting the castle S. Michael, which they would doe the next day, where if the successe were answerable to their desire, they would then tarrie, but if not, then forthwith be gone: and that Mustapha the more to encourage his souldiours, had promised five talents of gold to the ensignebearers, that should first aduance their ensignes vpon the wals, and farther to promote them to greater places of honor; as for the rest, he would reward euery one of them according to their desert, either with money or preferment. Vlastra thinking all these things to be by Gods appointment discovered vnto him by such men, as they had from time to time bene: first gaue thanks vnto Almighty God, and after that with all diligence prepared such things as he thought most necessaric for the repulsing of the enemy. But the Turks all that day with their great ordinance battered the new cite, and the shipping in the haven, in such sort that one of the great ships was there sunke.

The Viceroy arriveth at Malta, and landeth his forces.

In the morning Garzia the Viceroy with his fleet arrived at the island of MALTA, and there quickly and quietly landed his forces, and whilst his gallies watered at GAVLOS, went forward with the armie about halfe a mile, instructing the Generals and Colonels what he thought needfull to be done, commaunding all proclamations and commaunds to be made in the name of the king of SPAIN, vntill they came to the Great master, and then in all things to obey him as their Soueraigne: and charged Ascanius Cornia the Generall in all his actions to follow the counsell of the greater part. So in few words exhorting them to play the men, he left them marching towards MELITE. About noone he retired to his gallies, and sayling Eastward, came with all his fleet within the sight of the cite of MELITE, about three miles distant from the South shore. They of the cite vpon sight of the fleet, in token of joy discharged all the great artillerie, which was answered from the fleet, by discharging all their great ordinance twice. After that he returned as he had before determined into SICILIA, to take into his gallies the duke of VERBINS companies which were come to MESSANA, and certain bands of Spaniards at SYRACUSA, and so forthwith to returne to MALTA to attend the departing of the Turkes fleet, being L now cuill appointed, and already as good as halfe ouerthrowne.

The Turkes, who (as is before said) had purposed to proue their last fortune vpon the towne of S. Michael, had now certaine dayes before the comming of the fleet begun to trusse vp their baggage: but as soone as they heard that the fleet was come, and the armie landed, there suddenly arose a wonderfull tumultuous confusion amongst them, some cried arme, arme, and othersome as fast to be gone: and being generally all afraid, euery one according to his disposition, betooke himselfe to his weapons or to his heeles; the greatest number thrust together into their trenches, as neere as they could vnto their great ordinance: and so burning the engines and fortifications, with all the speed they could embarked their great ordinance and baggage. Which they in the towne S. Angelo perceiuing, not expecting the commandement of the Great master, in so sudden an opportunitie courageously sallied out to BYRMOLA, where certaine Turkes kept a huge great peece of ordinance; who now hauing no mind to fight, betooke themselves to flight, and forsooke the peece, which they of the towne presently drew within their wals. And if the newcome forces had that day charged the enemy as they disorderly ran to their gallies, hap-

A pily they had either found an occasion of victorie, or at leastwise taken from them the greatest part of their artillerie. But it may be, that they followed the old militarie saying, That vnto the flying enemy a man should make a bridge of siluer. Besides that, they thinking it not convenient to depart from the prouision and things which they had brought for the releefe of the besieged; which for the roughnesse of the way and want of horses were hardly caried, would not prouoke the enemy with any skirmish: whereby it came to passe, that the Turkes without let embarked their great ordinance, their baggage, and most part of their armie. The eleventh of September, whilst the Turkes fleet was brought out of the haven MARZA MOXET, a fugitive of GENVA, The Turkes take the siege. came in hast to the Great master, and told him that ten thousand Turkes were marching towards MELITE, to meet with the Christians vpon the way. Which thing the Great master hearing, presently sent a sufficient number of good souldiours to the castle Saint Elmo, there to set vp one of the ensignes of the sacred Order: who comming thither, found there foure and twentie great peeces, some for batterie, some for the field, which they could not in so great hast remouue thence.

The Turkes fleet departing out of the haven MARZA MOXET to the port S. Paule, there landed seven thousand men, with Mustapha their Generall, who was falsely informed, That the Christians were not about three thousand strong: and from thence, encouraged with the small number of the enemy (as they supposed) they marched directly toward MELITE. The Christians also marching orderly and readie to giue battell, held on their way to meet them: and at the rising of an hill both armies meeting together, they gaue a great shout, and withall the formost C began the battell, where some few were at the first slaine on both sides. But the Christians still growing vpon them both in number and strength, the Turkes finding themselves ouercharged, fled, the Christians pursuing them and killing them vntill they came to their gallies; where in striving who should get in first, about foure hundred of them were drowned in the sea, besides eightene hundred slaine in the battell at land: and had the Christian souldiours well knowne the country, they had slaine them euery mothers sonne. The Turkes thus driuen to their gallies, lay there in the haven all the next day, and most part of the night following: but a little before day vpon the shooting off of a great peece, the signe of their departure, they all hoisted saile for GRECIA, leaving the island of MALTA fore impouerished and wasted. In this siege the Turkes lost about foure and twentie thousand, whereof most part were of their best souldiours: and of the D Christians were slaine about five thousand, besides two hundred and fortie knights of the Order, men of diuers nations, but all worthe eternall fame, whose dead bodies the Great master caused to be honourably buried. The Turkes in their batterie during the siege, spent as is accounted threecore and eightene thousand great shot.

The Turkes depart from Malta.

If a man doe well consider the difficulties and dangers the besieged passed thorow in this five moneths siege, the manifold labours and perils they endured in so many and so terrible assaults, the small releefe to them sent in so great distresse, with the desperat obstinacie of so puissant an enemy; he shall hardly find any place these many yeares more mightily impugned, or with greater valour and resolution defended. The late besieged, and now victorious prince, honourably acquitted of so great an enemy, first commaunded publicke prayers with E thanksgiuing to be made vnto the giuer of all victorie: after that, he rewarded the valiant, commended the rest, and gaue thanks to all; he charitably relieved the sicke and wounded, bewailed the spoile of the island, and carefully provided for the repairing of the breaches and places battered: and yet in all this doing, diligently enquired after the enemies course and purpose, & was not in any thing remisse or secure, as in victorie most men are. But because so great harms could not without great helpe in short time be repaired, and the returne of the proud enemy, nor without cause the next yeare feared: he by letters to diuers great princes, and especially to the graund priors of the Order, in diuers countries, requested helpe; amongst whom George, graund prior of GERMANIE, and founder of the castle of S. Elmo, was one of the chiefe. The copie of which letters, because they briefly containe what we haue before in this historie at large F written, I haue thought good here to set downe, that the same may in such order be read, as it was by the Great master himselfe reported.

The carefulnesse of the Great Master.

Brother

Brother Valetta, Master of the hospitall of Ierusalem, to the reuerend and religious our welbeloued brother in Christ, George of Hohenheim; called Bombast, prior of our priorie in Almanie, greeting.

The letters of the Great master to the graund prior of Almanie, concerning the manner of the Turke proceedings in the siege of Malta.

Although we doubt not but that by the letters and relation of many, you already understand of the comming of the Turkes to invade these islands, or rather utterly to subuert our Societie: and the happie and heavenly victorie by vs obtained of it: Yet if the same things shall by our letters also be brought vnto you, we haue thought the same will be vnto you a thing much more pleasing. For seeing that we are certainly perswaded, that you in this no lesse happy than wholesome successe will giue most heartie thanks to Almighty God; and that the fruit of this good shall most of all redound vnto you, for the honour which you beare in our Order; we haue willingly determined to participate this our ioy with you, and plainly and openly to protest, That we attribute this so notable and wonderfull a victorie to our Lord Christ Iesus, the greatest king of all kings; and author of all good things, which that you may the more worthily and willingly doe, wee will declare the whole matter, not at large (for that were to write an historie) but breiefely and in few words. Sultan Solyman the most mortall enemie of the Christian name, and especially of our Societie, not contented to haue spoiled vs of the most famous island of the RHODES, the castle of TRIPOLIS, and almost whatsoever we had els, commaunded a great and strong fleet to be made readie against vs, which departing from CONSTANTINOPLE the one and twentieth day of March, arrived here the eighteenth day of May: which fleet consisted of almost two hundred and fiftie gallies, gallions and other ships. The number of the enemie that beare armes according to the truth, was about fortie thousand, more or lesse: General of the land forces, was Mustapha Bassa; and of the fleet Piali Bassa was Admirall: who hauing spent a few daies in landing their forces, viewing the places, pitching their tents, and setting things in order (as the manner of warre is) they began first to assaile the castle of S. Elmo (situated in the mouth of the haven) with great force, and a most furious batterie. Which when they had many daies done without intermission, and had opened a great part of the wall, and with all kind of weapons assaulted the breach: yet was it by the valour and prowesse of our knights and other worthy souldiors kept and defended by the space of thirtie five daies, with the great losse and slaughter of the enemie: although the castle it selfe, in the iudgement of many, seemed not possible to be but a few daies defended against so great a force. At length the foure and twentieth day of Iune, when our men could no longer indure the multitude and furie of the enemie, enuironed and shut up both by sea and land, and destitute of all helpe, the castle was taken by the Turkes; those few of our men which were left, being all slaine. Of which victorie they being proude, began to besiege the castle and towne of S. Michael, and this new citie, especially at the castle and Portingall bulwarke: and (as their manner is) with great diligence and greater force and number of great artillerie and warlike engines, they began in diuers places at once to batter and beat downe the wals. Which siege the dreadfull armie of the Turkes, both by sea and land, made to be most fearefull and terrible, with such huge great ordinance as the like for bignesse and force was in no place to be scene; day and night thundring out their yron and stone shot, fire, and seauen hands about; wherewith not the thickest wals, but euen the verie mountaines themselves might haue been beaten downe and ouerthrowne: by furie wherof, the wals in many places were so battered, that a man might easily haue entred as on plaine ground. Where, when the barbarous enemies had with wonderfull force and hideous outcries oftentimes attempted to enter, so often were they with great slaughter and dishonour repulsed and beaten backe; many of their men being slaine or wounded. Their Generals, as well at sea as land, after that they had in so many places, with all their forces in almost foure moneths siege and assault, with exceeding furie in vaine attempted the breaches, and lost the greatest part of their old souldiors, especially winter now comming on, wherein all wars by law of nations ought to cease; thought of nothing else but of departure, or rather of flight: which the comming of Garcias of TOLEDO, Viceroy of SICILIA and Admirall of the king of SPAINES his fleet, with ten thousand select souldiors (amongst whom was at the least two hundred and fouteene of our knights, and many other noble and valiant gentlemen; which onely with a Christian Zeale, voluntarily met together from diuers parts of the world to helpe and relieue vs) caused them to hasten. So haue you summarily and in few words, the proceedings and flight of the Turke fleet, and the victorie by vs (by the power of God) thereof obtained. It shall be your part to consider and coniecture, in what

A state our Order and this island now standeth, into what poore estate we are brought, how many things we want; wherein except we be relieved by the helpe and aid of our brethren especially such as you are, as we well hope and assuredly beleue we shall, our state will quickly take end. Fare you well from MALTA the ninth of October 1565.

The Great master thus deliuered of so great a siege, and bountifullly relieved by the Christian princes, and the great commendiers of his Order; speedily repaired the breaches and places battered, and with new fortifications strengthened such places as he had by the late passed dangers perceived to be most subject to the enemies force.

After the returne of the Turkes fleet to CONSTANTINOPLE, Solyman being exceeding angry with the Gouvernour of the island of CHIOS his tributarie, as well for that he had during the late siege of MALTA, had intelligence with the Great master, and reuealed vnto him many of the Turkes desseignes; as also for detaining of two yeares tribute, which was yearly ten thousand ducats; and had also neglected to send his wonted presents to the great Bassas, who therefore the more incensed, the tyrant commaunded Piali Bassa his Admirall to make readie his fleet, and by force or pollicie, to take that fruitfull and pleasant island wholly into his owne hand. Who without delay, with a fleet of eightie gallies, the fifteenth day of Aprill in the yeare 1566, being then Easterday, arrived at CHIOS. The chiefe men of the island, vpon sight of the fleet, forthwith sent embassadours to the Bassa with presents, courteously offering vnto him the haven, and whatsoever else he should require. Piali with great kindnesse accepted their offer, and presently possessed himselfe of the haven in three places: and afterward landing, sent for the Gouvernour of the citie, & twelue of the chiefe citizens to come vnto him, as if he had had some speciall matter to confere with him about from the great Sultan, before his departure thence for MALTA OF ITALIE. Who hauing a little conferred together, went to him with great feare; and that not without cause, for as soone as they were come before him, he commaunded them to be laid hold vpon and cast fast into yrons: which done, the souldiors forthwith tooke the towne hall, and without resistance pulling downe the townes ensigne (wherein was the picture of S. George with a red crosse) in stead thereof set vp one of the Turkes: the like whereof was done with the great reioicing of the Turkes, thorow the whole island. After that, they rifled the Churches, and againe consecrated them after their Mahometane manner. The Gouvernour of the citie and the Senators with their families, the Bassa sent in fute ships to CONSTANTINOPLE: as for the vulgar people, they were at choise, either there to tarry still, or depart, as best stood with their liking. And so the Bassa, when he had there placed a new Gouvernour, one of the Turkes, with a strong garrison, and set vp the Mahometane superstition in that most fertile island, departed thence for ITALIE: where sayling alongst the coast of APULIA, he did exceeding much harme in burning and destroying the countrey villages, and carrying away of the poore people into captiuitie; and so returned.

At this time, the kingdome of HUNGARIE was most miserably rent in pieces by the lieutenants and captaines of Solyman, and Maximilian the emperour, and John the Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA, Solymans vassall: who grieved with the harmes done vnto him by the emperours captaines, wherof himselfe was the cause, and vainely hoping to haue obtained at Solymans hands the greatest part of the kingdome of HUNGARIE, as had sometime king John; ceased not continually to sollicit him to come himselfe in person to make a full conquest of the reliques of HUNGARIE, yet holden by the emperour and some of the Hungarian nobilitie: And flattering himselfe in that vaine hope, called himselfe the king of HUNGARIE, and increasing his strength by letters vnto the nobilitie and burgesies of the cities of HUNGARIE, summoned them, as if it had bin by the appointment of Solyman his great patron, That they should all the ninth of March meet together at THORDA, to determine with him of matters concerning their common good. Which thing, as soone as Lázarus Suenidi the emperours lieutenant vnderstood, he forthwith by other letters countermanded those of the Vayuods; perswading the Hungarians, not to listen to the charmes of the Vayuod and the Turke, tending to their destruction, but rather to yeld to their obedience to Maximilian the Christian emperour, whose purpose was by the aid of the Christian princes, to protect and preferre them in peace. And hereby it came to passe, that the remainders of this sore shaken kingdome, deuided into factions, and diuersly carried, according to their affection, some to the one side, some to the other, began afresh to worke one anothers confusion, confusion, which sely serued the Turkes to encroache more and more vpon them: What at the same time surprised the towne of AINATSCHE (the capitaine thereof with certaine of the garrison souldiours being gone about their businesse to AORTA) and put to the sword all them that they found in the towne. They thought also to haue taken the strong towne of SIGETH, but were by the valiant countie Nicholaus Serinus Gouvernour thereof, courageously encountered; and after foure houres hard fight, ouerthrowne and put to flight: Not long after, they ranged vpon and downe the countie, and set in booties as farre as IVIA and RAB, and did the countie people much harme. For which cause, Maximilian the emperour about the latter end of May brake vp the assembly of the empire then holden at AVGVSTA, and began carefully to provide things needfull for the warre: appointing his capitaines for the raising of such forces in GERMANY, as were but a little before granted vnto him by the princes and states of the empire, in their late assembly; but went himselfe to VIENNA. For it was told him (as the truth was) That Solyman now in his extreame age, was with a mightie armie set forward from CONSTANTINOPLE, and marching thorow BULGARIA and SERUA, was come directly to BELGRADE: where John the Vayvod of TRANSILVANIA met him, and kissing his hand, had commended himselfe and all his state vnto his protection. At which time, Suendi the emperours lieutenant laid hard siege to the towne of HUSTH in the borders of TRANSILVANIA. The Bassa of BVDA at the same time on the other side, by commandement of Solyman, with eight thousand Turkes and fife and twentie pieces of great ordinance besieging PALOTTA, a strong towne about eight miles from RAB; had with continuall batterie by the space of eight daies, brought the same into great danger, although it was valiantly defended by George Thuriger. But hearing of the approach of George, countie of Helfenstein, sent by the emperour with certaine companies of Germans to relieue the same, he rose in such hast from the siege, that he left certaine of his great ordinance and a great part of his baggage behind him, and retired towards ALBAREGALIS. The countie hauing relieved the towne, caused the breaches to be forthwith repaired, and with a new supply strengthened the old garrison. Thus was a most lamentable warre at once begun in diuers places of HUNGARIE. After that, the countie of Helfenstein, strengthened by the comming of countie Salma with certaine companies from RAB, departed from PALOTTA, and came to VESPRINIVM, a citie about two miles off; then holden by the Turkes: which citie he tooke by force the last of Iune, and left not a Turke aliue therein, because that they a few daies before, had cruelly slaine certaine Christians whom they had taken prisoners: so leauing strong garrisons both in VESPRINIVM and PALOTTA, they returned to RAB. Shortly after, the countie Salma laid siege to TATTA a strong towne, otherwise called DORIS, betwixt RAB and COMARA, which at length he tooke by assault the eight and twentieth day of Iuly, and slew all the Turkes, except fiftie, which flying into one of the towers of the castle, yeelded vpon composition; amongst whom was the late Gouvernour of VESPRINIVM, and the Gouvernour of this place, with the Bassa of BVDA his nigh kinsman, who were all presently sent prisoners to VIENNA. So the countie following the course of his victorie (the terror of his former good fortune running before him into the Turkes strongest holds) was on his way to haue besieged GESTES, a towne neere to PALOTTA: when the Turkes there in garrison, vpon the first sight of his armie, left all, and fled out at the farther side of the town to STRIGONIVM. After whose example, other of the Turkes garrisons in Vitha, Tschokiku, & Sambok, castles thereabouts, set fire on that they could not carrie, and followed their fellowes to STRIGONIVM also. The emperour vnderstanding of the good successe of his capitaine, caused publike praiers with thanksgiuing, to almightie God to be made thorow all the churches thereabouts.

Countie Serinus, Gouvernour of the strong towne of SIGETH and the countie thereabout, certainly aduertised of the comming of Solyman, sent Casparus Alapiannus and Nicholas Cobach, two of his capitaines, with a thousand foot and fife hundred horse, to lie in wait for the forerunners of the Turkes armie: who drawing neere vnto the place where these Turkes lay, not farre from QVINQVE ECLISE, suddenly in the shutting in of the next day, set vpon them, doubting no such matter, and put them in such a feare that they disorderedly fled some one way, some another, and were most of them slaine or wounded by the Hungarians in their flight. Hali-beg, one of the Turkes great Sanzackes, and leader of that companie, sore wounded, and seeking to saue himselfe by flight in the marshes, there perished: his sonne, and many other notable men amongst the Turkes, were there taken, and carried prisoners to SIGETH. The spoile

A the Hungarians there tooke, was exceeding great: for beside plate and coine, whereof they found good store, they tooke eight camels, threelcore horses, fife mules, and six carts laden with all manner of rich spoile, and many garments of great price; wherein the gentlemen attired, returned to SIGETH in great brauerie, with two faire red ensignes of the enemies.

Maximilian the emperour, long before aduertised of Solymans purpose for the conquest of the remainder of HUNGARIE; to withstand so mightie an enemy, had beside the forces raised in his owne dominions, procured great aid both of the states of the empire and other Christian princes, which about this time met together at RAB. First there repaired thither foure legions of German footmen, and vpwards of twentie thousand horsemen, with foure thousand Hungarians: The duke of SAVOY sent thither foure hundred Argolets: and many noble gentlemen out of diuers parts of EUROPE resorted thither, to serue the emperour in those wars of their owne charge, especially the knights of MALTA: and out of ITALIE, Prosper Columna, and Angelus Casius: out of FRANCE, Guise the graund prior, Brissack and Lansack; who but a little before were going to MALTA, of purpose to haue serued there if the Turkes fleet had come thither againe, as it was reported it would; but vnderstanding that it came not, returned directly into HUNGARIE, with certaine other knights of the Order. Many also of the princes and free cities of ITALIE, declared their good will toward the emperour in this warre; some sending him men, as did Cosmus Medices duke of FLORENCE, who sent thither of his owne charge three thousand footmen; some money, as MANTVA, GENVA, and LVCA. Thither came also Alphonso duke of FERARA, with a gallant companie of noble gentlemen, and others his followers. Beside which land forces, the emperour had also provided vpon the riuier of Danubius twelue gallies, and thirtie other ships for burthen, so made, as that the men could not be hurt with the Turkes arrowes: wherein were embarked three thousand souldiours, most part Italians, vnder the conduct of Philippus Flachius a German, and one of the knights of MALTA, who was afterward receiued into the number of the princes of the empire.

Solyman comming to the riuier Drauus, commaunded a bridge to be made ouer that great riuier, and the deepe fens on the farther side of the riuier towards SIGETH, for the transporting of his great armie; a worke of such difficultie, that being thrice vnsuccessfully begun, it was againe giuen ouer, as a thing almost impossible: wherewith Solyman was so moued, that in his rage he swore to hang vp the great Bassa that had the charge of that worke, if he did not with as much speed as were possible, bring it to perfection. Whereupon the worke was againe begun, all the boats that were to be found in the riuier taken vp, and timber for the purpose brought from farre, for the making of that bridge. In this worke were imploied, not the vulgar people onely of the countie which was tributarie to the Turkes, but the gentlemen themselves also, were by the imperious Turke (now commaunding for his life) enforced to lay their fingers to worke day and night without ceasing, vntill the bridge (which before was thought scarce possible to haue bene made) was by the restless industrie and labour of such a multitude of men, in the space of ten daies brought to perfection. Wherein the seueritie the barbarous tyrant vsed towards his subjects, is worth the noting, whereby he extorteth from them, more than is almost possible for men to performe: so that it is not to be marvelled, that he hath so good successe in whatsoeuer he taketh in hand. Ouere this bridge (a mile in length) passed Solyman, and encamped at a place called MVAATCHZ, where he staid certaine daies, vntill his huge armie was all come ouer. The last of Iuly, ninecie thousand Turkes (the vauntguard of Solymans armie) came before SIGETH, and encamped within a mile of the towne: after whom shortly after followed an hundred thousand mo out of Solymans campe, of whom manie in approaching the towne, were slaine with great shot out of the castle; the rest for all that encamped themselves as neere vnto the towne as they could, and began the siege.

The towne of SIGETH is strongly scituat in a Marsh, on the North side of Drauus, vpon the frontiers of DALMATIA, commaunding all the countie round about it, which of it taketh name; and was at that time a strong bulwarke against the Turkes, for entering farther into the countie that way toward STIRIA. In this towne was Gouvernour Nicholaus Serinus, commonly called the Countie, a valiant man, and a mortall enemy of the Turkes, with a garrison of 2300 good souldiours: who seeing the huge armie of the Turkes, called together into the castle the capitaines of the garrison and the chiefe of the citizens; where standing in the midst of them, he spake vnto them as followed.

Countie Serinus
his comfortable and resolute speech to his foldiers.

You see (said he) how we are on every side beset with the multitude of our enemies, wherein resteth G their cheefe hope: But let not vs be therefore afraid or discouraged; for that victorie dependeth not of a confused multitude of heartlesse men, but of the power of our God, who hath by a few at his pleasure many times overthrowne the mightie armies of the proud; and will not in the midst of these dangers now forsake vs, if wee putting our trust and confidence in him, doe what becometh valiant and courageous men. Besides that our iust cause, with the strength of the place we hold, our owne valor, and the helpe of our friends, who I assure my selfe will not faile vs at our need, counteraileth their confused multitude, forced together by their imperious commanders out of far countries, and what sooner els the proud tyrant hath brought with him into the field. Wherefore let vs all as becometh valiant men, for the truth of our religion, and for the honour of our prince and countrey, live and die together, knowing whatsoeuer befall, That to a life so lost, beside neuer dying fame, belongeth a most assured hope of endlesse ioy and felicitie. As for my selfe, I am resolute, and so (I hope) are you also, that as I am a Christian, and free borne, so will I (by the grace of God) in the same faith and freedome end my dayes. Neither shall the proud Turke, so long as I am able to hold up this hand, haue euer power to commaund ouer me or the ground whereon I stand. This said, he first tooke himselfe a solemne oath, to performe what he had promised, and perswaded the rest to take the like: which done, euery man returned to the place of his charge.

meth into the campe at Sigeth.

The first of August Solyman encamped within a mile of the towne, and the next day after came himselfe into the campe, at whose comming the great ordinance and small shot so thundred out of the Turks campe, as if heauen and earth should haue gone together, the Turkes after their wonted manner crying aloud their Alla, Alla, Alla, and the Christians answering them with the name of Iesus. The seuenth of August the Turkes cast vp a great mount, and thereon planted certaine great peeces of ordinance. The next day following they began most terribly to batter the new towne in three places, and with incredible labour cast vp a mount in the midst of the marish, as it were in the towne ditch, from whence they the next day with certaine peeces of great artillerie day and night battered the inner castle of the towne without any intermission, and did great harme both to the castle and the defendants. The countie perceiuing the new cite to be now so laid open with the furie of the Turks batterie, as that it was not possible to be defended; caused his fouldiours to set it all on fire, and so retired into the old. The tenth of August the Turkes furiously battered the old town in three places, and brought their ordinance into the new towne: and with timber, earth, and rubble, made a bridge, the more commodiously to go ouer the marish. For the speedier accomplishment whereof, all the Turkes were compelled to lay to their hands, and to carrie wood, fagots, earth, and such like things without ceasing. There might a man haue seene all the fields full of cammels, horses, and of the Turkes themselves, like enimies, carrying wood, earth, stones, or one thing or other to fill vp the marish: so was there with wonderfull labour two plaine wayes made thorow the deepe fenne, from the towne to the castle: where the Ianizaries, defended from the great shot with sacks of wooll and such like things, did with the multitude of their small shot so ouerwhelme the defendants, that they could not against those places without most manifest danger shew themselves vpon the wals. So that what by their vigilant indutrie, and the furie of the great artillerie, the Turkes (though not without great losse) by force entred the old towne the nineteenth of August, vsing in their victorie such celeritie, that they slew many of the most valiant defendants before they were able to recover the safegard of the castle. Both the townes thus lost, and so many worthie men slaine, not without cause brought great heauinesse vpon the rest which were in the castle with the countie. The Turkes possessed of the old towne, the next day planted their batterie against the castle in foure places, and with fagots, rubble, and earth, made two plaine wayes vnto it, still filling vp the marish: and hauing with continuall batterie made it faultable, the nine and twentie day of August they began fiercely to assaile the breaches: but when they had lost many of their men, and done what they could, they were enforced with shame to retire. In this assault amongst many other of their best fouldiours was lost one of their great Bassaes also.

sheold towne.

Whilist these things were in doing, Solyman farre spent with years, and distempered with his M long trauell, fell sicke of a loosenesse of his bellie, and for the better recouerie of his health retired himselfe (the siege yet continuing) to QVINYB ECLISIE, a citie neare to SIGETH, where shortly after he died of the bloudie flux, the fourth day of September, in the yeare of our Lord 1566, when he had liued 76 yeares, and reigned thereof 46. He was of stature tall, of feature slender,

A slender, long necked, his colour pale and wan, his nose long and hooked, of nature ambitious and bountifull, more faithfull of his word and promise than were for most part the Mahometan kings his progenitors, wanting nothing worthie of so great an empire, but that wherein all happinesse is contained, faith in Christ Iesus. Muhamet the Visier Bassa (who all commaunded in Solymans absence) fearing the insolencie of the Ianizaries, and least some tumult should arise in the campe, if his death should be knowne, concealed it by all means: and to be sure of them that were of all others best able to make certaine report thereof, caused his physicians and apothecaries to be secretly strangled, and by a trustie messenger, sent in post, certified Selymus (Solymans onely sonne, and his father in law, then lying in MAGNÉSIA) of the death of his father, willing him in hast to repaire to CONSTANTINOPLE to take possession of the empire; and that done, forthwith to come to the armie in HUNGARIE. But this could not be so secretly done, but that the Ianizaries began to mistrust the matter: Which Muhamet Bassa quickly perceiuing, caused the dead bodie of Solyman in his wonted apparrell to be brought into his tent sitting vpright in his horfelitter, as if he had beene sicke of the gout, his wonted disease; and so shewing him to the Ianizaries, both deceived and contented them, and so went forward with the siege.

warke undermined & set on fire by the Ianiz-aries.

The Ianizaries hauing in the last assault lost many of their fellows, began now to vndermine the greatest bulwarke of the castle, from which the defendants with their great ordinance did most annoy them: wherein they vsed such diligence, that the fifth of September they with gunpowder and other light matter provided for that purpose, had set all the bulwarke on a light fire; and by that meanes possessed thereof, with all their force assailed the bulwarke next vnto the castle gate, from whence they were with great slaughter twice repulsed by the countie. But the raging fire still encreasing, he was enforced with those which were yet left aliue, to retire into the inner castle, wherein was but two great peeces, and foureteene others of small force. Thus the Turkes still preuailing, and taking one place after another, the seuenth of September they furiously assaulted the little castle, wherein they cast such abundance of fire, that in short time it caught hold on the buildings, and set all on fire. The countie thus assailed by the enemy without, and worse distressed with the fire within, which still encreasing, left no place for him in safetie to retire vnto, went into his chamber, where putting on a rich new sute of apparrell, came presently out againe with his sword and targuet in his hand; and finding his fouldiours with cheerefull countenance and their weapons in their hands, attending his comming, spake vnto them these few his D last words. The hard fortune of this sinfull kingdome hath together with our owne ouertaken vs: but let vs (noble hearts) with patience endure what is to vs by God assigned. You know what wee haue before promised, which hitherto God be thanked we haue accordingly performed, and now let vs with like resolution performe this last. The place you see is not longer to be kept, the denouring fire groweth so still vpon vs, and we in number are but few: Wherefore let vs as becometh valiant men breake out into the vtter castle, there to die in the midst of our enemies, to liue afterwards with God for euer, I will be the first that will goe out, follow you me like men. This said, with his sword and targuet in his hand, without any other armour, calling thrice vpon the name of Iesus, he issued out at the castle gate, with the rest following him: where valiantly fighting with the Ianizaries vpon the bridge; and hauing slaine some of them, he was first wounded in two places of his bodie E with small shot, and at last strucke in the head with an vnluckie shot, fell downe dead; the Turkes for joy crying out their wonted word Alla. The rest of the fouldiours in flying backe againe into the castle, were all slaine by the Turkes, except some few, whom some of the Ianizaries in regard of their valour, by putting their caps vpon their heads, saued from the furie of the rest. In this siege, the Turkes (as they themselves reported) lost seauen thousand Ianizaries, and twentie eight thousand other fouldiours, beside many voluntarie men not enrolled in their muster-books, and three of their great Bassaes. Serinus his head was presently cut off, and the next day (with the heads of the other slaine Christians) set vpon a pole, for all the armie to gaze vpon. After that, it was taken downe, and by Muhamet the great Bassa sent to Mustapha the Bassa of BYDÁ his kinsman; who by two countrey men, sent it wrapped in a red scarfe couered with a faire linnen cloth, to countie Salma in the emperours campe at RAB, with this taunting letter thus directed.

The death of this noble and valiant captain was much lamented of all the Christian armie, and his head with many teares by his sonne Balthasar honourably buried amongst his ancestors in Tschacaturna, his owne castle. Solyman at his comming with this mightie armie into HUNGARIE, had purposed before his returne, if he had not beene by death prevented, to haue conquered both the remainder of the kingdome of HUNGARIE, and to haue againe attempted the winning of VIENNA. For the accomplishing of which his designs, he at his first comming sent Parthaus Bassa with fortie thousand Turkes to helpe the Bassa of TBMESVARE and the Tartars, in the behalfe of the Vayuod, to besiege the strong towne of GYULA, situated vpon the lake ZARKAD in the confines of TRANSILVANIA; not farre from whence Suendi had but in August before ouerthrowne the Tartars, called in by Solyman for the aid of the Vayuod, and slain of them ten thousand. And at the same time he sent Mustapha Bassa of BOSNA, and Carambeu, with a great power to ALBA REGALIS; who joyning with the Bassa of BVDA, should keepe the emperor Maximilian busie, whilest he in the meane time besieged SIGETH, as is before declared. Parthaus Bassa comming to GYULA, and laying hard siege to the towne, was still notably repulsed by Nicholas Keretschen, Gouverneur of the towne: in so much, that in a fallie he had certaine pieces of his great ordinance taken from him by the defendants, and the rest cloyed. But this braue captain, not to haue beene constrained by all that the Bassa could doe, was at last persuaded by his kinsman George Bebius (from whom Suendi had a little before taken certain castles, for reuolting from the emperor to the Vayuod) for a great summe of money to deliuer vp the towne to the Bassa: which he did, couenancing beside his reward, That the souldiours should with bag and baggage in safetie depart; all which was frankly graunted: who were not gone past a mile out of the towne, but they were set vpon by the Turkes, and all slaine, except some few which crept into the reeds growing in the marish fast by, and so escaped. The traitor himselfe expecting his reward, was carried in bonds to CONSTANTINOPLE: where afterward, vpon complaint made how hardly he had vsed certaine Turkes, whom he had sometime taken prisoners, he was by the commaundement of Selymus, who succeeded Solyman, thrust into a hoghead stricke full of nailes with the points inward, with this inscription vpon it: Here receiue the reward of thy auarice and treason, GYULA thou soldest for gold: if thou be not faithfull to Maximilian thy lord, neither wilt thou be to me: and so the hoghead closed fast vp, he was therein rolled vp and downe vntill he therein miserably died.

The emperours campe then lying at RAB, and the Bassa of BVDA and BOSNA with thirtie thousand Turkes not farre off at ALBA REGALIS, and many hot skirmishes passing betweene them: it fortuned that the fift of September the Turkes in hope to haue done some great peece of seruice vpon the Christians, came forth of their campe in great number, and by chance light vpon a few forragers of the armie, of whom they slew some, the rest flying, raised an alarum in the campe: whereupon the Hungarians and Burgundians with some others issuing out, pursuing the Turkes, slew diuers of them: in which pursute George Thuriger, descrying the Gouverneur of ALBA REGALIS, a man in great account, and very inward with Solyman whilest he liued, fiercely pursued him in the midst of the flying enemies, and neuer left him vntill he had taken him prisoner: and at his returne presenting him to the emperor, was for that good seruice knighted, and rewarded with a chaine of gold. There was by chance then present a Spaniard, who had heard him say openly at CONSTANTINOPLE, That he alone with his owne power was able to vanquish the German king (by which name the Turkes commonly tearme the emperor:) With which words when that the Spaniard hardly charged him in the presence of the emperor, still vrging him as it were to say something for himselfe, the Turke answered him in these few words following: Such is the chance of warre, thou seest me now a prisoner, and able to doe nothing.

All these troubles, with many moe like in short time to haue ensued, were by the death of Solyman within a while after well appeased. Muhamet Bassa after he had repaired the breaches, and placed a Turke Gouverneur of SIGETH, with a strong garrison for the defence of the place and commaunding of the countrey, called backe the dispersed forces; and rising with the armie, retired toward BELGRADE, carrying Solyman's dead bodie all the way sitting vp-right

A right in his horfelitter carried by mules, giuing it out that hee was sicke of the gout: which thing the Ianizaries easily beleueed, knowing that hee had beene many yeares so carried: yet still wishing his presence, as vnto them alwayes fortunate, although that he were able for to doe nothing.

Unlike his father, Selymus the royall Scepter takes:
And shaking armes with cruell hand, exceeding stirr he makes.
With VENICE state his league he breaks (with Turks what league can stand)
And CYPRVS kingdome takes from them, by force of mightie hand.
He couered the swelling seas with hugie fleets to see:
That vanquished, vnto those seas he might an honour be.
The Vayvod of MOLDAVIA he brought to wofull end,
The borders of his kingdome great that so he might extend.
In GVLBT he the Spaniards ouerwhelmd with mightie power:
And thereby TUNES kingdome did the selfsame time deuour.
But wholly giuen to venerie, vnto excesse and play,
He posseth on before his time to hast his fatall day.

THE LIFE OF SELYMVS,
THE SECOND OF THAT NAME, FIFT EMPEROVR OF
THE TURKES.

Selymus, the only sonne of Solyman then left aliue, by letters from Muhamet Bassa vnderstanding of the death of his father, hasted from CYTAI, a citie of GALATIA, not farre from ANCYRA, towards CONSTANTINOPLE; and comming to SEVTARIE, was from thence by Bostanges Bassa of the court, conducted ouer the strait to CONSTANTINOPLE: where, by him and Scander Bassa (Selymus his sonne in law, and then Solymans Vicegerent) he was conuained into the imperiall pallace the three and twentieth of September, in the ycare 1566; and there possessed of his fathers seat, was by the Ianizaries there present, saluted emperor. He was about the age of fortie two yeares when he began to raigne, a man of an vnconstant and hastie disposition, wholly giuen to wantonneffe and excesse: so that he neuer went to wars himselfe, but performed them altogether by his lieutenants, contrarie to the charge of Selymus his grandfather, giuen by him to his father Solyman, whereof he was neuer vnmindfull. The next day he came abroad, and shewed himselfe in his maiestie; and in the temple of SOPHIA, after the manner of the Turkish superstition, caused solemne praiers and sacrifices to be made for his father: which done, he gaue vnto the Ianizaries a largesse of 100000 Sultanes, with promise to augment their wages. And all things being now in readinesse for his intended journey, he with a goodly retinue set forward from CONSTANTINOPLE the seauen and twentieth of September: and the twentieth of October a little from BELOGRABE met the armie comming from SORTH, gallantly marching vnder their ensignes, with the dead bodie of Solyman, whom the souldiours generally supposed to haue been yet liuing, but troubled with the gout, to haue kept his horse-litter as his manner was to trauell. Selymus alighting, came in his mourning attire to the horse-litter, looked vpon the dead bodie of his father, kissed it, and wept ouer it, as did all the other great Bassaes also. And that the death of Solyman might then be made knowne to all men, the ensignes were presently let fall, and trailed vpon the ground, a dead march founded, and heauie silence commaunded to be kept through all the campe. Shortly after, Selymus was with the great applause of the whole armie proclaimed emperor, his ensignes aduanced, and euerie one of the great commanders of the armie, in their degree admitted to kisse his hand. So marching forward, he returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE the two and twentieth of Nouember: but thinking to haue entred his pallace (which they commonly call the SERAPENT) he was by the discontented Ianizaries but now come from the wars, prohibited so to do; they with great insolencie demanding of him a greater donatiue, together with the confirmati-on both of their auncient and new priuiledges, before they would suffer him to enter. Against which their so great presumption, the Visier Bassaes, together with the Aga, opposing themselves, and seeking by all means to appease them, were by them fowly intreated and well rapped about the pates with the stocks of their calliars; but especially the two great Bassaes, Muhamet and Pertau, as the chiefe authors that their lord had dealt no more liberally with them. With which so sudden and vnexpected a mutinie of his best souldiours, Selymus not a little troubled, and calling vnto him the Aga (or capitaine of the Ianizaries) demaunded of him the cause thereof: who with teares trickling downe his cheekes for griefe, told him, That it was for money. Which by Selymus now promised vnto them, together with the confirmation of their liberties; and the Aga with faire words and heauie countenance most earnestly entreating them, not to blemish the ancient reputation of their wonted loyaltie with so foule a disorder, nor to expose the life of him their louing capitaine, vnto the heauie displeasure of their angrie Sultan; and farther assuring them, that he would not faile them in the least of his promises, but content them to the full of their desires; the mutinie was at length appeased, the insolent Ianizaries againe quieted, and Selymus into the SERAGLIO receiued. Howbeit Muhamet, chiefe of the Visier Bassas, for certaine daies after went not out of his pallace, neither came (as he was wont) into the DAVANO, but kept himselfe close, for feare of some greater mischief from them. This tumult thus ouerpassed, and all againe well quieted, Selymus with all royall solemnitie buried his father in a chappell which he after the manner of the Mahometane kings, had in his life time most stately built, with a colledge and an hospitall. Where fast by his side is to be seene the tombe of Roxolana his best beloued wife, and of certaine others his murdered children: and by him hangeth his simular, in token that he died in wars; an honour not otherwise granted to the Mahometane princes. The reuenues arising of the countrey about SIGETH of late woon from the Christians, at the time of his death, were giuen to the maintenance of the houses by him built of deuotion; which for the magnificence thereof, exceed all the rest before built by the Mahometane kings and emperours, except those which were the buildings of Mahomet the great, and Baiazer the second. It was by many thought, that Solyman was in good time by death cutt off, as purposing that yeare to haue wintered in HUNGARIE, and the yeare following to haue done great matters against the Christians, both by sea and land.

Hungarie.

The great armie of the Turks thus drawne out of HUNGARIE by the death of Solyman, in some part assuaged, but altogether appeased not the endlesse troubles of that vnfortunate kingdome. Maximilian the emperor on the one side, and John the Vayuod of TRANSILVANIA with the Turks captaines on the other, renting it in pieces, as if they had sworne the destruction thereof. The Vayuod desiring to recouer the strong castle of TOCKAY, in the frontiers of his countrey, but lately taken from him by Suendi the emperours lieutenant, laid hard siege vnto it, and had brought it to great extremitie, although it was notably defended by James Raminger the capitaine thereof: when suddenly newes was brought vnto him, That the Tartars (whom he had called into his countrey to haue aided him against the emperor) did with all hostilitie after their barbarous manner, burne and destroy his countrey before them, making hauocke of all things; so that the countrey people were glad in defence of themselves, to take vp armes against them. Whereupon he forthwith left the siege, and went to aid his distressed subjects against the Tartars, with whom he had many an hoat skirmish; and after much bloodshed, at last ouercame them, and with much adoe rid himselfe of such bad guests. Now in the meane time, Suendi strengthened with new supplies sent vnto him from the emperor, had taken the castle of ZACKMAR in the borders of TRANSILVANIA, and with like good fortune had the castle of MYNCATZ yeilded vnto him, and after that besieged the towne of HVSTH: so that the Vayuod was glad to craue aid of the Turkish emperor Selymus, vnder whose protection he was: who presently commaunded Partau one of his cheefe Bassas, & then his great lieutenant in ROMANIA, to goe with his forces into TRANSILVANIA, to relieue him. But hearing that embassadours were comming from Maximilian the emperor, he called him backe againe, vntill he had heard the effect of that embassage. At which time also the Bassa of BUDA enclining vnto peace, sent presents to the emperor, requesting him to remooue certaine Hungarian captaines from off the frontiers, least happily they should interrupt the treatie of peace, then on both sides purposed; promising for his part to punish with death all such Turkes as should make any further inuasion, or raise any new troubles. He writ letters also to countie Salma, That he could not but maruell, to what end Maximilian the emperor was about to entreat with his lord & master of peace, whilst Suendi in the meane time was raging in TRANSILVANIA, then vnder the Turkes protection; which if he proceeded still to doe, Selymus would thereof take occasion (as he said) to turne all his forces that way: wherefore he requested him to perswade the emperor to take some more easie course in that behalfe, promising also, that he would for his part effectually trauell with his master, to haue better liking of peace than of warres, wishing him also to doe the like. Which thing peace.

A thing as soone as the emperor vnderstood, he commaunded Suendi to giue over the siege of HVSTH, and to keepe himselfe quiet, vntill he might by his embassadours vnderstand what the great Turke purposed, and how he was affected towards peace.

Now in deed these two great princes, Maximilian and Selymus (although they notably differed the matter) were both of them in heart desirous of peace, and that for diuers great and urgent considerations: Maximilian for want of money, saw it not possible for him to send into the field such an armie the next yeare, as he had the yeare before. And Selymus, beside his other troubles, was to take order for the appeasing of a great and dangerous rebellion, in the farthest part of his dominions in ARABIA FELIX; where the people rising vp in armes, and hauing slaine the Bassas and Sanzacks their Gouvernours, were readie to haue cast off the Turkish obedience: neither was he out of feare of the Persians, readie (as was reported) to make warre vpon him. For which causes he wished rather for peace with the emperor Maximilian, than wars: and so much the more, for that it was impossible for him to send an armie of any puissance into HUNGARIE, for want of many necessarie prouisions for the maintenance thereof, in a countrey so much impouerished by reason of the late wars; wherein no victuals were to be found for the reliefe of such a multitude of men as he was to send, if he would doe any good there. And truly it was (as the Turkes themselves afterward reported) that Maximilian with halfe the power he had in field the last yeare, might haue easily recouered the greatest part of that kingdome before lost: but well knowing his owne wants, and ignorant of theirs, he altogether enclining to peace; and by countie Salma aduertised from the Bassa of BUDA, That if he would send embassadours to CONSTANTINOPLE with the tribute wont to be there paid for HUNGARIE, a peace vpon reasonable conditions might be easily obtained; he resolved vpon that point. And so certaine messengers being sent vp and downe to CONSTANTINOPLE to the same effect, it was concluded, That if the emperor would send embassadours to CONSTANTINOPLE with the tribute yerbehind, and a large commission for the treatie of peace, Selymus should giue them his safe conduct, with libertie at their pleasure to returne in case either of peace or warre. Which agreed vpon, and faithfully promised on both sides, Selymus set at libertie the lord Albert de Vuis, who six yeares Lieger in CONSTANTINOPLE, first for the emperor Ferdinand, and after for Maximilian, had now been straightly imprisoned in his owne house by the space of two and twentie moneths, in such sort that neither he nor any of his household could goe abroad, watch and ward being kept both night and day about his house, and his windowes also boorded vp, to the end he should not so much as looke out into the citie or any whither else more than the court of his house onely. So the emperor Maximilian now resolved to send embassadours to CONSTANTINOPLE with the tribute money, and diuers other rich gifts and presents, as well to the great Turke himselfe as the Visier Bassas his counsellors: and considering with himselfe, whom to be most fit with wisdome and honour to bring this so waightie a matter about, hauing to doe with so barbarous, covetous, and mightie a people; made choise of the lord Antonius Veyantius of AGRIA (of his counsell for the kingdome of HUNGARIE) a prelat of great estimation, who being a man of threescore and three yeares old, beside his great learning, had the experience of seauen and twentie embassages; wherein he alwaies so discretely bare himselfe, as well contented his prince, and purchased vnto himselfe the reputation of a most graue and wise man: and about ten yeares before this embassage, being by the emperor Ferdinand sent embassadour to Solyman, and now by Maximilian to Selymus at CONSTANTINOPLE, returning thence with good successe, was by the emperor created a prince of the empire, and bishop of AGRIA. Vnto which so honourable personage, hauing the charge of this so waightie a matter, the emperor the more to ennoble this embassage, as also to purchase the greater credit to his embassadour, joynd vnto him a most honourable Baron, called the lord Christopher Tensfenbach of STIRIA, one of his counsellours also for the wars; who with full instructions both taking their leaue of the emperor (then holding a parliament at PRESBURG) departed: and being attended vpon with a great and honourable retinue, set forward the first of Iuly 1567, and so came to COPMARA a strong towne in HUNGARIE, not past a league from the Turkes frontiers. In which place the embassadours staying vntill the seauenth of Iuly; in the meane time gaue knowledge of their comming vnto the Gouvernor of STRIGONIVM, demanding for their securitie in the enemies countrey, to be met and receiued by some of his garrison: which granted, they tooke their barkes brought from VIENNA and POSSONIVM, sufficient for their greameste to haue carried them them downe the riuier to BELGRADE, with horse and wagon and their whole furniture: and so entring vpon the Turkes dominion about a league or a little more from COMARA; being so farre waisted by the fouldiours and gallies of COMARA, they were met by an Aga of the Turkes with a Chiaus called Beccam (sent by the Bassa of BVDA) in certaine gallies armed with Turkish fouldiours. To whom the embassadour at his landing deliuered his mind, and afterward his person, giuing them to vnderstand, that they were with all safetie to conduct both him and all his to the Bassa of BVDA; which they answered, they were readie to accomplish: and so courteously innited by the embassadours, they came aboard their barke, and there dined all together. Here they that were sent with them, leauing them in the hands of the Turkes (hauing licence to depart) returned to COMARA: and they that day after fise leagues sailing arriued at STRIGONVM, where they were by the Gouverneur of the citie denied landing: for which so dishonourable a part, he was afterward sharply rebuked by the Bassa of BVDA. Yet as they lay that night vpon the water, certaine Turkish minstrels, to doe them honour and to get a largesse, with their barbarous bawling instruments plaid them vp many an homely fit of mirth: and diuers others with sundrie sorts of vaulting and tumbling, sometime leaping one vpon anothers shoulders, and sometime doing their tricks on the earth, all the euening shewed them great sport and pastime. From STRIGONVM they with fise leagues sayling came to BVDA, leauing behind them the castle of VICEGRADE, two leagues distant from STRIGONVM. In this citie of BVDA lieth the great Bassa, by whom all HUNGARIE, with the prouinces thereto belonging (in the Turkes power) is gouerned. This citie, sometime the regall seat of the Hungarian kings, is situate vpon a little hill on the Southside of Danubius, hauing in the South point thereof a castle, much higher than the citie, and of a most braue prospect: in which castle lieth a capitaine with a garrison of fise hundred fouldiours (as the Turkes say) howbeit it is thought that they are not altogether so many: it is the losse of his head to stir out of his charge; and beside, he hath commission to denie the Bassa himselfe entrance, vnlesse he come verie sleightly accompanied: so jealous are the Turkes of that castle, as if the state of HUNGARIE depended thereon. Herein standeth the kings pallace, which taketh vp most part of the place, greatly beautified by king Matthias, and shewing outwardly to haue been a verie stately thing: for there are in it both large hals and faire galleries, and chambers built in most royall manner; where amongst other roomes, the embassadours found a decayed librarie full of pictures and Latine titles of bookes: all which things, when they present themselues vnto the eies of the Christian beholders, offer a just consideration of noble and reuerend antiquitie, and withall, strike into their hearts a certaine compassion joyed with horror, to see the renowned glorie of so many great kings, all waisted and brought to nothing. The next morning, the embassadours went to speake with the Bassa: whose house was reasonable faire (considering their guise and custome, not much delighting in the beautie of their priuat buildings) situate vpon the riuers side, at the bottome of the hill whereon the citie standeth. Vnto this Bassa the embassadours presented two faire gilt cups, a clocke all curiously wrought in gold, and a thousand dollars: which present the Bassa receiued in his Diuano (being a large hall) where he sat with his counsellours, officers, and other Turkes in their places and order; some on his right hand, and others on his left, all richly attired in garments of silke of diuers colours and fashions, reaching downe to their ancles after their manner; their heads covered with their passing white and well made Turbants: in which assembly, nothing being to be seene but goodly order and graue silence, they seemed to the strange beholders, so many counsellours of exceeding grauitie and reputation. Round about the hall wherein the embassadours had audience, were many seats couered with Turkie carpets; the rest of the roome being all vacant. The Bassa in a place more appariant than the rest, sitting in great maiestie: before whom were set two little chaires, on which (after he had stood vp a while and embraced the embassadours) he caused them both to sit downe. Whose speech deliuered in the Italian tongue (after they had discharged themselues of the emperours letters and greetings) was to this effect, viz: That his imperiall maiestie (for the common benefit of their subjects in HUNGARIE) requested him to continue in his good purpose and dealing for peace: and further, to giue safe conduct vnto them his embassadours with their retinue, vntill they were come vnto the Turkes court, where they were to entertaine and conclude a peace, to the ending of all troubles, and the publike benefit of their subjects in generall. Which speech, with cheertull and friendly countenance ended, many of the embassadours followers were admitted to kisse the Bassas hand, accounted no small fauor amongst those those Barbarians. The interpretour of these things was a Jew of PAVIA, who declared all that was spoken, in the Turkish language vnto the Bassa, and in the Italian vnto the embassadours. And although (if it had been their pleasure) they might haue told their mind each to other in the Sclauonian tongue, without an interpretour: yet the Bassa standing more vpon his reputation, and for some other respects beside, would haue the matter propounded, and likewise answered in the Turkish. In which sort they also conferred continually afterward with the Bassas at CONSTANTINOPLE, vnlesse it were in some particular and priuat talke of small importance, or else in some point beside the matter; for then the interpretours spake in the Crouatian or Sclauonian tongue, which is familiar to most of the Turkes, but especially to the men of warre. Before this hall where the embassadours were entertained by the Bassa; in the base court stood all the Ianizaries in goodly array, and his slaues with their red zarcull on their heads, and other fouldiours with high and long plumes of feathers standing vpright: all which made a beautifull shew, and gaue all great grace to the Bassas court: these men stirre not one foot in their standings, and if the consultation doe last foure houres long, so long are they to continue standing without mouing. The embassadours hauing staid two daies at BVDA, were by the Bassa dismissed, sending with them his Checai (the Steward or gouernour of his house) a man of great reputation, and Beccam the Chiaus (the same that came to meet them at COMARA) with a sufficient guard, and certaine Ianizaries, sent for their more safe traouelling, and to prouide for them from place to place of all things necessarie for their diet, as also for their horses, at the Turkes charges. And thus accompanied, they embarked the tenth day of the aforesaid moneth, towed vp by the Turkes gallies, which holpen by the swiftnesse of the riuier, carried them down in eight daies to BELGRADE, where they arriued the eighteenth of July. So hauing staid at BELGRADE, and there leauing their boats, and taking their coaches, they set forward by land the twentieth of the said moneth, and with great paines traouelling through RASCIA, BVLGARIA, and THRACIA, and passing a part of the great mountaine SCARPVS, and after that the mountaine RHODOPVS, so by the way of PHILIPPOPOLIS and HADRIANOPLE, the two and twentieth of August gathered fast vpon CONSTANTINOPLE: where many of the Spahies and Chiausais of the court, with a number of the Ianizaries and other fouldiours, for their greater honor came to meet them a great way without the citie. By whom the embassadours honourably mounted on horsebacke, were by them conducted to their lodging appointed for them about the middest of the citie: where the lord Albert de Vais the emperours embassadour Lieger (not long before enlarged) hauing long looked for their comming, now most joyfully receiued them. It was then Friday the Turkes Sabaoth, and a day of them aboue all other daies in the weeke regarded, and about ten of the clocke two houres before noone; at which time the embassadours were no sooner alighted, but that Selymus going to heare the ceremonies of his religion, in the Moschie of his father Solyman (as his manner was sometime to doe) passed along before the gate where the embassadours lay, with the whole traine of his court; and peraduenture somewhat more than ordinarie, to shew the magnificence of his power and state, to the end that the embassadours (about the former opinion by them conceiued) might hold him in the reputation of a most puissant and mightie monarch. He passing by, vouchsafed not once to giue them a regard, or so much as to cast his eye aside vpon them, although they were strangers, and but euen then arriued: but with a countenance, as if he had knowne not so much as nothing of their comming, held on his way as it lay. But Muhamet the chiefe Visier Bassa, with the other Bassas and great courtiers, in most gracious manner as they passed by, cast their eies vpon them; all the courtiers they could then shew them. Six daies after, being the eight and twentieth of August, the embassadours all three went to visit and salute Muhamet (or as the Turkes call him Mehemet) the chiefe Visier Bassa, as the manner was, presenting him from the emperour with foure cups of siluer all gilt, of most faire and curious workmanship; of which two of them being greater than the other, were three spans high, the other two being not so high by a span, but hauing in them two thousand duckats of gold; beside which they gaue him also a clocke, being a most curious piece of worke, and all ouer double gilt. After which greetings and presents deliuered, beside the contents of his maiesties letters, they declared vnto him in generall points, the cause of their comming, and the mind of the emperour well disposed to a peace; and what great benefit would arise thereby to both the parties; and lastly turning ouer the blame of the late warres, and laying the fault thereof to the charge of others, sweetned thereby the sower of their former dealings. embassadours

likewise for his part to seeke of good words, but answered them in Turkish by the mouth of Hibram the cheefe Dragoman, who deliuered his mind to them in Latin or Italian, accordingly as the embassadours had before vntered theirs: which parle so ended, certaine of the cheefe of the embassadours followers were admitted into the Diuano to kisse the proud Bassaes hand. The same day the embassadours also saluted Partau the second Bassa, and Ferat the third in order and authoritie. To Partau they presented two cups of siluer all gilt, beside a clock of the same making with the abouenamed, and two thousand dollars: and the like to Ferat. The next day they went to visit the other three Bassaes, Acomat, Piall, and Muhamet, presenting euery one of them with two faire cups, and a thousand dollars: These were the six Visier Bassaes to Selymus, then lying at Court with him, men that for wealth and authoritie went before all other in the Turkish empire, as in the course of this historie may appeare. And so hauing visited them in generall, the embassadours to set their affaires on foot, the fourth of September closed with Muhamet, to whom the ordering of state-matters was especially committed. Yet after this first conference, because it was necessarie before so weightie affaires were broached, first to doe the Great Turke reuerence, and to deliuer the presents, with the emperours letters to him written; for some few dayes there was not any point at all of the embassadours businesse handled.

Selymus not long after the embassadours were arrived; went out for his disport and pleasure on hunting: so that in the meane time (after the presents were giuen to the Bassaes) matters stood still altogether vnaduauced, vntill the one and twentieth of September: and that day (Selymus being now returned from his disport) it was appointed that the embassadours should haue audience at the Court. Whereupon they made choice out of their followers of those that should attend vpon them, which were not in all about twelue persons: For they to whom this charge was committed, said it was neither the manner nor yet meet that any great traine should come before so great a prince; and that they might not bring with them about that number: whereupon they appointed but six a peece to attend them: and of fiftene cups all of siluer and gilt, being most curiously and cunningly engrauen, one of the fairest among the rest was giuen to each of those twelue to carrie, and they ordered to goe by two and two before the rest that came after in order with the rest of the present: which was two exceeding pretious Clockes, like in bignesse to them before giuen to the Bassaes, but far about them in value; and five and fortie thousand Dollars for the tribute behind and yet vnpayed. The greatest of those cups was six spans and an halfe, and the least two spans in height: some of them being double cups after the high Dutch manner.

The embassadours (whose comming a great multitude of the Ianizaries attended below at the gate of their lodging: beside many of the Spahies and Chiauffs, and others of good sort, which were come to honour them with their presence to the pallasce) putting themselves in readinesse betimes in the morning, and taking horse, set forward toward the Court. The foremost were they that did beare the present in their hands, the people of the citie in euery street flocking together in exceeding multiitudes to behold them as they passed: and verily there had been seldome times seene the like embassage in those parts. For besides the fame that was blowne abroad in euery quarter, That they were men sent from one of the greatest princes of Christendome; the diuersitie of their attire (so few as they were) more than any thing beside, did represent the maiestie of the Christian emperour to them that gazed vpon his embassadours and their traine, the people conceiuing thereby that he was lord and ruler of many prouinces and countries. For they that were Hungarians belonging to the bishop of Agria (the cheefe embassadour) being attired in long and sober garments of very fine purple cloth, hauing their shooes pickt ouer the soles with yron plates, and halfe of their heads shauen, seemed to differ from them but little. But on the other side the high Dutch attired in blacke, with their veluet caps, and short cloakes layed with siluer lace, and long breeches little lesse than Rutter wile, and chaines of gold about their neckes, appeared very strange and vncomely to the Turkish people: and so accompanied in this honourable wise, the embassadours entred the first gate of the Great Turke's pallasce. This gate is built of marble in most sumptuous manner, and of a stately height, with certaine words of their language in the front thereof engrauen and gilt in marble. So passing through the base Court, which hath on the right side very faire gardens, and on the left side diuers buildings serving for other offices, with a little Moschie; they came to the second gate, where all such as come in riding, must of necessity alight. Here so soon as they were entred in at this second gate, they came into a very large square Court, with buildings and galleries round about it, the kitchens standing on the right hand, with other lodgings for such as belonged to the Court, and on the left hand likewise roomes deputed to like seruices. There are moreover many halls and other roomes for resort, where they sit in counsell handling and executing the publike affaires either of the Court or of the Empire, with other matters, where the Bassaes and other officers assemble together. Enting in at this second gate, in one part of the Court, which seemed rather some large street, they saw the whole company of the Solaches set in a goodly ranke; which are archers keeping alwayes neere vnto the person of the Great Turke, and seruing as his footmen when he rideth: they vse high plumes of feathers, which are set bolt vpright ouer their foreheads. In another place there stood the Capitzi in like array, with blacke staues of Indian canes in their hands: they are the porters and warders at the gates of the pallasce, not much differing in their attire from the Ianizaries; who stood in ranke likewise in another quarter. And beside all those, with many more that were out of order, as well of the Court as of the common people, those knights of the Court which accompanied the embassadours thither, with other great ones also of like degree, were marshalled all in their severall companies. And among the rest, the Mutfarachas, men of all nations and all religions (for their valour the only freemen which liue at their owne libertie in the Turkish empire) stood there apparrelled in damaske, veluet, and cloth of gold, and garments of silke of sundrie kinds and colours: their pompe was great, and the greater, for the turbans that they wore vpon their heads, being as white as whitenesse it selfe, made a most braue and goodly shew well worth the beholding. In breefe, whether they were to be considered all at once, or in particular, as well for the order that they kept, as for their sumptuous presence, altogether without noyse or tumult; they made the embassadours and the rest of their followers there present, eye witnesses both of their obedience, and of the great state and royaltie of the Othoman Court. Passing through them, the embassadours were led into the hall, where the Bassaes and other great men of the Court were all readie to giue them entertainment: they of their traine being at the same time brought into a room that stood a part vnder one of the aforesaid lodgings all hung with Turke carpets. Soone after (as their vse and manner is) they brought in their dinner, cowering the ground with table clothes of a great length, spread vpon carpets; and afterward scattering vpon them a maruellous number of wooden spoons, with so great store of bread, as if they had beene to feed three hundred persons: then they set on meat in order, which was serued in two and fortie great platters of earth, full of rice porrage of three or foure kinds, differing one from another; some of them seasoned with hony, and of the colour of hony; some with soure milke, and white of colour; & some with sugar: they had fritters also which were made of like batter; and mutton beside, or rather a daintie and toothsome morzell of an old sodden Ewe. The table (if there had any such beene) thus furnished, the guests without any ceremonie of washing sat downe on the ground (for stooles there was none) and fell to their victuall, and dranke out of great earthen dishes, water prepared with sugar, which kind of drinke they call Zerbet. But so hauing made a short repast, they were no sooner risen, but certaine young men whom they call Giamogians, with others that stood round about them, snatcht it hastily vp as their fees, and like greedie Harpies rauened it downe in a moment. The embassadours in the meane time dined in the hall with the Bassaes. And after dinner certaine of the Capitzi were sent for the twelue of the embassadours followers, before appointed to do the great Sultan reuerence: by whom (their presents being already conueied away) they were remooued out of the place where they dined, and brought on into an vnder room, from whence there was an ascent into the hall, where the Bassaes were staying for the embassadours: who soone after came forth, and for their ease sat them downe vpon the benches, whiles the Bassaes went in to Selymus; who before this time had made an end of dinner, and was remooued in all his royaltie into one of his chambers; expecting the comming of the embassadours. All things now in readinesse, and the embassadours sent for, they set forward with their traine, and came to the third gate which leadeth into the priue pallasce of the Turkish emperour, where none but himselfe, his eunuchs, and the young pages his minions, being in the eunuchs custodie, hath continuall abiding: into which inward part of the pallasce none entrech but the Capitzi Bassa (who hath the keeping of this third gate) & the Cefig-niers (that serue in the Great Turke's meat) with the Bassaes and some few other great men; and that onely when they haue occasion so to doe by reason of some great businesse, or sent for by the Sultan. Being entered in at this gate, which is of a stately and royall building, the Capitzi by whom they were conducted, suddenly caused them to stay, and set them one from another about five paces; in a little roome, which neuertheless was pasing delicate, all curiously painted ouer with diuers colours, and stood betwene the gate and the more inner lodgings. On both sides of which roome, when all things els were whist and in a deepe silence, certaine little birds onely were heard to warble out their sweet notes, and to flicker vp and downe the greene trees of the gardens (which all along cast a pleasant shaddow from them) as if they alone had obtained licence to make a noise. Selymus himselfe was in great majestic set in an vnder chamber, parted onely with a wall from the roome wherein the embassadours followers attended, wherinto he might looke through a little window, the portall of his said chamber standing in counterpoint with the third gate aboue mentioned. The embassadours entering in, were led single and one after another, to make their reuerence vnto the Great Turke. And in the meane time certaine of the Capitzi with the presents in their hands fetching a compass about before the window, mustered them in his sight. All this while not the least sound in the world being raised, but a sacred silence kept in euery corner, as if men had been going to visit the holiest place in HERUSALEM. Yet for all that the embassadours followers placed one from another (as is aforesaid) were not aware that the great Sultan was so neere, looking still when they should haue beene led on forwards all together: howbeit, they were set in one after another: neither did they that were so set out, returne againe into the roome; but hauing seuerally done their reuerence, were all (except the embassadours, that still stayed in the chamber) by one and one sent out another way into the Court: neither could he that came after see his fellow that went before him, after he was once taken in to doe his reuerence: but suddenly as the former was let out, the next was aduanced forward to the dore, where Isman the Capitzi-Bassa & the Odda-Bassa taking him by both arms and by the necke, the one at his right hand, and the other at his left, and so leading him apace, by the way softly felt his wrests with their hands, least peraduenture he might haue some short weapon in his sleue. Yet were they not all thus groped, as Marc Antonio Pigafetta, the reporter of this negotiation, sayth of himselfe and some others also. Howbeit this hath beene (and yet is) the manner of giuing of access vnto the person of the Great Turke, euer since that Amurath the first was after the battell of CASSOVA murdered by one of Lazarus the Despots men, who admitted to his presence (in reuenge of the wrong done vnto his master) with a short poynard that he had closely hidden about him, so stabbed him in the bellie that he presently died. And thus like men rather carried to prison by sergeants, than to the presence of so mightie a Monarch, they were presented vnto his majestie: he sitting vpon a pallet, which the Turkes call Mastabe, K vsed by them in their chambers to sleepe and to feed vpon, couered with carpets of silke, as was the whole floore of the chamber also. The chamber it selfe being not very great, was but darke, altogether without windowes, excepting that one whereof we haue before spoken: and hauing the wals painted and set out in most fresh and liuely colours by great cunning, and with a most delicat grace: yet vse they neither pictures nor the image of any thing in their painting. The six Visier Bassaes (before mentioned) were standing on the left hand as they entred in at the chamber dore one by another in one side of the chamber, and the embassadours on the right hand on the other side, standing likewise, and vncouered. The Dragomans were in another part of the chamber, neere the place where the Sultan sat gorgeously attired in a robe of cloth of gold, all embrodered with jewels: when as the embassadours followers by one and one brought before him (as is aforesaid) and kneeling on the ground, a Turke standing on his right side, with all reuerence taking vp the hemme of his garment, gaue it them in their hands to kisse. Selymus himselfe all this while sitting like an image without mouing, and with great state and majestic keeping his countenance, dained not to giue them one of his looks. This done, they were led backe againe, neuer turning their backs towards him, but going still backwards, vntill they were out of his presence. So after they had all thus made their reuerence, and were departed out of the chamber, the embassadours deliuered vnto Selymus the emperours letters, and briefly declared vnto him their message: whom he answering in foure words, as, That they were to conferre with his Bassaes: presently they were dismissed. And so comming out of the two inner gates, they mounted on horsebacke, and tooke the way leading towards their lodging, being at their returne accompanied with the whole order of the Ianizaries, with their Aga, and other capitaines: among whom were certaine of their religious men called Haagi (which vse to follow the Ianizaries) who continually turning about, and in their going, singing or rather howling out certain Psalmes and prayers for the welfare of their Great Sultan, gaue the embassadours and their followers occasion to wonder.

The embassadours brought in vnto Selymus, with the manner of the entertainments of them and their followers.

Itinerario Di Marc Antonio Pigafetta. ca. 5.

A wonder, that they either left not for wearinesse, or fell not downe like noddies for giddinesse. All these were sent, the more honourably to accompanie the embassadours to their lodging: and beside these, many more on horsebacke than attended them at their fourth comming: in regard whereof, the embassadours when they were come to their lodging, to requite their greedie courtesie, frankly distributed amongst them aboue foure thousand dollars, and yet well contented them not.

The embassadours after this entertainment at Court, had diuers times conference with the great Bassaes concerning peace, as Selymus had commaunded: wherein by reason of the Turkes vnreasonable demands (as their manner is at their first meetings) nothing could be as then concluded: so that Selymus himselfe being shortly after to depart for HADRIANOPE, where he was to continue for some moneth (but rather as it was thought for that they could not agree vpon a point of great consequence) the treatie for peace was intermitted, vntill such time as a messenger dispatched in post, might returne vnto the Turkes Court with some resolute answer concerning that matter. So it was, that during the reigne of the late emperour Eerdinand, that the Turke his subjects in HUNGARIE payed all their taxes and tributes vnto their old lords and masters, abiding and liuing in the emperours iurisdiction, as did the subjects of Ferdinand to their lords that dwelt in the Turkes dominion and territories: Now in this treatie for peace, the Turkes (amongst other their vnreasonable requests) demanded to haue their subjects freed, and yet the subjects of the emperour to pay as they were before accustomed. Which as it was a request nothing indifferent, so was it no lesse prejudiciall and hurtfull vnto the emperour, his subjects in HUNGARIE: for which cause the embassadours would not by any means consent thereunto, before they knew the emperours farther pleasure concerning the same. Whereupon they dispatched one Sig. Odoardo a gentleman of MANTVA, very skilfull in the Turkish language and in such like affaires, by reason that as well about this businesse as at diuers times before about other the like, he had beene employed from VIENNA to CONSTANTINOPLE in the emperours seruice. So Selymus shortly after, viz. the twentieth of October, departing from CONSTANTINOPLE, in great magnificence passed by the gate where the embassadours lay, with his whole Court in armes, and in the same order that is vsually kept when he goeth to warre or taketh any great journey. After whose departure the embassadours hauing sufficiently viewed the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, and then at good leisure, to passe the time and to see the countries they had so often both heard and read of, together with the ports and hauens on both sides that narrow sea which deuideth EVROPE from ASIA, embarking themselves, and crossing the mouth of the haven betwixt CONSTANTINOPLE and PERRA, passed all alongst the coast on EVROPE side vnto the Euxine or blacke sea, and so backe againe by the other side of that straight sea: curiously noting the great ruines of the ancient cities of BITHYNIA, with some others alongst the Asian shore, together with the pleasant situation they in former times had, whilst they yet flourished in their glorie, but now for most part (or rather altogether) laied in the dust & brought to nought: and so returned againe to CONSTANTINOPLE. But whilst they thus deceived the time, and lay long expecting the returne, as well of their owne messenger sent vnto the emperour, as of Selymus himselfe: they were aduertised in all hast to repaire vnto him to HADRIANOPE, whether the aforesaid messenger was now come with full instructions of all things concerning the treatie for peace. For which cause they with great speed making themselves ready, and taking their leaue of Piall Bassa (who for that he was Selymus his great Admirall, then lay at CONSTANTINOPLE) set forward the first of Ianuarie in the yeare 1568: and so after nine dayes travel at length arrived at HADRIANOPE about an hundred fiftie three Italian miles distant from CONSTANTINOPLE. Here they stayed vntill the peace was concluded, which was the seventeenth of Februaire: the cheefe capitulations whereof were, That either of those great princes should still hold what they had got each from the other in the late warres, That the emperour should yearely pay thirtie thousand ducats to the Turkish Sultan, as a tribute for HUNGARIE, should the Turke should pay nothing to the subjects of the emperour, neither the emperours anything to the Turkes, but to be both of those payments free. And that vpon these conditions there should be a firme & sure peace betwixt these two great Monarchs for eight years next following: where in the Vayvod of TRANSILVANIA was (as the Turkes tributarie) to be also comprehended. Neuertheless, all things at this time thus agreed vpon, the Turkes after their subtile manner finishing ding sundry cauillations, and raising many doubts about the aforelaid capitulations, did what they might to haue in some part altered what they had before agreed vpon, to the bettering of themselves and the hurt of the Christians: and so with many their ynreasonable demaunds stayed the departure of the embassadours vntill the twentieth of March following. At which time hauing their dispatch, and taking their leaue of the Great Turke and the Bassaes, accompanied with Hebraim-Beg (Selymus his embassadour vnto the emperour) they by land returned towards Vienne: where they with the joyfull newes of peace the tenth of May arriued, being there two daies after at the Court most honourably receiued. And fise daies after audience was giuen vnto the Turke embassadours, who well heard, and better rewarded, shortly after returned with a full conclusion of peace from the emperour to CONSTANTINOPLE.

Embassadours sent from Tamas
the Persian king to Selymus.

But whilest this peace was thus in concluding, and the embassadours yet resident at HADRIANOPLE, the sixteenth of Februarie came an honourable embassage from Schach Tamas the Persian king vnto the Great Sultan Selymus, to entreat a peace betwixt them, or rather to conclude the same, being before agreed vpon the controuersies, for which they afterwards fell to open war. Which embassage for that it is no lesse truly than plainly set downe in a letter sent from ERZIRVM (a cite then in the confines of the Turke dominions towards the Persians) written by a Chiaus to Muhamet cheefe of the Visier Bassaes; which Chiaus was of purpose sent from CONSTANTINOPLE, to meet the said Persian embassadour: I thought it not amisse for the better vnderstanding thereof, to set downe the effect of the same letter as it was translated out of the Turkish into the Italian by the emperours embassadours interpreter.

The effect of the letter written to Muhamet Bassa, the cheefe Visier, by a Chiaus sent of purpose to meet the Persian Embassadour.

After due salutations, this is the effect of that which we thought good to make knowne vnto your lordship. Now at this present (to wit in the beginning of the month Giunna Sulacchir) is in good health arriued the embassadour of Persia, the kings cheefe counsellour, called * Schach Culi Soltan, attended vpon with a hundred and twentie gentlemen, with guilt turbants on their heads, & well furnished with spare horses led in mens hands. Besides whom he was accompanied also with two hundred knights all apparrelled in cloth of gold, with foure hundred Persian marchants, in all about seuen hundred persons; with a thousand nine hundred beasts, cammels, mules, and horses; five couple of drums, euery couple being placed vpon a severall cammell, five Nacars, three trumpets, five flutes, and other instruments, in all about thirtie musitions, playing vpon these instruments: There were also two quersisters or chaunters of the Alcoran, one Organist, one playing vpon a Turkish instrument like a Lute, two players vpon Sagbuts, with two other musitions, eight in all. There were also foure bondwomen serving in the embassadours owne chamber. Who when he was with all this magnificent pompe come within one dayes journey of ERZIRVM, the * Sayms and Spabies assembling themselves together to the number of eight thousand men, went to meet him: amongst whom were an hundred and more, all apparrelled in cloth of gold and sattin: two thousand men with guilt morrions on their heads: in which brauerie we marching forward, the Persian embassadour amazed to see so great maiestie and pompe, said that all the armie of CONSTANTINOPLE was come to meet him: and so being come into the cite, caused all the instruments to be played vpon, euen from morning vntill night. The next morning the embassadour inuited the Bassa with all the lords and officers, who being come, he entreated them to heare his musike: and in like manner the lord Bassa inuited the Persians. But as the embassadour was going to the banquet, came another Sultan of the kings, who brought to the same embassadour a guilt Turbant, and a rich gowne wrought with gold, which he caused him to put on by the way. By this embassadour the Persian king hath sent all the armour of Sultan Baiazet, with all his cammels and other wealth. The causes of the long stay of this embassadour were specially two: the one for that the Persian king had caused to be made two pavilions of one peece, the curtains being interlaced with gold, and the supporters imbrodered with the same: Besides this, he sent two bookes of histories, and two pearles, which in weight weighed ten * Mescali: one Balasso as big as a little pearle, four score, and two times an hundred * Tumenich of stuffe, amounting to foure score and two summes of Alpers, and fortie Falcons: all which the Persian king hath sent vnto the Great Sultan, as to the onely Monarch and Patrone of the world. This Schach Culi is the next in authoritie to the king, and so was in the

* Schach Culi Soltan was not the proper name of this embassadour, but a title of honour, and signifies as much as a prince servant to the king.

* Sayms are soldiers of greater honour than the Spahis, being for their stipend yearly 2000 Alpers at the least, and of the revenues of certain towns and villages.

* Tumenich is invale as much as the Turkish Alper.

A time of the great king Hylnaell: These two Persian Sultans are the kings cheefe Sultans and courtiers, and therefore set themselves forth with all the pompe they can. Yet notwithstanding all their brauerie, being come to ERZIRVM within the view of our armie, the Persians were amazed to behold the goodly order of the Othomans. One part of these Persians are returned againe into PERSIA. And if it please God at the coming of my messenger vnto you, your lordship shall vnderstand of what condition and state these two princes and Sultans are. They haue each of them yearly six Tumenich: which maketh after the computation of the Othomans, six thousand Alpers. Your lordship after this account may iudge of the rest. The other cause of the long stay of this embassadour, was for that in SIRVAN the people were up in rebellion, wherein many of them were slaine: to the appeasing of which sedition, this Schach Culi was sent, and now at last is come. From ERZIRVM in the beginning of the moneth of * Giunna Sulacchir, in the yeare of the Prophet Mahomet 975.

* December.

This the Persian embassadour was with the greatest pompe that might be entertained by the Turks at his first coming to HADRIANOPLE, all the brave Courtiers with the Janizaries and other souldiours of the Court going forth in most seemely order to meet him. VVho now entered the cite, and come before the house where the emperours embassadours then lay, and seeing certaine of their retinue before the dore, asked of Isnam the Capiti Bassa, what people they were? who told him that they were the followers of an embassadour that there lay, sent from one of the greatest princes of the Christians, namely the emperour, who was desirous to make peace with the Great Sultan his master. VVhereunto the embassadour replied, That he would willingly salute them: which Isnam hearing, straightway turned his horse towards the place where they stood. Now the emperours embassadour being secret within a lattise, and seeing him come towards them, went forth and stood vpon the dore threshold, and so with signes and words saluted one another. Amongst the others the Persian embassadour said vnto the emperours, That he would gladly talke with them, if it might so please the Grand Signior: Hebraim the Dragoman who then was with the emperours embassadours, being interpreter. So hauing courteously saluted one the other, they departed, but neuer after came together. Two dayes after the Persian embassadours (according to the manner of those barbarous nations, who with emptie hands salute not one another) by his Cheeai or steward of his household, presented all the Visier Bassaes with diuers rich gifts and presents, euery one of them according to their degrees and places. And

D the day after went himselfe to visit them: where by the way fell out a strange matter, like y enough to haue cost him his life. For a Giamoglan (as the embassadour was going to visit Muhamet the cheefe of the Visier Bassaes for the first meeting him, shot at him with an harquebush, with purpose to haue slaine him; but as God would, misled him, and hurt but one of his theefe followers in the arme. VVherewith the embassadour not a little dismayed, as supposing himselfe to haue bene betrayed, turning his horse, was about to haue gone to his lodging: but the great Bassa in the meane time hauing knowledge thereof, presently sent out men to guard him, and to excuse himselfe of the fact. VVherof the embassadour being assured, held on his way. In the meane space the fellow who shot the harquebush, being apprehended, was brought before the embassadour and the Bassa: who asking him for what cause he discharged the shot against the embassadour, he without change of countenance boldly answered, That he did it for no other cause but for that the embassadour was an hereticke, and sent from an hereticall king, and an enemy to their religion: and therefore that it was not conuenient he should come to entreat of peace with his lord, adding further, that he was not worthe of any peace. VVhich the Bassa hearing, adjudged the desperate villaine the next day to be drawne at an horse taile through the cite, & then to haue his right hand cut off, and afterward his head, which was accordingly put in execution. After this the Persian embassadour the two and twentieth of the same moneth went to deliuer the presents sent from his master vnto the Grand Signior, and so to kisse his hand, sending first before him the presents vpon foure and fortie cammels, whereof foure and thirtie were the kings of PERSIA, and the other ten his owne. The kings present was an Alcoran, with the authoritie of ALL, as they hold. For this is their custome, alwayes to present one such Alcoran vnto the princes to whom they send their embassadours. It was couered with gold, and garnished with most pretious stones: He presented also a booke of histories, couered as the other: hee gaue also a box, wherein was a very faire pretious stone called Balasso, and two pearles of a wonderfull greatnesse, with two pusses of an handfull long, full of jewels. Besides these, he presented also eight Fituari or Porcellane dishes dishes (which we call China dishes) made of most pure earth; kept aboue fiftie yeares buried vnder the ground, to the end so to be fined and purified, which (as some say) will melt and disolue if any poison be put into them. He gaue also two most stately pauillions, twentie great carpets of silke, and many other lesfer of silke and gold; also nine faire canopies to hang ouer the ports of their pauillions, things not vsed among the Christians. He gaue also nine very faire carpets of Camels haire, nine saddles set with stone after the Persian fashion, seuen staues of siluer, seuen scimitars with red scabers, seuen bowes with arrowes and quiuers, all wrought with gold and precious stone; he presented also many other carpets called Tefich, made of the finest lawne, and so large, that seuen men could scarcely carrie one of them. All the Faulcons were dead by the way.

The presents which the embassadour gaue vnto the great Turke in his owne name, were also these: an Alcoran, a pauillon faire and large, certaine scimitars, bowes and arrowes richly garnished, with certaine carpets of silke, and camels haire. After which presents so deliuered, and reuerence done vnto the great Sultan by the embassadour, and thirtie of his followers all in cloth of gold; he returned to his lodging, verie honourably accompanied, as well by the Turkes as them of his owne retinue. First besides many others, there were a great companie of the Spahies and Chiaufies, and other courtiers mounted vpon goodly horses, well furnished and in decent order: here might a man haue scene store of cloth of gold, veluet, damaske, and other kinds of silke. After these there followed about three hundred Persian horsemen, apparelled after their manner, some with gowns made of diuers litle pieces of taffata of sundry colours, representing the pictures of men, women, horses, and other beafts; and some of them imbrodered with flowres and fruits of sundrie sorts; some had also gownes of cloth of gold, but not so faire as the Turkes; and some of veluet, but verie few of cloth: for that the Persians haue no great plentie either of veluet or yet of cloth, except such as they haue from the Portingals that trauell into those Easterne countries; yet of silke and wool it appeareth they haue great plentie, most part of their gownes being of wool quilted with bombast. After these horsemen followed many Persian footmen, peraduenture all seruants; after whom came the Turkish horsemen: and last of all came a horse of the embassadours led by a Persian; after which horse followed two hundred Ianizaries: and in the rearward of all came the embassadour alone, gorgeously attired both himselfe and his horse. He himselfe was inuested with crimosin veluet, mingled with some other colours: his saddle and bridle were all bedeckt with jewels; the caparison of his horse, was all imbrodered with Turquoises and other pretious stones: the horne vpon the top of his Turbant (which the Turkes call Meteoruncchia) was altogether wrought with gold, and set with pretious stones: in briefe, vpon euery part of his bodie hanged jewels of great price. After the embassadour, followed about an hundred and fortie Persian horsemen, and others of his court apparelled as before, some well, some ill, according to their abilitie. Now although the Persians (as is to be thought) shewed all their pompe, yet they made nothing so faire: a shew as did the Turkes: neither are they so faire men of complexion, being for the most part of a swart and browne colour, and rather little men than otherwise, not much vnlike to the Spaniards. The embassadour being departed, the presents were all brought and shewed to Selymus, who allowed for their ordinarie charges five hundred ducats a day, for that in deed their number was great, and their beafts many. These expenses bestowed vpon the embassadours, doe presently begin as soone as any of them enter into his dominions; and end, so soone as the businesse for which they come is finished. But long it was not, but that this embassadour hauing concluded a peace betwixt the two great princes, Tamur and Selymus, and dispatched such matters as he came for, returned home againe into Persia. The Venetians also now at this same time, by their embassadours sought to renew the league they had made with the great Turke, now expired: which, as it was easily obtained, so was it of small assurance: Selymus the next yeare quarrelling with them, and raising new wars to the great hurt and disturbance of that state, as shall forthwith appeare.

An honourable

Selymus now at peace with all the world (aching of the Turkes not much desired) began to thinke of workes of charitie: and purposing to build a magnificent temple at HABRIANOPOLIS for his owne sepulture, with a monasterie, a colledge, and an almes-houle (as had his father, and other his auncestours before him at PRVSIA and CONSTANTINOPLE, led therunto with a vaine and superstitious deuotion) was troubled with nothing more, than how to endue the same with lands and reuenues sufficient for the maintenance of so great a charge: For that the Mahometane kings, are by their superstition prohibited to conuert any lands or possessions

A to such holy vses, other than such as they haue with their owne sword woon from the enemies of their religion, which they may (as they are perswaded) as a most acceptable sacrifice, offer to their great prophet: which diuelish persuation, serueth as a spur to pricke forward euery of those ambitious princes to adde something to their empire. This his deuout purpose once knowne, wanted not the furtherance of many ripe heads, deuising some one thing, some another, as they thought best fitted his humor. But amongst many things to him presented, none pleased him so well, as the plot laid for the taking of the rich island of CYPRVS from the Venetians: a conquest of it selfe sufficient, both for the eternizing of his name, and performance of his owne charitable works intended; with a large ouerplus, for the supplying of whatsoeuer wanted in his fathers like deuout workes at CONSTANTINOPLE. But that which moued him most of all, was the glorie of such a conquest, which as his flatterers bare him in hand, might make him equall with any his predecessours; who in the beginning of their raigne, had vsually done or attempted some notable thing against the Christians. Hereupon the matter was by Selymus propounded to the great Bassas to be considered of; without whose aduise and counsell, the Turkish emperors seldom or neuer take any great wars in hand. Amongst these graue counsellours, Muhamet the chiefe Visier Bassa, a man of greatest authoritie (vnto whom Selymus was beholden, that he had so quietly obtained the empire) and a secret friend vnto the Venetians, seemed much to dislike of that motion, perswading Selymus not to yeeld thereunto: alleading, beside the danger and vncertaintie of the expedition, that his father Solyman at the time of his death had charged him straightly, that the league with the Venetians should be religiously kept; and that he could not with his honour, without just cause so quickly breake that league, which he himselfe had but a litle before most solemnly confirmed. But Mustapha the second Bassa, sometime Selymus his tutor, and therefore of him much honoured, with Piall Bassa the Admirall (both enuying at the great honour of the Visier Bassa) so mightily impugned that he had before said, and so importuned Selymus with the shew both of honour and profit attending that action, as also with the easinesse thereof (a great part of the Venetian Arsenall being but a litle before burnt, and their forces much weakened) that he rejected the counsell of Muhamet, calling him in his choller, Christian (which among the Mahometanes is a word of no small disgrace) and yeelding wholly to the persuation of Mustapha and Piall, presently commanded preparation to be made both by sea and land, for the performance of that his resolution. Which was not so couertly carried in the

D Turkes court, but that it was discovered by M. Antonius Barbarus the Venetian embassadour; and not without cause suspected by the Venetian merchants, whom the barbarous Turkes began now to cut short in their trafficke, looking big vpon them, as men suddenly changed, and euil entreating them with hard speeches, the vndoubted signes of greater troubles to ensue. The Venetian embassadour now out of doubt of the Turkes purpose for the inuasion of CYPRVS, came vnto Muhamet the chiefe Bassa, complaining of the breach of the league: and putting him in mind of the fidelitie of the Venetian state towards the Turkish emperour, requested him; that Selymus might not make too much hast to begin that warre, which would set all EVROPE on a broile; but rather by his embassadours first to declare his mind vnto the Senat, for that so it might happily come to passe, that all might be quieted, to the good of both parties without warre. Which the politike embassadour requested not of the Bassa for any hope he had to auert the warre, for which the Turke had now all things in readinesse, but onely by such an hope of composition, to hinder the Turkes endeours, and to win time, vntill that the State (being fully certified of all these matters) might make readie their fleet and forces, and so in armes be readie to answer their armed foes: neither did he euer leaue the Bassa, vntill he had by his meanes procured, That one Cubates should be sent embassadour to VENICE to proue the minds of the Senators, whether they would willingly deliuer the island, or adventure to haue it taken from them by force. These things and such like as were then done at CONSTANTINOPLE, being by letters sent in post from the embassadour, made knowne at VENICE, brought a generall heauinesse vpon the citie: for why, that vnderstanding and prouident State, warned by their former

F harmes, of all others most dread the Turkes forces. Cubates the embassadour accompanied with Aloysius Barbarus the embassadours sonne, and Bonricius his secretarie, departing from CONSTANTINOPLE, came by long Iournies to RAAGSVIM, where Angelus Surianus sent from VENICE to meet him, was readie to receiue him, who being taken into his gallic, brought him to VENICE.

In the meane time the Senatours sitting oftentimes in counsell, were deuicid in opinions G concerning the chiefe matter they consulted vpon: some there were, that thought it not good to wage warre against such an inuincible enimie, nor to trust vpon a vaine and idle hope, neither to commit all vnto the hazard of such fortune as was vnto them in that warre by the enimie propounded: they alledged, that they had alwaies vnfortunatly taken vp armes against the Turks, and that therefore they should set before their eies, what harmes they had suffered, and how that beside the losses already sustained they had alwaies in the winding vp of the warres lost something more: that it were better to depart with CYPRVS, so that they might quietly enjoy the rest, rather than to enter into armes: Time they said, would at length giue them some one fit occasion or other to recouer that they had lost, and to restore their state vnto the former honour; which for the present, was about their power to maintaine: To put their trust H in their confederates (they said) was but to deceiue themselves: they should remember how often euen small causes of false suspition, or hope of profit, or feare of harme, had vtterly frustrated and broken in sunder the most solemne capitulations of the strongest leagues: how often destruction had come thence from whence aid was to haue beene hoped for, they needed not to seeke farther for examples than from their owne domestick affaires. Others were of a contrarie opinion, as that the island was by force of armes to be defended: saying, That nothing could be more dishonourable, than without fight to depart with so notable a part of their feignorie: neither any thing more commendable, than to proue all things for defence of their honour: Neither would the proud Turkes, with whom no assured league could be made (as they said) hold themselves content with this yeelding vp of the island, but by intreating of them and giuing I them way, become more insolent: and when they had taken CYPRVS from them, would also seeke after CRETE and CORCYRA, and so yeelding them one thing after another, spoile themselves of all together: Ambitious and greedie princes (they said) grew more bold and insolent by other mens feare: and that no great or notable matter was to be done without danger: that hard beginnings had oftentimes merrie endings: that the fauour and good will of that insatiable and greedie nation, was not to be gained but with so great losse and charge as that such a costly peace would be much more hurtfull than warre it selfe: beside that, it much concerned other Christian princes to haue the Venetian state preserved, and that therefore it was to be hoped, that they would to the vttermost of their power giue them aid. The matter thus debated too and fro, it was in the end resolved vpon, to take vp armes in defence of their honour, and by plain K force to withstand the Turke.

So when Cubates the Turkes embassadour came from VENICE, neither did any man of courtesie meet him, neither was any honour done vnto him, or so much as common countie shewed vnto him: but being afterward admitted into the Senat house with his two interpreters onely, he deliuered Selymus his letters, enclosed in a little bag wrought with silke and gold; and so whilest the same letters were in breaking vp, and translating out of the Turkish language into Italian, deliuered also his message by word of mouth as followeth.

What great account the mightie Sultan my dread Soueraigne hath alwaies made of your most honourable friendship, is therein right well declared; That in the verie entrance of himselfe into his empire, he forthwith and without any hard or new conditions renewed his league with you: which he hath on his part alwaies kept most faithfully and vniuolant, worthely grieuing the like kindnesse not to be shewed on your behalfe, neither the like care of keeping your faith to appeare in you: who by harbouring of pyrats in your hauens, and murdering of his subiects, haue oftentimes broken the league. Which iniuries, although they were by war to haue beene reuenged, yet hath he, so mightie a monarch, hitherto bene alwaies more mindfull of your honor and friendship, than of his owne maiestie and profit. But for so much as there is no end of these iniuries and wrongs, and that it is now come to that point, That longer to forbear, might be imputed vnto him rather for cowardise than courtesie as also that it much more concerneth your State than him, and that therefore you ought no lesse than he to desire that all causes of unkindnesse might be cut off, and order taken, that in so great and mutuall good will, there should be no falling out by new quarrels daily arising: the onely remedie thereof is, if you shall deliuer vnto him the island of CYPRVS, the cause of all these grieuances. Now it becometh you for your great wisdom, to make small reckoning of so small a matter, in comparison of the fauour of so great a prince; which if you shall willingly of your selues yeeld vnto him, you shall right wisely provide

Turke's embassadour speaks in the Senat at Venice.

A provide for your affaires, and haue him so great a monarch alwaies your friend and confederat: when as if you shall shew your selues obstinat, and not to yeeld to this his so small a request, his purpose is by strong hand not onely to take from you the island, the cause of the warre, but also to prosecute you with most cruell warre both by sea and land. And thereupon I take God to witnesse, all the blame of the calamities to ensue of so mortall a warre, to be imputed vnto your selues, as the worthie reward of your wilfulnesse and breach of faith.

Which said, hee in the name of Muhaniet the Visier Bassa told the Senatours, that hee was right sorie that this breach was fallen out betwixt the emperour Selymus and them: and that although he doubted not, but that they would right wisely consider of all things; yet he could B nor for the good will he bare vnto them, but admonish them of such things, as he deemed for them both profitable and wholesome: and therefore did most instantly request them, and with all aduise them, not to enter into armes against so mightie a prince, neither wilfully to plunge themselves into such dangers, as they could hardly or neuer find the way out; for that their strength was nothing answerable vnto his, and that the cunct of that warre was like to be vnto them deadly, and that therefore he tooke God, and the loue he bare vnto them to witnesse, that he had in friendly sort forewarned them of their harmes, and aduised them for their good: Giuing them farther to vnderstand, that Selymus did nothing but thunder out most cruell threats against their State: which his indignation was raised of the manifold complaints brought against them to his court at C O N S T A N T I N O P L E.

C Selymus his letters answerable to his embassadours speech, were also full of false surmised grieuances: he complained, That the Venetians had in warlike manner entered into the frontiers of his empire in DALMATIA, and there had done great harme; that they had put to death certaine Turkish pirats whom they had taken aliue: that their island of CYPRVS was an harbour for the pirats of the West, and that from thence they robbed his peaceable countries, and surprised his subjects traouelling that way for deuotion vnto the temple of MACHA, or otherwise about their affaires. And that therefore those causes of discord might be taken away, and the hinderance of traffique remoued, he required them to yeeld vnto him the island of CYPRVS: which if they refused to doe, he would by force of armes take it from them; and by force and strong hand cause them to doe that which they might better haue done frankly and of their D owne accord; and farther, to make them to vnderstand how farre the Turkes did excell all other men in martiall prowesse. As for the league before made betwixt his father and them, he said he had renewed the same, not because he had any liking thereunto, but because he had as then set downe with himselfe, for a while in the beginning of his empire, peaceably to endure all things.

The Venetians, for that they knew the embassadours errand before his coming, hauing now read his letters, gaue him such answer as they had before resolved vpon: which was, That the Venetians had at all times inuolably kept their leagues with the Othoman emperours, and had in regard thereof let slip many opportunities and fit occasions for them to haue augmented their dominions in: That they could without any danger to themselves, haue destroyed the E Turkes fleet both at the RHODOS and MALTA, and other places also; but that they more regarded their honour, and alwaies thought that nothing better became great and magnificent princes, than to performe their faith once giuen, and in all their actions to be like themselves. And therefore had dissembled, and put vp many grieuous and bitter indignities, least they might be thought to haue first broken the league: That they had neuer passed their owne bounds, or invaded the Turkes: onely to haue taken order, that no pirats should at their pleasure roame vp and downe the seas. Now whereas all duties being on their part sincerely and most religiously kept, Selymus complained himselfe to be wronged, whereas he himselfe had done the wrong; and had contrarie to the league denounced warre against them, expecting nothing lesse: suchence that they could not by the power of the league, they would by force of armes defend that kingdome, which they by auncient and lawfull right possessed, deliuered vnto them by their aunces F flos: That God in whose helpe they trusted would weigh in indifferent ballance, all mens words and deeds, whom they tooke to witnesse, that they were the authours of peace, and Selymus the cause of warre: and that the same God would be now present vnto their iust complaints, and forthwith after with his power to take reuenge on them; which falsifying their faith and promise giuen, and violating the sacred league, had enforced them to take vp most iust and necessarie G armes, which they would with the same courage manage that they had taken them in hand.

The Turkes em-bassadour sent away in secretes to Venice.

The resolution of the Senat for war diuersly liked, & disliked of others.

With this answer the embassadour departed, let out by a secret posterne, for feare of the people; who hauing got knowledge of the matter, were in great number assembled to the Court gate, muttering among themselves, that it were well done to rend in pieces that accursed Turke, the messenger of his faithlesse master. Which outrage it was thought they would in their furie haue performed, had not such as by the commaundement of the magistrates guarded him, better assured him of his safetie, than either regard of durie or the law of nations; he by the way as he went still storming and swearing by his Mahomet to be of that so great an indignitie reuenged.
This answer of the Senat vnto the Turkes embassadour concerning warre, was of some well liked and highly commended, as full of honour and valour. Others deemed it too sharpe, liking H of nothing that was said or done, to the further incensing of the Turkish emperor: being of opinion, that they might haue of him obtained a more indifferent peace by courtesie than by ri-gour. As for the decreed warre they vtterly disliked, for as much as all warres were wofull, but especially those which were to be maintained against them that are too strong for vs. In such diuersitie of opinions it appeared, That the Senat should of that so honourable a decree reape such commendation, as the euent thereof should afford (than which nothing is more vnreasonable) if things fell out well, then was it wisely and worthely done; if otherwise, then was it like to be reputed a foolish, a rash, and wofull resolution.

The greater danger was now feared from the angrie Turke, the more carefull were the Venetians of their state. Wherefore they forthwith sent messengers with letters vnto the Gouernours of CYPRVS, charging them with all carefulnesse and diligence to make themselves readie to withstand the Turke, and to raise what power they were able in the island, not omitting any thing that might concerne the good of the state: and at the same time made choice of their most valiant and expert capitaines both by sea and land, vnto whom they committed the defence of their dispersed Seignorie, with the leading of their forces. Hieronymus Zanius was appointed Admirall, Lucas Michaelis was sent into CRET, Franciscus Barbarus into DALMATIA, Sebastianus Venerius into CORCYRA, all men of great honour, experience, and valour. Other meaner capitaines were sent also with lesse charge into the foresaid places, as Eugenius Singletius, a noble gentleman, with a thousand footmen into CYPRVS, who had also the leading of all the horsemen in the island: after whom countie Martinengus promised to follow with two thousand footmen more. The strong cities were now by the Venetians in all places new fortified, armour, ordinance, and victuall provided, and whatsoever els they thought needfull for defence of their state. And for as much as they well knew they had to doe with too mightie an enemy, they by their embassadours sent for that purpose, earnestly solicited most of the Christian princes to ioine with them in league, and to giue them aid against the common enemy, who as he was too strong for any one of them, so were he not able to stand against their vnited forces. But the em-perour Maximilian excused himselfe by the league he had not long before made with the Turke for eight yeares, which (he said) he might not breake: yet had he before his eyes a most pregnant example, what small reckoning the Turke maketh of his faith or league; which he without any just cause had broken with the Venetians. The like excuse vsed also Charles the French king, and Sigismund king of POLONIA, who both seemed to be very sorrie for that the Venetians were fallen out with the Turke, but could not helpe them, for that they were in league with the Turkish emperor. Neuerthelesse the French king did them the courtesie, to offer himselfe to be a mediator, if they so pleased, betwixt them and Selymus. The young king of PORTINGAL, Don Sebastian pretended also for his excuse the great plague which had but a litle before ragged in his kingdome, and much deminished his people; as also that he was to maintaine wars by sea against the Turks in the East Indies, to the no lesse benefit of the Christian commonweale than if he should aid the Venetians in the Mediterranean. Onely Pius Quintus then Pope, and Philip king of SPAIN, with certaine of the princes of ITALIE; namely Philibert duke of SAVOIE, Guido Vdebaldu duke of VRBIN, Cosmus Medices duke of FLORENCE, and the knights of MALTA, M promised them aid, which they afterward most honourably performed.

Selymus of himselfe angrie with the Venetians, and firme in his resolution for the conquest of CYPRVS, was vpon the report of Cubates his embassadours had entertainment at VENICE, farther enraged. He deemed the maiestie of the Turkish empire contemned, and himselfe in the person

gled with their

tians.

A person of his embassadour disgraced: seeing that they whom he had thought would haue yeal-ded vnto any thing, rather than the league should haue beene broken, had sent him such a short answer, and so contemptuously vsed his embassadour, vnto whom they had not afforded so much as common courtesie. It did not a litle moue him also, that the Venetians had in their letters sent by his embassadour, omitted the glorious titles usually giuen the Turkish emperours.
Wherefore in some part to satisfie his angrie mood, he caused Marcus Antonius Barbarus, the Venetian embassadour, and all the Christian marchants of the West throughout his empire, to be clapt vp in prison, and their ships layed vnder an arrest. And letting all other things apart, let himselfe wholly for the preparing of such things as should be needfull for the intended warre.

But for as much as the island of CYPRVS was the prey whereafter the greedie tyrant so much gaped, and for which the bloodie warres betwixt the Turke and the Venetians, with their Christian confederats, pretchly ensued, it shall not be from our purpose to spend a few words in the describing thereof, as the stage whereon the bloodie tragedie following was as it were acted: as also how it came first into the hands of the Venetians, and by what right of them so long possessed (although it be in some part before declared) vntill it was now by Selymus the great Turke against all right injuriously demanded, and at length by strong hand by him wrested from them.
This island lieth in the farthest of the Cilician sea: it hath on the East SICILIA, on the West
PAMPHILIA, Southward it regardeth EGYPTE, and Northward CILICIA, now called CARAMAN-NIA. It is worthily accounted amongst the greatest islands of the Mediterranean, containing in circuit 427 miles, and is in length (after the description of Strabo) 175 miles, and in bredth not aboue 65. It aboundeth with corne, wine, oyle, cotton, wooll, saffron, honey, rosin, turpentine, sugar canes, and whatsoever els is needfull for the sustentation of man, whereof it sendeth forth great abundance to other countries, of whom it craueth no helpe againe. It was in ancient time called Macaria, that is to say, Blessed. The people therein generally liued so at ease and pleasure, that thereof the island was dedicated to Venus, who was there especially worshipped, and thereof called CYPRIA. Marcellinus shew the fertilitie thereof, sayth, That CYPRVS aboundeth with such plentie of all things, that without the helpe of any other forraigne country it is of itselfe able to build a tall ship, from the keele to the top saile, and so put it to sea furnished of all things needfull. And Sextus Rufus writing thereof, sayth, Cyprus famosa diuitijs, paupertatem populi Romani, et occuparetur sollicitudo, ita vt ins eius insule avarius magis quam iustus simus D ascendit. CYPRVS famous for wealth, allured the povertrie of the people of ROMA to lay hold vpon it, so that we haue rather couetously than iustly got the rule thereof. In the heart of the island standeth NICOSIA, sometime the regall and late metropolitall citie thereof. And in the East end thereof FAMAGUSTA, sometime called TAMASSVS, a famous rich citie, the cheefe and onely port of all that most pleasant island. Other faire cities there be also, as PAPHOS, AMA-THVS (now called LIMISSO) and CYRENE. This island of it selfe long time maintained the maiestie of a kingdome, as then when Richard the first king of ENGLAND passing that way with his fleet for the releefe of the Christians then distressed in the Holy land about the yeare 1191, was prohibited there to land; and certaine of his people by force of tempest there cast on shore, were by the Cypriots either cruelly slaine or taken prisoners: which barbarous violence king Richard tooke in so euill part, that he there by force landed his armie, and rested not vntill he had taken Isack the king prisoner, and subdued the island. The king he sent in chaines of siluer to TRIPOLI-
S, there to be kept in close prison; the kingdome he kept a while in his owne hand, which not long after he gaue, or as some say, exchanged with Guido the titular king of HIERUSALEM: for which cause the kings of ENGLAND for a certaine time afterwards were honoured with the title of the Kings of HIERUSALEM. This kingdome by many descents came at length to Ianus son of king Peter, who in the yeare 1423 was by Melechella Sultan of EGYPTE taken prisoner, but afterwards for the rancome of an hundred and fiftene thousand Sultanins, was set at libertie and restored to his kingdome, paying vnto the Sultan and his successours a yearly tribute of fortie thousand crownes. This Ianus left a sonne called John, who after the death of his father married the daughter of the Marques of MONTFERRAT: after whose death he married one Helena, of the most noble house of the Paleologi in GRACIA, by whom he had one onely daughter called Carlote, but by another woman a base sonne named Iames. This king John was a man of no courage, altogether giuen to pleasure, and according to the manner of his effeminate education, shewed himselfe in all things more like a woman than a man: which Helena his wife, a woman of a great spirit, quickly perceiving, tooke vpon her the foueraignetic and whole government of G the realme, gracing and disgracing whom she pleased, and promoting to the ecclesiasticall dignities such as she best liked, abolishing the Latine ceremonies, and bringing in them of the Greeks, and tooke such further order as pleased her selfe in matters of state, concerning both peace and warre, her husband in the meane time regarding nothing, but his vaine pleasure: whereby it came to passe, that all was brought into the power of the Greekes, the queenes friends. Now the queene her selfe was much ruled by the counsell of her nurse, and the nurse by her daughter: so that the people commonly said, The daughter ruled the nurse, the nurse the queene, & the queene the king. The nobilitie ashamed and wearie of this manner of government, by generall consent of the people sent for John the king of PORTINGALS, cousin Germane (whom some call the king of PORTINGALL) to whom they gaue Carlotte the kings daughter in marriage, with full H power to supplie that want of government which was in king John his father in law. He taking the authoritie into his hands, quickly reformed the disordered kingdome, as well in matters concerning religion as ciuile policie. The Latine ceremonies were againe restored, and the government of the daughter, the nurse, and the queene brought to an end. But the mischievous daughter doubting the countenance of the new king, perswaded her mother, as she rendered her owne life, to poyson the king. VVhich thing the wretched woman, by the consent of the queene mother (as was reported) in short time performed, and so brought that noble prince, well worthe longer life, vnto his vntimely end: whereby the government was againe restored to the Greeke queene, who in the name of her weake husband commanded againe at her pleasure. But about all, the nurse and her daughter insulted vpon the young queene Carlotte, which shee not well brooking, grieuouously complained thereof to James her base brother, requiring his helpe for redresse thereof: who not long after slew the nurses daughter, not so much in reuenge of the wrong by her done vnto his sister, as to prepare a way for himselfe for the obtaining of the kingdome: grieuing inwardly, that shee or her husband whosoever, should bee preferred before himselfe. VVhich thing Helena the queene quickly perceiving, perswaded the king her husband to cause his base sonne to enter into the orders of priesthood; and so to become a church man, thereby to cut off all his hope of aspiring vnto the kingdome: which the king at her instance did, and made him archbishop of NICOSTA. In the meane time Carlotte by the perswasion of her mother and the nobilitie of the countrey, married Lewes sonne to the duke of SAVOY: who being for that purpose sent for, came with all speed to CYPRVS. After that the queene mother and the old K nurse (desiring nothing more than to reuenge the death of the nurses daughter vpon James, now archbishop) deuised first how to thrust him out of all his spirituall promotions, which were great, and afterward quite banish him the kingdome. Hereupon the queene wrote letters against him to the Pope, to haue him disgraced, for that he being a man base borne, with his hands embred with guilelesse blood, was vnworthie of holy orders. VVhich letters by chance came to James his hands: who entaged therewith, accompanied with a number of his friends and fauorits, suddenly entred the Court, slew such of his enemies as he found there, deuicid their goods amongst his followers, and as king possessed himselfe of the regall citie. In this broile the Greeke queene Helena died, and shortly after her husband also. All things being thus in a hurle and out of order, certaine of the nobilitie for redresse thereof sent for Lewes the husband of Carlotte, as for him to whom that kingdome in the right of his wife most iustly belonged: who vpon his arrival was of all sorts of men ioifully receiued and welcommed as their king. James the vsurper vnderstanding before of the coming of Lewes, and perceiving the inclination of the people towards him, fled with diuers of his friends to ALEXANDRIA, to craue aid of the Egyptian Sultan: in whose Court he found such fauour, as that he was by the Sultans commaundement royally appaanelled and honoured with the title of the king of CYPRVS, which he promised for cuer to hold of the Sultans of EGIPPT as their vassale and tributarie. At which time the Sultan also by his embassadors commaunded Lewes to depart the isle: who by all meanes sought to haue pacified the Sultan, declaring vnto him his rightfull title, yet offering to pay vnto him the wonted tribute, and to allow vnto James a yearly pension of ten thousand duckats, during his life. But all in vaine, for James still present in the Sultans court, and wisely following his own sute, at last concluded with the great Sultan (who thought it more honour to make a king than to confirme a king) and receiving of him a great armie, returned into CYPRVS, where in short time he so distressed Lewes, that he was glad to forsake the island, with his wife, and to returne into his countrey; leaving the king.

A kingdome of CYPRVS againe to James: who now by the supposition of the Egyptian Sultan possessed thereof, yet liued nor without care of Carlotte and her husband Lewes, whom he knew the Cypriots wonderfully affected. VV herefore for the more assurance of his estate, he thought it best to ioyne in league and friendship with the Venetians, whom he knew to be of great power at sea, and of all other fittest to crosse whatsoever Lewes should in the right of his wife attempt against him. VVhich league he afterwards made, & the better to confirme the same tooke to wife Catherine Cornelia, the daughter of Marcus Corneliu a magnifico of VENICE, being before adopted by the Senat, and euen after, their reputed daughter. Not long after this marriage, James died in the yeare 1470, leaving the queene great with child, who in due time was deliuered of a faire sonne, vnto whom with the mother the Venetian state became tutors, as their adoptiue fathers, and in their behalfe tooke vpon them the gouernment of the realme. This child shortly after died also, nor without some suspicion of poyson, after whose death great troubles arose in the kingdome, insomuch that Andreas Corneliu the queenes vnle, a most graue counsellour, and Gouernour of the realme vnder the queene, was by the conspiracie of certaine noble men slaine, and all the island readie to reuolt from the queene. For appeasing of which troubles, the Venetians were glad oftentimes to send their Admirals with their gallies into CYPRVS: to take order in the matter, and to aid the queene: who at length perswaded by George Corneliu her brother (whilest it was yet in her power) as alouing daughter to yeeld vp the kingdome vnto her adoptiue fathers, which the destitute both of counsell and power, could not long hold so farre from her friends, beset on the one side with the great Turke, and on the other with the mightie C Sultan of EGIPPT. She I say thus perswaded by her brother, came to VENICE, where she was with the greatest honour that could be deuised, receiued by the duke and the whole State at sea Sabellie. Ed. in their great and goodly ship the Bucettaue, and so with all royall triumph brought through need. 10. lib. 9. the middle of the citie vnto the place most richly for the time appointed for the receiuing of her: where shortly after, attired in all her royall habiliments, she came in great maiestie into the Senat house, and there before the Tribunall seat of Augustinus Barbadiu, then duke of VENICE, layed downe her crowne and scepter, and as a most louing daughter resigned vp her kingdome, to the great honour and profit of her countrey. Thus the kingdome of CYPRVS was deliuered into the hands of the Venetians in the yeare 1473: which they peaceably held from that time, paying vnto the Sultans of EGIPPT such tribute as they had the late king James: which yearly D tribute they in like manner payed vnto the Turkish emperours, after that the kingdome of EGIPPT was by Selymus the first conquered in the yeare 1517, as due vnto them by law of armes: with which yearly tribute both Selymus himselfe, and Solyman after him, held themselves well contented. But now this Turkish emperour Selymus the second, of whom we speake, desirous both of the honour of such a conquest, and of so rich a prey, made no account of the accustomed tribute, but of the fruitfull island it selfe: whereof he as is before declared, hath by his embasadour made a proud demand, but is thereof denied by the Senat.

Selymus thoroughly furnished with all things necessarie for the inuasion of CYPRVS, in the beginning of Februarie sent a great power both of horse and foot into EPIRVS and the frontiers of DALMATIA, to forrage the Venetian territorie, especially about IADRA, as of purpose by that warre so neete at home to withdraw them from the defence of CYPRVS so farre off. About the middle of Aprill following he sent Piall Bassa with fourescore gallies and thirtie galliots to keepe the Venetians from sending aid into CYPRVS. This Piall was an Hungarian, borne of base parents, but turning Turke, and giuing himselfe to armes, was first preferred for his valour, shewed against the Christians at ZERRT, and afterward by many degrees rise to the honour of one of the greatest Bassas. He departing from CONSTANTINOPLE, and cutting through PROBONTIS and HELLESPONTVS, came to EVBEOA, and there for certaine dayes lay in such order, as if he should haue presently giuen the enemy battell: but vnderstanding by his espials, that the Venetians greuously visited with the plague, and slowly releued by their friends, were not like in hast to come out, he tooke his course to TANO, an island of the Venetians, to haue taken it from them. This island is one of the Cyclades, and was by nature strong, but stronger by the industrie of the defendants, who lying far from the Christian countries, and compassed about with such cruell and warlike enemies, as people farre distant stood in dread of, could neuer for any fear or danger be remooued from the Christian religion; or induced to submit themselves to the Turkes gouernement, as most of the other islands had. Piall here landing his forces, fought both by faire means and foule to haue perswaded the inhabitants to haue yeelded vp their towne; but when he could get nothing of them but foule words againe, he began by force to assault the same. Two daies the towne was valiantly both assaulted and defended, but at length the Turkes perceiuing how little they preuailed, and that the defendants were resolutely set downe for the defence of themselves and their countrey; shamefully gaue ouer the assault, and abandoning the island, directed their course toward CYPRVS. For Mustapha, author of that expedition (for his auntient hatred against the Christians, made Generall by Selymus) had before appointed Piall Bassa at a time prefixed, to meet him at the RHODES, and that he that came first should tarrie for the other, that so they might together saile into CYPRVS.

Mustapha hauing before sent a great part of his armie by land into PAMPHILIA, embarked the rest with Haly Bassa Generall of the forces at sea, who yet staied for him with the rest of the fleet at CONSTANTINOPL. This Haly was one of the chiefe Bassaes, a man of great account, and sometime an especiall and noted follower of Muhamet Bassa: but now (as it is oftentimes elsewhere seene, that men together with the change of fortune, change their minds and affections also) was become a great fauourit of Mustapha. Now to colour so manifest a wrong and breach of the Turkes faith, Mustapha the Generall, according to the Turkish manner, a little before his arriual in CYPRVS, gaue the Venetians there to vnderstand by letters of his comming, as alio of his purpose for the taking of that island from them: for that without some such slender denouncing of warre vnto them against whom it is intended, the Turkes generally account their expeditions not to be altogether so lawfull or fortunat as otherwise: and therefore writ vnto them in this sort.

Mustapha Bassa
his letters vnto
the Venetians.

That the kingdome of CYPRVS by auntient right belongeth vnto the kingdome of EGYPT, you are not ignorant; which being conquered by the Turkes, is together with it become of right apart also of the Othoman empire: that island we come to challenge, leading after vs two hundred thousand valiant souldiours, vnto which power, and the wealth of the Othoman kingdomes (all which the most mightie emperor is about (if need shall be) to send thither, and to bend his whole strength thereon) all the vnted forces of the Christian kings are not comparable; much lesse the Venetians (so small apart of EGYPT) forsaken of their friends, can suffice. Wherefore, we will and exhort you, for the auntient amitie which hath been betwixt your State and the glorious Othoman family, to yeeld this kingdome vnto the most puissant emperor, whose verie name is become dreadfull vnto all the nations of the world: and quietly, and without resistance to leaue the island, with the loue and friendship of so great a monarch to be for euer inuiolably kept betwixt him and you. Whereas if you shall before such wholsome counsell fondly preferre your vaine hopes, you are to expect all the calamities of warre, with such dreadfull examples as the angrie conquerours vse to make of their vanquished enemies. For resolution whereof, wee yet giue you halfe a moneths space to bethinke your selues in: and so fare you well.

goeth for Cyprus.

All this being now in readinesse, and a most royall gallie of wonderfull greatnesse and beautie by the appointment of Selymus prepared for the great Bassa the Generall: he together with Haly Bassa and the rest of the fleet, departed from CONSTANTINOPL the six and twentieth of May, and at the RHODES met with Piall as he had before appointed. The whole fleet at that time consisted of two hundred gallies, amongst whom were diuers galliots, and small men of warre, with diuers other vessels prepared for the transportation of horses: with this fleet Mustapha kept on his course for CYPRVS. They of the island in the meane time carefully attending the enemies comming, from their watch towers first discovered the fleet at the West end of the island not farr from PAPHOS: from whence the Turkes turning vpon the right hand, and passing the promontorie CYRIO, now called DELLE GATTE, landed diuers of their men, who burnt and spoiled certaine villages, and with such spoile and prisoners as they had taken returned M againe vnto the fleet: which holding on the former course, came at length to a place called SALINÆ (of the abundance of salt there made) where they knew was best landing: and there in an open road came to an anchor, where the Bassaes without any resistance vpon a plaine shoare landed their armie.

The Turkes land
in Cyprus.

Now

Now all the hope of the Christians, was to haue kept the Turkes from landing, which they should with all their strength and power haue done; neither was it a matter of any great difficulty, for had the defendants but kept the shoare, and from the drie and firme land valiantly repulsed their enemies, they might vndoubtedly with their shot and weapons haue kept them from landing, or else haue done them greater harme: knowing in the meane time, that in all the island was no good harbour for them to put into, and that riding in an open road subject to all wind and weather, they could not long without danger of shipwracke ride it out: But they, either terrified with the greatnesse of the fleet, or preuented by the celeritie of the enemy, to their great hurt omitted so faire an opportunitie, as the wofull sequell of the matter declared. It exceedingly encouraged the Turkes that they had so easily footed the island; which they thought they should not haue done without a bloudie fight.

The Bassa now landed, presently entrenched his armie, and forthwith sent the fleet to transport the rest of his forces out of PAMPHILIA into the island. And at the same time sent out certaine scouts to take some prisoners, of whom they might learne the situation of the countrey, the best waies to passe them with his armie, the strength of his enemies, and what they did, and many other such like things which it concerned him to know. But the greatest question amongst the Turkes themselves was, Whether they should first set vpon FAMAGUSTA or NICOSIA? FAMAGUSTA standeth low, altogether subject to the scorching heat, which was then great, according as the time of the yeate and nature of the countrey required: wherefore the Bassa for feare of diseases to arise in his armie of the immoderat heat and vnwholesome situation of the place, thought it better to begin his warres with the siege of NICOSIA, and to make that citie the seat of the warre, for the conquest of the rest of the island. So hauing put all things in order, and well viewed the countrey, and finding nothing he needed to stand in doubt of, he set forward with his armie toward NICOSIA, which was about thirtie miles distant, being the cheefe and richest citie of all the island. Which way soeuer the armie marched, it spread a great deale of ground; and the neerer it came, the greater was the slaughter of the countrey people; and the number of prisoners taken of all sorts. But when newes of the enemies approach was brought into the citie, a generall feare presaging future miserie possessed the hearts of all men. There was not in the citie any valiant or renowned capitaine, who as the danger of the time required, should haue taken vpon him the charge: neither any strong armie in the island to oppose against the enemy.

The Gouvernour of the citie was one Nicholaus Dandulus, a man too weake for so great a burthen; who alwaies brought vp in ciuile affaires, was to seeke how to defend a siege. Of the citizens and countrey people he had taken vp foure thousand footmen, and a thousand horsemen, all raw souldiours, commaunded by the gentleman of the countrey, men of all others most courteous: but as well the captaines as the souldiours, as men brought vp in a plentiful countrey, fitter for pleasure than for warre. The greatest hope and strength of the citie, was reposed in twelue hundred Italian footmen, and six hundred horsemen. The whole number of the souldiours in garrison for defence of the citie, was deemed about eight thousand horse and foot: too weake a companie against so fierce and strong an enemy; and the more, for that the Bassa an old and most expert Generall was there in person himselfe present, a most seuer and absolute commaunder, whom it would haue been a hard matter to haue withstood with equall power. The Venetians had euer had great care of the island of CYPRVS, as lying farr from them, in the midst of the sworn enemies of the Christian religion, and had therefore oftentimes determined to haue fortified the same: yet fearing thereby to seeme to distrust or dread the Turkes, and so to giue them occasion of offence, left it still vndone. This citie of NICOSIA standeth in the midst of the island, in a plaine and champaigne countrey, compassed round with a wall, as if it had bin drawne with a compasse, and is in circuit about fise miles: for the manner of the situation, &c magnificent buildings as well publike as priuat, many haue compared it vnto the beautifull citie of FLORENCE IN ITALIE: and was for the wholsome and commodious situation thereof notably peopled. This citie had the Venetians of late fortified with new wals, thicke rampiers, and eleven strong bulwarkes, according to the manner of the fortification of our time; and had raised three great fortresses for defence of the wall, which they furnished with a strong garrison; great store of artillerie, and other warlike prouision: Neuerthelesse, they found by experience in this warre, That fortifications are strengthened by the defendants; rather than the defendants by the fortifications.

The two and twentieth of Iuly, the Bassa with his armie encamped within a mile and a halfe G of the citie, when presently the Turks by troupes issuing out of the campe, rid contemptuously before the wals and gates of the citie, and with often and lowd outcries vpbraid the defendants which by them being answered with silence, was taken as a token of their feare. And Mustapha himselfe comming as neere as he might without danger, tooke full view of the wals and situation of the citie. Shortly after, the enimie drew neerer vnto the citie into a more open plaine, and with their tents filled the lower part of the hill, which they called MANDIA: but the Bassa sent they set aloft vpon the hill, to the terrour of the defendants and encouragement of the Turks. The campe being fortified, the Turks with incredible labour and celeritie brought their trenches from farre, and at the first cast vp some few forts, but afterwards, as their armie increased, many mo; which they raised so high, that they ouertopped the wals of the citie; and made the place H more dangerous for the Christians to defend. There hauing placed seauentie great pieces of batterie, they began to batter the citie both day and night without intermission; with such an horrible thundring, that the earth trembled, the houses shooke as if they would haue fallen downe: at which time many were slaine, both with the deadly shot, and the broken pieces of stones beaten out of the wals: neuer was such a feare as then within the citie of Nicosia: euerie day the enimie brought his trenches neerer and neerer, and rested not vntill he had with restlesse labour brought them vnto the verie brim of the towne ditch, which the citifens before the comming of the Turks had not well scoured. Being come so nigh, they first skirmished a flack off with their small pieces: but afterwards, they not onely battered the wals with their great artille- rie, but with small shot, arrowes, and stones, overwhelmed the defendants; as if it had been a I shower of haile; so to haue driuen them from off the wall and rampiers. In few daies, not only all the curtaines betwixt three of the bulwarks, was by the furie of the great ordinance beaten downe, but all places thereabout lay full of the dead bodies of the assailants and defendants. For although the Christians fought at great disadvantage, both for the number of men and indifferencie of the place: yet desperation joyned with extreame necessitie, of all other the greatest weapon, gaue them such courage, as with shot, stones, timber, and such like, to keepe downe their enemies, and defend their wals; and oftentimes to make great slaughter of them, with their artilletrie and murthering pieces bent vpon them as at a certaine marke, who the thicker they stood, the greater was their harme. They also oftentimes dismounted many of the great pieces K and made them vsueruicable; and with featherbeds and sacks of cotten wooll, made vp their breaches: which the Turks laboured againe to burne with pitch barrells, and earthen pots full of wild fire. After long fight the Turks entering the ditch, made themselves two waies to the wals, which they fortified on both sides with fagots and earth, in such sort, as that they were safe from the loupes of the bulwarks which flankered the ditch. All this quickly performed, some presently set vp scaling ladders: others filled the ditches with brushwood, fagots, and earth; and others in the meane time with mattocks and leauers were digging downe the foundations of the bulwarks CONSTANCE and PODOCATERA, taking name of them that had the chiefe charge L in the building thereof. The Christians right valiantly endured the first assault of the enimie, and stricke downe dead into the ditches many of them that were climbing vp the ladders: and had in short time slaine mo than they were themselves in number, and enforced the rest to giue ouer the assault. These things were done in the beginning of the siege, whilst yet both parties were strong: in which hard conflicts a great number of souldiors were lost, and most of the canoniers slaine. After this assault, both parties for a while busied themselves and spent the time in their ingenious deuises: wherein it appeared, that the Turks were much enningier in debiting of meanes to take cities, than were those Christians in defending the same.

Now had the Venetians in the first motions of these wars, praied aid of diuers Christian princes, from most part of whom they receiued but cold comfort, as is before declared: yet now at length (though somewhat late) they had drawne into the confederation of this warre, the Pope and the king of SPAIN: by whose example some other princes of ITALY moved, put to also their helping hands. The Venetians, as they whom the matter most concerned, had in good M time put their fleet to sea; but knowing themselves too weake to encounter the Turks, they by still vpon the coast of DALMATIA, about IZBURA, expecting the comming of the Spaniard admiral with his gallies. Two moneths (wherein much might haue been done) were now past in this expedition, and yet no newes of his comming: so that what the speed and industry of the Venetians

A Venetians had well prepared, was by the delay and lingering of the Spaniard marred. Besides that, the plague began to arise in the fleet, lying so long in one place; which at length grew so hoar, that many of the gallies had neither manner nor souldiours left in them: neither did this mortalitie so cease, vntill there were twentie thousand dead thereof; amongst whom were many noble gentlemen of great account, which might haue done their countrey good seruice, had they been in time imployed.

Summer now almost halfe spent, and the plague well ceased, the Venetian Admirall wentie of expecting the comming of Auria the Spanish Admirall; gathering together his fleet which he had before dispersed, to auoid the infection failed to CORCYRA, where he met with Venerius another of the Venetian commanders, who there staid for him; hauing but a little before

B taken from the Turks CORCYRA, now called SYDERO; a town vpon the sea coast buet against CORCYRA. The whole fleet of the Venetians being assembled together was an hundred and seauenteene saile; amongst which were twelue great galleasses; but all too weake to giue battell to the Turks, as being themselves stronger in shipping than in men. Neuertheless, the Admirall forie and wearie to see the spoile of the Venetian territorie, and moued with the distresse of the besieged in NICOSIA, rather than for any hope he had with that strength to doe any good against the Turkes fleet, departed from CORCYRA towards CARAB; and the twelfth of August landed at SYDA, a port of that island. In the latter end of this moneth Colonna the Popes Admirall, and Auria Admirall for the king of SPAIN, arrived there also, whom the Venetian Admirall welcomed with great joy and triumph. The whole fleet of the confederat princes now

C at length met together, consisted of an hundred ninetie two gallies, and twelue galleasses, beside victualers and other small vessels, laded with munition and other necessarie prouision for the fleet. Of these gallies the Pope had set forth twelue, the king of SPAIN fortie two, the rest with the galleasses were the Venetians. In this fleet were embarked thirteene thousand six hundred threescore souldiors: of whom the Pope sent eleuen hundred, the king of SPAIN three thousand nine hundred, and the Venetians eight thousand six hundred and sixtie. These three great commanders entering into counsell, what course to take in their proceedings in this warre, after long discourse too and fro, at length by the persuation of Zanius the Venetian Admirall, resolved to go directly for CYPRVS, and to giue the Turkes battell, in hope thereby to raise them from the siege of NICOSIA. About the middest of September, this great fleet furnished with D all things needfull for such an expedition, loosed from CARAB, and with a faire gale of wind let forward for CYPRVS; in all their course keeping such order, as if they should presently haue met with the enimie. In the middest of these troubles died Petrus Loredanus duke of VENICE, leaving the rest of the care of that warre to Aloysius Mocenicus, who succeeded him in the dukedome.

Whilst the Christians thus slowly proceed in their so waightie affaires, Mustapha in the meane time laied hard siege to NICOSIA: and diuiding his armie into foure parts, assaulted foure of the bulwarks of the citie, with greater force than at any time before from the beginning of the siege. The assault was both long and terrible: furie, and the verie sight of the warlike General, who was there a present witness, and beholder of euerie mans forwardnesse or cowardise (a matter of great moment) besides their naturall fiercenesse, carried the Turkes headlong without any perill or danger. And on the other side, the greatnesse of the danger, the feare to loose both life and libertie, with the hope of reliefe, encouraged the defendants to dare any thing: so that the Turks could not approach the wals, or mount the scaling ladders; but they were presently slaine, or together with the ladders throwne to the ground. Many of the Turkes were there slain, but especially such as were most forward: and of the defendants were also more lost than stood with the safetie of so small a number: and for as much as few or none escaped out of that fight vnwounded, the poore defendants were brought vnto a small number. Many skillfull men were of opinion, that the citie might haue been that day taken, if the assault had by the Bassa been longer maintained, by bringing still on fresh men: but such was his losse, as that he was glad F forthat time to giue ouer the assault, and so with dishonour to retire.

After this assault, it was by some of the captaines thought good, that they should (whilst they were yet of some reasonable strength in the citie) sallie forth vpon the enimie: so to make shew, that they had yet some good hope in themselves, and withall by so sudden an eruption to performe something vpon the secure enimie. Of which motion, Dandulus the Gouverneur in no case case liked, as loath by such a dangerous peece of seruice to diminish the number of the defendants, and so to giue the enemy an easier meanes to take the citie. Yet seeing all the capitaines generally of another mind, he yeelded vnto their desire. So in the hottest time of the day, when as the Turkes least thought that the Christians would haue sallied out, certaine Italian companies vnder the conduct of Cesar Plouianus of VIENTIA, and Albertus Scorus, issued out by the gate that leadeth to FAMAQVSTA, and vpon the sudden brake into the enemies trenches, where they found the Turkes some playing, some sleeping, but fearing nothing lesse than that the Christians, whom they daily braued, durst to haue aduentured to come forth. At the first entrance the Italians preuailed, and brought a great feare vpon that quarter of the Turkes armie, and Germany. But when the Turkes awaked with the alarm, came running in on every side, the Italians oppressed with the multitude, were glad to retire: in which retreat diuers of them were slaine, and amongst them their two leaders Cesar and Albertus: so that this sallie seemed to no other purpose, than to weaken the defendants themselves, and to cause the Turkes to keepe better watch and ward afterward against such sudden eruptions.

All hope of long defending the citie now almost lost, and that the defendants could hardly stand vpon the wals or shew their heads without present danger, they for want of better counsell rather than for any hope of good successe, sent out certaine scouts, men skilfull of the wayes and passages of the countrey (whom they had for great reward endued to vndertake the matter) to craue aid of the countrey people, that were in great multitude fled into the safetie of the mountaines: and to tell them, that if they came not in time to their releefe, their wiues and children, whom they had before sent into the citie, must needs in short time fall into the enemies hand, or perish with hunger: but these messengers were by the vigilant enemy intercepted, and in the sight of the besieged tortured to death.

About the same time diuers letters were shot with arrows into the citie, to persuaide the besieged Christians to yeeld themselves; for that in so doing they should find the Bassa a mild & mercifull conquerour: whereas otherwise if they should by wilfull holding out delay his victorie, they were sure to endure whatsoeuer could be endured or suffered. But when Mustapha had thus in yaine with hope and feare tried the minds of the defendants, he called forth to parley certaine souldiours that were standing vpon the bulwarke called CONSTANTVS, of whom some were by the consent of the Gouernor sent forth vnto him: vnto whom Mustapha by his interpreter complained, That no answer was giuen vnto his letters: he set forth vnto them the glorie, power, and greatness of the Turkish empire; and debased the strength of the Venicians: then he persuaided them to yeeld, propounding vnto them the miseries that would fall vpon them, if the citie should by force be taken; which he threatened would be farre greater than the danger the Turkes were to vndertake for the winning thereof: and that therefore it concerned none so much as themselves, whether the citie were giuen vp by composition, or els woun by strong hand: He shewed vnto them the profit that should arise vnto them by yeelding of it vp, and offered vnto them large entertainment, if they would serue him: and to conclude, told them, that they should neuer afterwards find at his hands so much grace as was at that instant offered them. The craftie Bassa did what he might to hasten the winning of the citie, both for that he doubted the coming of the Christian fleet, and that his great armie was exceedingly troubled with contagious and grievous diseases, arising of the immoderat heat and drought in that so hot a countrey. But the souldiours thinking any thing more assured than the Turkish faith, answered him, That they did not as yet doubt their owne strength, and that they were readie to endure any thing that could happen, rather than to preferre the vncertaine friendship of an vnknowne prince before the gracious fauour of such wortheie princes as they had so good experience of.

This answer cut off all the Bassas hope for taking of the citie by composition: wherewith being both grieved and enraged, he commanded all things to be made readie for the assault: and the more to encourage his souldiours, promised vnto them great rewards and honors that should first or second mount the wals. After that he gaue a generall assault vnto the citie with all his power: wherein both he as a most wortheie capitaine and his souldiours fought most fiercely. You haue to doe (said he) with the small and last remainders of your enemies, which are scarce able to stand or hold their weapons in their hands, rather than with enemies indeed: shall you not then easily overcome them, being both few and feeble, that haue vanquished them when they were many an dultie? The end of all your labours is at hand, your hoped rewards approach; only

A play you the men, and faint not in this assault; the spoile of this rich citie shall be the wortheie reward of your labours; and the fruit of all your trauell consisteth in this one moment. Whilst he thus encountreth some and reprooueth others, they mindfull of his promises, and these of the disgrace, altogether with their thicke shot suffer no man to stand in safetie vpon the wals; and out of their forts also with their great ordinance greatly annoyed the defendants. This done, they attempted by the ruines of the wall and in other places by scaling ladders to haue entered the citie. Which terrible assault was by the cruell enemy maintained, not for some few houres, but for diuers dayes together without any intermission, fresh men still coming on in stead of them that were wounded or slaine. Yet did the defendants valiantly endure all that storme; and in such weake case as they were, worthily performed what was possible for so few to doe: yet still in hope (the poore comfort of men in miserie) that releefe might come by the approach of the Christian fleet. At length, when the matter was brought to this point, that the Turkes were in great hope to haue gained the wals, & Mustapha himselfe probably guessed, That the Christians were now wearie of the long assault, and sore weakened with wounds and other infinit miseries, not to seek in a citie so hardly distressed, and was in that his opinion also confirmed by certain fugitive Christians: he neuertheless vpon the sudden caused a retreat to be sounded, and so retiring into his trenches, lay still all the next day without any thing doing. The defendants thinking that he had giuen ouer the assault, because of some aid that was coming to their releefe, became more careless of the enemy, and vpon the vaine hope of such aid, with lesse diligence repaired their breaches and provided for the repulsing of their enemies. But the Bassa in the meane time had chosen out of his whole armie about two hundred of his best capitaines and souldiours, all men of approved valour and agilitie of bodie, whom the next day after hee sent early in the morning, to make proofe if they could with scaling ladders secretly and without any noise set vp, get into the foure bulwarkes which he had before sore shaken with his great ordinance. These resolute men leading the way, got first vp, after whom followed diuers others; and so tooke the aforesaid bulwarke: when presently after other companies of their fellows which stood readie for the purpose, coming on forward, did with their scaling ladders in diuers places recouer the top of the wals for now the matter was not done by secret surpriſe, but by open force. In euery one of these bulwarkes were feuentie Italians and as many Epirots, who there kept watch and ward; these men part asleepe, as fearing no such danger, and partly lying lasily vpon the ground, were there surprised on the sudden and slaine: other some of them awaked with the strange and vncomforth noise, betooke not themselves lustily to their weapons, but forsaking their stations leapt downe out of the bulwarkes at such places as were next vnto them; some for feare ran ynwares into the midst of their enemies. Vpon this alarm some of the Christian capitaines came speedily to the wals with their companies, as did Eugenius, who whilst he in vaine crieth out to such fearefull souldiours as he met, that they should not so cowardly flie, & stayeth others that were flying, was himselfe shot thorow with a small shot and slaine. Other capitaines in other places likewise laboured in vaine to haue stayed the flying souldiours, whose persuations, requests, and authoritie in so generall a feare, nothing at that time preuailed.

The defendants thus beaten from the wals and bulwarkes, gathered themselves into the market place: but the citizens fleeing home to their owne houses, there stood in the entrances of the same, fearefully expecting the destruction of their countrey, together with their owne. In the meane time the Gouernor of ALBPO with his regiment secured the wals of the citie so that about as he had in charge from the Generall: and without respect put so forward that he met armed or vnarmed. At the bulwarke called BARRABVS, it fortune him to light vpon a company of Italians, who for a while fought desperately, but were in the end ouerthrowne and slaine. When he had thus cleared the wals, and left such companies as he thought good in places convenient for the keeping of them, he came downe into the more open places of the citie: and seeing them that were gathered together into the market place to haue cast themselves into fighting and to fight as men altogether desperat, he caused certaine murthering pieces to be bent vpon them: which they perceiving, layed downe their weapons, and yeelded themselves vnto the mercie of the enemy. By and by all the gates of the citie were strongly guarded by the enemy, to the intent that no man should goe in or out. Dandulus the Gouernor, and Contarenus bishop of PAPHOS, with the rest of the nobilitie and better sort of the citizens, had got themselves into the towne hall, and there stood vpon their guard: vnto whom Mustapha sent word, that hee would would take them all to mercie, if they would without further resistance yeeld themselves. But G while messengers run too and fro, the Turks violently brake in vpon them, and there slew them euery man: After the death of these noblemen the cruell enemy spared none: and hauing slaine such as they found abroad in the streets, brake into the houses, where they made haucke of all things: yong babes were violently taken out of the armes of their mothers, virgins were shamefully rauished, and honest matrones before their husbands faces dispiighfully abused; churches were spoyled, and all places filled with mourning and dead bodies: the streets were in all places stained with blood, for in the citie was slaine that day foureteene thousand eight hundred threescore and six persons. Neither was there any end of the spoile, vntill the greedie enemy had carried away all the wealth that long peace had heaped vp. It is reported, that the prey there taken amounted to twentie hundred thousand millions of duckats: two hundred of the most goodly H and beautifull youths were chosen out of purpose to be sent vnto CONSTANTINOPLE for a present for Selymus. In the citie were taken also two hundred and fiftie pieces of great ordinance: whereof some were by the enemy carried away, and the rest left for defence of the citie: Thus the famous citie of NICOSIA, sometime the regall seat of the kings of CYPRVS, fell into the hands of the Turks, the ninth day of September in the yeare 1570, in whose power it still remaineth.

Mustapha hauing as he thought best disposed of all things in NICOSIA, with the very terror of his name, rather than by any force, brought most part of the rest of the townes in the island vnder his obeisance; and by faire entreatie and promise of good vsage, brought backe againe vnto their wonted dwellings the rude country people, who vpon the comming of the Turks were fled with all that they had into the mountaines: them as men not to be feared, he commaunded I to till and sow their land as they were wont. The citie of CYRUS is strongly situated, not farre from the sea, and was then well furnished of all things needfull for the enduring of a long siege. Hither the Bassa sent one of his Sanzackes to summon the citie, more to proue the courage of the defendants, than for any hope he had to haue the citie deliuered vnto him. But Alphonsus Palacius then Gouverneur of the citie, terrified with the losse of NICOSIA, no sooner saw the enemy, but that without any further deliberation or force vsed against him, he deliuered vp the towne vnto the Sanzacke; couenanting only in reward of his cowardise, That he might in safetie depart from thence with all his garrison souldiours: which was easily graunted, and the citie surrendered.

Not long after Mustapha leauing a thousand horsemen and three thousand foot in garrison K in NICOSIA, marched with the rest of his armie to besiege FAMAGVSTA. And the more to terrifie them of the citie, he by a poore country fellow, whom he had for that purpose set at libertie, sent vnto them in a basket the head of Nicholas Dandulus, late Gouverneur of NICOSIA: and at the same time sent before him diuers horsemen, who vpon their horsemens staues carried the heads of many of the noblemen slaine at NICOSIA, wherewith they rid as in triumph about the wals of the citie. VVhich thing he did, in hope that they of FAMAGVSTA terrified with such a spectacle, and the late overthrow of NICOSIA, would for feare of like miserie yeeld themselves. But deceived in this his expectation, he encamped his armie about three miles from the citie. Afterwards hauing taken view of the citie, and well considered of the situation thereof, he L with wonderfull celeritie cast vp diuers mounts against the same, and at the same time caused batterie to be layed against the great tower which defended the haven: he himselfe also in the mean while battering the gate that leadeth to AMATHVS. But perceiving by the desperat sallies of the defendants their great courage, and that he was like to haue much more to doe in this siege than he had in the winning of NICOSIA, and Winter also now drawing fast on (being about the latter end of September) he thought it best betime to provide; that by lying there he hazarded not the honour he had with so much labour and danger before gained: and the rather, for that it was commonly reported, that the Christian fleet was at hand: wherefore he rise with his armie, and retired himselfe further off into the country, where he shortly after billirked his souldiours in the villages round about for that Winter.

The Bassa at sea, Halys and Piali, lying before FAMAGVSTA, doubting the comming of the M Christian fleet, which then lay at CRETE, sent out six galliots to discouer the doings of the Christians: who returning with certaine prisoners taken in the Island of CRETE, declared vnto the Bassa what they had learned concerning the Christian fleet, and that it was alreadie vpon the way for CYPRVS. Vpon which intelligence the Bassa put their fleet in order of battell, and set forward

A forward towards LIMISSO, to haue met with the Christians: who with a prosperous wind were comming betwixt the islands of CARPATHOS and the RHODOS: but there vnderstanding by their espials, that NICOSIA was lost, and that the Turks were come to besiege FAMAGVSTA, they called a counsell of all the cheefe commanders in the fleet, to consult what were best to doe in so dangerous a case. Columnius the Popes Admirall, and then cheefe commander in the fleet, with Zaninus the Venetian Admirall, were of opinion, That it were best to hold on their course for CYPRVS, and to relieue FAMAGVSTA: for that it was like that the Turks proud of their late victorie, were for desire of prey for most part gone ashore into the island, and so left their fleet but slenderly manned. Beside that they alleadged, That the Venetian Senat had expressly decreed, that they should giue the Turks battell. But Suria the Spanish Admirall thinking it, as indeed it was, to be a matter of great difficultie and danger, was quite of another mind. B saying, That he could not but matuell, how the Venetian Senatours sitting at their ease in counsell, could before they knew their owne strength, and power of the enemy, the nature of the country, and purpose of their foes, determine what were fit for martiall men to doe: vnto whose actions no certaine rule could bee prescribed: All the shores (he said) were kept with the enemies garrisons: so that what need soeuer they should haue, they could neither come by water or wood, or put into any harbour. Besides that, the enemy would giue them battell at his owne pleasure, and not at theirs: for that they were not of such power as to enforce him to fight. And that if the Senate, which vsed to doe all things wisely, and with great aduise, did but see the weaknesse of their gallies, wanting both souldiours and martiners, C they would be of another mind. He alleadged further, that they were to wage warre in the enemies country, where there was no port to receiue their fleet, no peaceable place, no confederat citie, nor king to friend: whereas the time of the yeare grew euery day worse and worse, when as they had neither harbour to put into, neither were able to abide the sea. And now that NICOSIA was lost, for the reliefe whereof they were come so farre, there was no reason for them longer to stay, the enemy so strongly possessing the island with his great armie, as that there was not any hope to doe any good against him. And that to keepe him from victuall, and so to distresse him, was not possible, lying in a most fertile island, and in the midst of his owne dominions: whereas they, who were to be still relieved from farre, should sooner feeble the want than the enemy. He was victualled (as he said when he came from home) but for three monthes, in hope to D haue made a short dispatch, and had now two thousand miles home. He said moreover, That he had expresse commaundement from the king, to returne to MESSANA before Winter; and that therefore so soone as the month was out, he would depart. The Venetian Admirall desiring nothing more, than by battell at sea to ouerthrow the Turks, and so to relieue the distressed Cypriots, vrged the Spanish Admirall to proceed in the voyage, saying, That so great aid was not sent from the Pope and the king, onely for the reliefe of NICOSIA, but to deliuer the whole island from the danger of the Turke. Of the same opinion with the Spanish Admirall were diuers other great captains in the fleet, namely Sfortia; who said, That nothing was to be so done, as might rashly expose vnto casualtie or power of the enemy, the publike fortune and maiestie of the Christian commonweale, which was in that fleet greatly hazarded: That longer stay E might bring further danger: That in that fleet consisted the whole welfare of the commonweale; wherein more might be lost, if any mishap should chance therunto, than was good to be gained by the relieuing of FAMAGVSTA. The great commanders thus differing in opinions, the counsell was in a heat dissolued, and nothing concluded: Vpon which so soone a disagreement the fleet began now to returne backe againe, but so, as that it was not now as before one, but three fleets, euery Admirall by himselfe drawing after him his fleet. Suria the Spanish Admirall, who first returned, after he had bene two dayes wonderfully with tempest tossed at sea, came at last to CARPATHOS, and departing thence, with much adoe arrived with his fleet in the island of CRETE: from whence hee by a messenger sent of purpose, requested leaue of Columnius the Popes Admirall, that he might with his good will presently returne home: wherunto Columnius answered, That he would giue him no such leaue: but rather charged him in the dutie he ought to the good of the Christian commonweale not to depart, but to keepe companie with the rest of the fleet, vntill it were past ZACYNTHVS; that so with their vnitied forces they might more safely passe by their enemies countries: Whereas otherwise, if any thing should by his hastie departure fall out otherwise than well, it should be imputed to the dishonour of him that had for- D d d d taken faken his friends, and not of them that were so by him forsaken. But vnto this Auria answered, That the welfare of the kingdomes of SICILIE and NAPLES, consisted in the safetie of this fleet: and that therefore hauing halt home, he could not stay to keepe companie with their heauie galassies and other ships of burthen, which must oftentimes be towed forward: This he openly pretended for his departure, yet secretly fought (as it was deemed) to find an occasion whereby to withdraw himselfe (being as he accounted the better man at sea) from the command of Columnius, whereunto he was full sore against his will subject.

After they had thus a while spent the time with reasoning the matter too and fro, Auria of himselfe without farther leaue hoisted saile, and so at length came to MESSANA in SICILIE: neither did Columnius and Zanius stay in those quarters long after him, but hauing endured much trouble at sea, arrived at last, Columnius in ITALIE, and Zanius at CORCYRA. Thus this nightie fleet, which had all this Sommer filled the Mediterranean with all the countries thereabout with the expectation of some great matter, was by the discord of the Generals dissolved, hauing done nothing at all worth the remembrance. In this idle expedition many thousands of right valiant men lost their liues, being dead of diuers diseases proceeding of change of diet, and vnseasonableness of the weather in that hot climat; amongst whom was the valiant countie Hieronimus Marteningus sent by the Senat with three thousand souldiors, for the defence of FAMAQVSTA; who also most of them perished in that voiage. The Venetian fleet was no sooner arrived at CORCYRA, but Augustinus Barbadius was sent from the Senat to discharge Zanius the Admirall of his office, and to send him prisoner to VENICE: in whose roome was placed Sebastianus Venerius Gouvernour of that island.

The Turks Bassaes at sea, certainly aduertised of the departure of the Christian fleet, were not a little prowd thereof; as by the confession of their enemies, their betters. Yet for as much as the seas began then to grow rough, and no enemy appeared, they thought it to no purpose to keepe the seas with so great a fleet, and therefore resolved to leaue Mustapha with his armie in CYPRVS, the next yeare to make an end of his conquest so happily begun; and seauen gallies at sea before FAMAQVSTA, that no reliefe should that way be brought into the citie, and so to depart themselves with the rest of the fleet to Winter in more safer harbours: Piall with the greater part of the fleet to CONSTANTINOPLE, and Haly with the rest to the RHODES. And because they would for their greater credit prepare some worthe present for their great lord and master Selymus, they fraught a great gallion of Mubamets the chiefe Bassaes, and two other tall ships, with the richest of the spoile of Nicosia, and the choise of the prisoners there taken. But when they were now readie to hoise saile and depart, as they were carrying out of the gallion certaine barrells of gunpowder which Mustapha the Generall had commaunded for his better prouision to be landed, a noble gentlewoman captiue in the gallion, wishing rather to die with honour than to liue dishonoured, secretly fired the powder: by force whereof, the same gallion with the other two ships were suddenly rent in pieces, and all that was therein blowne vp into the ayre. Of all that were in those three vessels, none escaped with life but the master of the gallion and two Christian captiues, but there perished together with the rich spoile. But the Bassaes following their former resolution departed from CYPRVS, and afterwards in safetie arrived at CONSTANTINOPLE: where both then and all the Winter following, such preparation was in making, as if Selymus had the next yeare purposed some farre greater matter than the conquest of CYPRVS.

Whilest Sebastianus Venerius (now the Venetian Admirall) yet lay at CORCYRA, the rude Actrocrautian people, more famous for nothing than for their theft, and want of all things, by trustie messengers promised to deliuer into his power the strong castle of CHYMERA, kept by a garrison of three hundred Turks, if he himselfe with a few gallies and a convenient number of footmen would come into the bay of AMERACIA; offering him good hostages for the better assurance of their promise. Of which their offer he gladly accepted, and forthwith went to the appointed place with a companie of horsemen, three thousand footmen, and certaine gallies; who were no sooner landed, but that presently a thousand of those rough mountaine people came vnto them: with which power taking the hill, and repulsing the Turks garrison; coming to the reliefe of the castle, he so discouraged them that were in the hold, that the next night they let themselves downe with ropes into the valley below: but being descried, were there all either taken or slaine. And so in a verie short time was that strong castle taken by the Admirall, and a

A strong garrison of Christians put into it in stead of the Turkes.

Not long after, Quirinus the Viceadmirall, a man of great courage, landed with foure and twentie gallies in PELOPONNESVS neere the bay of MAINA, and there vpon the sudden both by sea and land besieged a strong castle, which the Turks but two yeares before had built to trouble the Christians passing that way. Which castle he tooke in sixe houres, and put to the sword sixe hundred Turkes which lay there in garrison, and raising it downe to the ground carried away with him foure and twentie great peeces of artillerie into the island of ZACYNTHVS.

At such time as Mustapha before lay at the siege of FAMAQVSTA, Brigadinus Gouvernour of the towne, with Baleonius a most expert capitaine, from out of the high places of the citie beholding the great armie of the Turkes (which couered the ground almost as farre as they could see) with their cunning manner of their fortification, were therewith much moued; and therefore thought it good betime to giue the Senat knowledge thereof, and in so great a danger to craue their aid. And that their request might be of more waight and haue the better hearing, they entreated Hieronimus Ragaronius bishop of the citie, a reuerend and deuout man, to take vpon him that charge, vnto whom they joyned Nicholas Donatus, a noble gentleman of CYPRVS. The bishop at the first was verie vnwilling to go, as loath in so great danger to leaue his flocke: but at length overcome with the entreatie of the Gouvernour, and teares of the besieged, suffered himselfe to be entreated. And embarked in a gallie about the going downe of the Sunne, loosing out of the haven, and hoising saile, with a faire gale of wind passed through the Turkes fleet, which then lay at anchor before the citie; and by the comming on of the night, and by the great way he made, got him quickly out of sight. After foure daies sayling he came to CRATA, and so at length to VENICE: where, as he had before vnto the Admirall, so there vnto the Senat he declared the dangerous estate of the citie, the strength of the enemy, the weaknesse of the defendants against so great a multitude, and the want of many things needfull for the holding out of the siege: and to be brieft, that except they sent speedie reliefe, the citie could not be kept. Zanius at that time Admirall, carefull for the besieged, caused foure tall ships to be laden with all manner of victuall, and a great quantitie of gunpowder, and put into them seauenteene hundred select souldiors: all which he sent from CRATA to the reliefe of them of FAMAQVSTA, appointing M. Antonius Quirinus with twelue of the best gallies in all the fleet, to conduct the same thither. This Quirinus was a most valiant and expert capitaine, meanelie descended, but by seruice growne to be a man both of great reputaton and wealth: and therefore Zanius at his departure to VENICE, although he knew the matter required hast, yet presuming vpon his wisdom and carefulnesse, left it to his discretion, when, and how to performe that peece of seruice. Quirinus (not without cause) doubting to set forward, the seas as then full of the Turkes gallies, staid vntill Winter was well spent, and then setting forward the seauenteenth of Ianuarie, kept aloofe from the ships, which with a prosperous wind came directly before FAMAQVSTA: in hope, that the Turkes gallies which lay in the mouth of the haven, might so be drawne farther into the sea, in hope of some good bootie, he himselfe staying with his gallies in place convenient out of sight. Neither had the event deceived his expectation, had not his fierce nature hindered the same: for the Turkes vpon the dawning of the day descrying the ships, made hastily toward them. But Quirinus not able longer to stay himselfe, and before desirous to fight with them, shewed himselfe too soone in the open sea before the enemy was come neere the ships: whom as soone as the Turks had seene, and that there was no hope to withstand him, they staid their oares, and with all speed retired. But Quirinus following faster vpon them, they were glad for safegard of their liues, with all the power they could, to run three of their gallies aground, and to run to shoare themselves: which three gallies, Quirinus did with his great ordinance beat all to peeces, and so gauleth the other foure. The haven thus cleared, he returned againe vnto the ships, and brought them with the supplie in safetie to FAMAQVSTA: vpon whose arrivall was great reioicing, both amongst the garrison souldiors & the citizens: for the Turks thought nothing lesse than that the Christian gallies durst at that time of the yeare haue put into those dangerous seas: which Quirinus well knowing, came forth againe with his gallies, and roaming vp and downe at his pleasure, tooke two of the enemies ships richly laden comming vnto the camp, with which bootie he enriched his souldiors: and farther incited by occasion, landed his men in diuers places along the sea coast in PAMPHILIA, and there did great harme. So hauing filled the countrey with the terrour and fame of his name, he returned againe to FAMAQVSTA, where he notably encouraged the garrison souldiours, persuading them to remember their wonted valour: and filling them with hope, that the Christian fleet would be with them in the beginning of the next Sommer, to deliuer them from their enemies, and to raise the siege. So hauing in twentie daies dispatched that he came for, and done what good seruice else he could, he departed from FAMAGUSTA, and within fise daies after arrived at CRETE.

It was not long, but Selymus had knowledge of this late supply put into FAMAGUSTA, and of the harmes done by Quirinus; wherewith he was so highly displeased, that he commaunded the Gouverneur of CHIOS his head to be stricke off, and the Gouverneur of the RHODOS to be disgraced, whose charge it was to haue kept those seas so that nothing should haue been conuaided into FAMAGUSTA. Neither spared he Pial Bassa, but deprived him of his Admiraltie, and placed Pertau Bassa Admirall in his stead: for that he had not the yeare before discomfited the Christian fleet at the island of CRETE, as it was supposed he might haue done.

From the beginning of this warre, the Venetians, with Pius Quintus then Pope who greatly fauoured their cause, had most earnestly from time to time solicited Philip king of SPAIN, to enter with them into the participation and fellowship of this warre; which their request standing in deed with the good of his state, he seemed easily to yeeld vnto: and therefore sent Auria his Admirall the last yeare with his fleet to aid them, but with such successe as is before declared. As for to joyne with them in a perpetuall league and confederation (as it was tearmed) against the common enemy, that he referred vnto the discreet consideration of the two Cardinals, Granuelan and Pace, and Io. Zunica his embassadour, sent for that purpose to ROME: promising to performe whatsoeuer they should on his behalfe agree vpon or consent vnto. At the same time, and for the same purpose lay also Surianus the Venetian embassadour at ROME: vnto whom the Pope joyned Cardinall Morone, Aldobrandinus, and Rusticinus, with certaine other of the chiefe Cardinals, as men indifferent to both parties, to moderat and compose such differences and difficulties as should arise betwixt the aforesaid commissioners for the king, and the Venetians, concerning the intended league. But these graue men, sent from so great princes about so great a matter (as well there could not be a greater) were no sooner met together and set in consultation, but that forthwith they began to jarre about the capitulations of the league. Necessarie it was thought, that a league should be agreed vpon against so puissant and dangerous an enemy, but to find the way how the same might be concluded to the contentment of all parties, seemed a matter almost impossible. Oftentimes these commissioners sat, but the oftener the farther off: if one difficultie were by the discretion of some appeased, in stead thereof at the next meeting arise three others. The chiefe commaund of the armie to be raised, the proportion of the forces, the manner of the war, with many other such like circumstances incident to so great actions, made great differences among them: but most of all, the indifferent proportioning of the charge, the Spanish commissioners seeking to turne the greatest part thereof vpon the Venetians, and the Venetians vpon them: which was done with such earnestnesse and studie of euery man towards his owne part, as if they had all there met for the bettering of the particular state from which they were sent, rather than for the common good: For the Spaniard, who in former time was glad to keepe the frontiers of his large dominions in ITALIE, SICILIE, SARDINIA, CORSICA, MAIORCA, MINORCA, yea and of SPAIN it selfe, with strong garrisons for feare of the Turke: now that the warre was risen betwixt the Venetians and him, and the danger thereof translated farre off into other mens territories: enjoyed now in his owne an vnwonted quietnesse, to the great content of his subjects, & easing of his owne charge in maintaining of so many garrisons as before: whereof many were now thought needlesse. Besides that, he by the indulgence of the Pope, raised such great summes of money vpon his cleargie, as was thought by many sufficient to discharge the charge of the warre: For which causes he cared not for entering into any farther league with the Venetians, but as it were of courtesie to send them a yearely aid to maintain a defensue lingering war, and so to keepe the Turke busied vpon the Venetian a far off from his owne territories: But the Venetians, in whose dominions the fierce enemy daily ragged, as well in DALMATIA as in CYPRUS, were euen for the same reasons moued to hasten and shorten the war, that the Spaniard was to protract it: for beside the neerenesse of the danger, and the infinit calamities by the sustained, their yearly reuenues arising for most part of their customes, were greatly empaiied, and their traffique (the maintenance of their State) almost quite cut off, which caused them more earnestly to confederat themselves with the Spaniard. But hard it was

A to joyne in one, States so farre differing, in respect of their particular professe, and almost by nature contrarie. Thus was all the last yeare, and a great part of this also, spent by the aforesaid commissioners in turbulent and fruitlesse conferences, but nothing as yet concluded concerning the league: which troubled the Venetians not a little, being of themselves too weak for so mightie an enemy as was Selymus, and yet no other certaine strength from their friends to rest vpon. But while they stood thus doubtfull of the league with SPAIN, and quite out of hope of any attouement with Selymus: vpon the sudden when they least expected, it was by good fortune laid as it were in their laps, to make choise whether they would (as they had before most earnestly desired) joyne in league with the Pope and the king of SPAIN, or else fall to agreement with Selymus: and that by this meanes.

B Muhamet the chiefe Bassa, a secret friend vnto the Venetians of whom he had been of long time honoured, had no great liking of the prosperous successe of Musapha his brother, and therefore deuised night and day how to crosse the rising of him, the competitor of his honours: and withall, to help the Venetians vnto whom he was much beholden. He by secret meanes long since had before oftentimes sounded the mind of the Venetian embassadour, and put him in hope, that if suite were made vnto Selymus for peace, it would vndoubtedly be granted; and farther promised, to be himselfe an helper and intercessour for the same. But finding the embassadour to cast many perils, and to giue small credit vnto their talke, who had before by trusting them, deceived him: he did not so giue ouer the matter, but referring the farther tempering with him vnto a more fitter time, for the present he tooke opportunitie to enter into discourse with Selymus: C himselfe concerning the Venetians, and told him that it was reported, that they weaie of all long alteration they had had with the Spaniards concerning the league, and now destitute of all hope and aid, would now happily of their owne accord grant him that which they had before to him denied. And perceiuing him not vnwillingly to heare so of them, he proceeded farther in the matter, to know his pleasure what he would haue done therein: cunningly by the way of good counsell persuading him vnto that which he most wished himselfe to be done. Immediately after he secretly aduertised M. Antonius the Venetian embassadour, that there was great hope of peace, and that therefore the Senat should vnder the colour of exchanging of prisoners, and redeeming of merchants goods, send some fit man to CONSTANTINOPLE, with whom he would in secret conferre of all such matters as might further the pacification. This vniexpected D newes from the embassadour brought to VENICE, was well heard of the Senat: for they thought it much to concerne their State, to haue a way opened whereby vpon tollerable conditions to make peace with the mightie tyrant, if that the league betwixt them and the king of SPAIN could not be concluded. Hereupon they made choise of one Iacobus Ragazonius to go about this matter to CONSTANTINOPLE. This Ragazonius was a man of great spirit and dexteritie of wit to take any matter in hand, and of a great reach and deepe judgement in the managing thereof; and withall exceeding rich, and of so good a carriage of himselfe, as that he was therefore famous: all which things were thought of great moment, to win the fauour of that courteous and barbarous nation. The Senat, although they had not yet made proofe what men thought of the matter, yet doubted they not, but that vpon the report of the sending of this notable man, E men would thereof diuersly diuine euery man according to his owne fantasie: and that many of the wiser sort would indeed surmise, as the truth was, that he was sent for to intreat of peace; although the exchange of prisoners, and redemption of merchants goods, were the onely things, were openly pretended: and the Senat, although they thought it not amisse to haue it so vnderstood, because such a suspition was like enough to stirre vp both the Pope and the Spaniard to accept of such conditions of the desired league, as they had before rejected: yet least the hope of the league (which they for many causes thought good to cherish) thereby cut off, might cause the Pope and the Spaniard both to be cold in the matter, they certified both them and other Christian princes, of the sending of Ragazonius; yet of purpose concealing the secret drift of his going: Ragazonius thoroughly instructed by the Senat, was in a galie conducted to RAGUSIUM; which F Cassan-beg (the great Bassa Muhamets sonne, Gouverneur of LISYRNIA) vnderstanding, met him vpon the frontiers, and told him, That he was sent by his father both to meet him and safe conduct him: which the martiall man, contrarie to the manner of the Turkes courteously performed, honourably entertaining him, and afterward sending him with a safe conuoy vntill hee was out of all danger. Ragazonius comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, was there by night se cretly receiued into the citie, and at first brought into a little bafe Inne, and a guard set ouer him G that he should speake with no man. But after three dayes he was remooued to a much better place, and presented with diuers kinds of daintie dishes of sundrie kinds of meats. The effect of his message was, to trie the Turks minds, and after conference had with the embassadour to entreat of peace. At length hauing accessē vnto the great Bassa Muhamet, after he had deliuered vnto him (as he had in charge) his message concerning the exchange of prisoners and marchants goods; Muhamet asked him, if he had nothing in charge from the Senat concerning a pacification to be made? VV hereunto he answered, that he had, but that he must first speake with the embassadour, without whose aduice and counsell he was not of himselfe to doe any thing. At that first encounter the Bassa to terrifie the messenger, declared vnto him the innumerable multitude of the Turks horsemen and footmen, which no nation (as he vainly boasted) was able by force or policie to withstand: also his great and inuincible fleets at sea, with whom all the power of the Christians vnited together, was not able to encounter; and much other such like strength and wealth of his: and that the Venetians were now no more able to withstand Selymus, than they were in times past to resist his father and his auncestors. Yet he discoursed of this matter in such sort, as not thereby to cut off the hope of the pacification: but said, That the Venetians should best haue provided for the safetie of their state, if at the first they had listened vnto him, friendly and faithfully aduising them not to haue entred into armes, in which doing they shewed more courage than power: and that yet, as the case now stood, and that Selymus was in a most assured hope, in short time to become lord and master of the whole island; it should bee to their great good to preferre the fauour and good will of the Turks before warre, and by the voluntarie yielding vp of CYPRVS gaine vnto themselves perpetuall peace and tranquillitie. As for the island it selfe, it was not now worth the hazarding of so many dangers, being destitute of inhabitants, which were almost all either slaine or fled, the cattell driuen away, the townes ranackt and burnt, and the whole countrey, of late most pleasant and beautifull, now so spoyled and vnpeopled, that it could not of long time yeeld vnto him that should haue it, any profit or commoditie. Ragazonius being a coole and aduised man, and withall perceiuing that the Bassa was not to be contraried in his talke, so tempered his answer, as that he shewed no token of feare, neither let any word fall that might offend his eares, saying, That he was right glad, that he had found so much fauour in his sight, as to haue accessē and leaue to talke with so great a prince, who for wisdom and grauitie excelled all the rest of the princes of the great emperours court: who so farre as he K might, with his loyaltie towards his soueraigne, had alwayes most graciously fauoured the Venetian state: who also not ignorant of the vncertainetie of worldly things, knew of all others best, that on both sides were both men and armes, and that most mightie princes had oftentimes with small forces beene ouerthrowne, the euent of things neuer deceiuing men more than in matters of warre; no power vpon earth being sure, which could not within some bounds containe the strength of it selfe: and that therefore he was in good hope, That he so worthie a man knowing best what belonged both to peace and warre, would deuise some such course as might sort to the good and quiet both of the Venetian state and Turkish empire: in which doing hee should find sufficient matter for his eternall praise and glorie, if by his discret wisdom a pacification might be made. Such talke hauing passed at their first meeting, Ragazonius had leaue to speake L with the embassadour, who then lay at PERRA vnder safe keeping. In passing ouer to PERRA, Ragazonius might see a fleet of Turkish gallies one encountering with another, in manner of a fight at sea, which the Turks had of purpose provided, to shew vnto him as a strange sight. VV hereat Ragazonius smiling, said vnto the Turks that were present with him, That it was a pretie childish sport for him that had neuer seene the like before: but not to the Venetians, who were acquainted with these matters in earnest; as the Turkes should well know, whensoever they had a mind to make prooffe what they were able to doe at sea. Ragazonius comming to the embassadour, had conference with him at large, and resolved with him what to do in his negotiation. And so returning to Muhamet, easily dispatched with him for the exchange of prisoners & marchants goods: but when they came to talke of the capitulations of a pacification to be made, at the first they M were so farre off, as if they would neuer haue met: but after much and often conference, sometime the one yielding, and sometime the other, the matter was brought to some conformitie, so that there was no such great difference betwixt them, but that they were like ynough to haue agreed. Pius the Pope, and Philip the king of SPAIN aduertised of the sending of Ragazonius to

The Pope and the king of Spain seeing least the Venetians should make peace with the Turke, hasten the confederation

A to CONSTANTINOPLE, began to imagine as the truth was, that he was sent about some treaty of peace, what colour soeuer the Senat pretended to couer the same. And therefore doubting least the Turkish emperour hauing once made peace with the Venetians, should turne his great forces already prepared, vpon the one or both of them, they thought it good for troubling of that peace, now with all speed to hasten the league, which they had so long before delayed. For which purpose the Pope sent the noble Columnius to VANICE: who admitted into the Senat, declared at large how matters had passed at ROMA concerning the league: and afterwards what profit might arise of such a league concluded, and what harmes might ensue of the same; neglected. And to hasten the matter, set as it were before their eyes, how much it concerned the common good, but them especially, to haue the same with speed confirmed: As for to giue any trust vnto the Turks, was (as he said) not befitting their deepe wisdom and judgement, seeing they so often had beene by them rather deceiued than vanquished. In conclusion, he requested them, That for his Holiness sake, moderating in some part their hard demands, they would with speed ioyne with him and the king in a most firme and Christian league. Although this speech of Columnius had much moued the minds of the Venetians, so that many inclined to the league, yet were there many doubtfull thereof, and could not be resolved whether it were better to embrace peace with the Turke, or the league with the Pope and the king. Peace pleased them; neither did the league displease them: it seemed a matter most difficult whether to resolve vpon. They were fearefull of the league either receiued, or rejected: the hope of victorie, the inconstancie of the Turkes, their owne strength at sea, the large promises of the Christian princes, the certaine hope of the league, and vncertainetie of the peace, perswaded them to embrace the league: C On the other side, the bad successe of the yeare before, their forces shaken, and almost spent in CYPRVS, the suspected and doubtfull faith of their confederates; with the vncertainetie of the successe, induced them to preferre the hoped peace before the league. So the Venetians in suspense betwixt both, gaue the embassadour dayly more doubtfull answers than other: neither by promise binding themselves, neither by flat deniall cutting off the hope of the league, by examples & arguments rather refelling what was by others alledged, than any way declaring what they themselves thought. Sometime they alledged such things as might make a man beleue, that they were willing to ioyne in league, and by and by againe they would seeme neither to reject nor accept of the same. In which doubtfulness many dayes passed. At length the matter being D propounded in the Senat, there found not vnlike disposition of minds that it had amongst the meaner sort: for some of the Senators inclined to the league, whose reasons were grounded not vpon profit only, but vpon credit and honour also, which they wished to be cheefely regarded: declaring also what great securitie, honour, and glorie should redound vnto them, by entering into such an honourable league. But the remembrance of former losses, the strength of the Turke possessing a great part of the world, compared vnto their owne, the terrour of the enemies name, the feare of euill successe, the small hope of preuailling, induced others to like better of peace: whose opinion was also confirmed by this, That the confederation with those Christians, was of no more assurance or continuance than the Turkes peace: Besides that, they alledged, That leagues were therefore of lesse assurance, for that confederations and amities were seldome E or neuer sincerely and faithfully kept on both sides, euery man commonly seruing his own turne, without care of other men. They also set as it were before their eyes what great occasions, euery small suspitions might giue princes to breake their leagues, what strange effects the feare of the losse of goods or some part of their territorie might worke. After this so weightie a matter had bene thus with great contention thoroughly debated on both sides in the Senat, it was at last put to voices: and so by the consent of the greater part the league was as more honorable receiued, and the Turkes peace rejected: and a decree of the Senat to that effect made. Ragazonius by secret letters from the Senat vnderstanding of all these matters, began to deale more warily with Muhamet the great Bassa in matter concerning the pacification, and more hardly to yeeld to his demands; and propounding many difficulties of purpose deuised, requested of him, That hee might by his good leaue returne to VANICE, to be resolved of many things by the Senat, whereof he was not able himselfe to judge, and so to returne to him againe with more certaine instructions: assuring him, that the Senat would vpon knowledge of the conditions of the peace doe and deuise many things for the furtherance of the same: which could not so well bee done by letters, as if he were there himselfe present to resolve them vpon euery particular. This his request quest obtained, he with great speed got him out of CONSTANTINOPLE but was scarcely got out of the gates, when report of the league which the Venetians had made with the Pope and the king of SPAIN, was brought vnto the Court, and had in short time filled the city: Which made all the way as he trauelled more troublesome, and frustrated that also, which was before concluded concerning the exchange of prisoners and marchants goods. Rega Conium being come to VENICE, declared at large in the Senat the drift and purpose of the Turke, and what conference he had had with the great Bassa, and in what forwardnesse the peace was: for which his discreet carriage of the matter, his wisdom was highly by the whole Senat commended, and he himselfe afterward honourably rewarded.

A perpetual league concluded betwixt the Pope, the King of Spaine, and the Venetians.

The proportioning of the charge of the warre against the Turke: and the other capitulation of the League.

In the meane time the commissioners at ROME after long consultation concluded a league, which they would haue to bee perpetuall, as well for inuasiue as defensive warres against the Turke: and was by solemne oath confirmed by the Pope, the king of SPAIN, and the Venetian Senat the foure and twentieth day of May, in the yeare 1571. For the execution of which league it was agreed vpon, That the sea & land forces should consist of two hundred gallies, an hundred ships, fiftie thousand footmen, and foure thousand five hundred horsemen; with a proportionat quantitie of great artillerie, victuals, & other things necessarie, to be euery yeare ready in March, or at farthest in Aprill, to meet together at such place in the East, as should be vnto them for that purpose appointed; to be employed as the Admirals saw cause, and as the present state of things should require. For maintenance of which charge it was agreed, That the king of SPAIN should defray the one halfe, and the other halfe to be deuided into three equal parts; whereof the Venetians should beare two parts, and the Pope the third; which if it should be too heauie for him, then that remained by him vndischarged, to be deuided into five parts, whereof the king was to discharge three, and the Venetians two. The charge thus proportioned, they tooke order also for the prouision of victuals, to be at a reasonable price taken vp in any the confederats dominions, where the armie or fleet should chance to stay: yet so, that it should bee at the king of SPAIN his discretion, out of his kingdomes of NAPLES and SICILIE, first to take his prouision for the victualling of GYLETTA, MALTA, and his owne naue. It was also agreed, That if the king of SPAIN should at any time, when as the confederats had no common war, invade ARGERS, TRIPOLIS, or TVNES, that then the Venetians should of their own charge aid him with fiftie gallies well appointed: As also, that the king should in like manner, and with like forces aid them, as oft as they should by the Turkes be invaded. But if it should fortune the Romane territorie to be invaded, that then the aforesaid princes should be bound with all their forces, to the vttermost of their power, to defend those places, and the person of the Pope. And that in managing of the confederate warre, the three Admirals should conferre together of all matters, and whatsoever the greater part should agree vpon, that to be reputed as agreed vpon by them all: That Don Iohn of AVSTRIA, Charles the fifth his naturall sonne, and brother to the king, should haue the cheefe commaund of the forces both at sea and land: but not to display his owne ensigne, but the common ensigne of the confederates: Also, that such places as should bee gained from the Turke by the confederat armie, should be deuided amongst the confederat princes, excepting TVNES, ARGERS, and TRIPOLIS, which should remaine onely to the king of SPAIN: That all controuersies arising amongst the Generals should be decided by the Pope, vnto whom the Venetians should lend twelue gallies, furnished of all things sauing men and victuals, which the Pope should of his owne charge supplie: which gallies at the end of the warre hee should againe deliuer, in such case as they then were: That an honourable place should be left for Maximilian the emperour, the French king, the king of POLONIA, and the king of PORTINGALL to enter into this league, whom with the rest of the Christian princes it should beseeeme the Pope to stir vp in so good a quarell: And that it should not be lawfull for any the aforesaid confederat princes to entreat of peace, or enter into league, without the knowledge and consent of the other confederates. And for the better proceeding of all things, it was agreed, That euery in Autumne the confederat princes should by their embassadours at ROME consult of the next yeares warres, and according as the time and occurrents should require, to determine, whether their forces were to be encreased or deminished. This league thus at length with much adoe concluded, was not long after in Iune with great pompe and triumph openly proclaimed in ROME, VENICE, and SPAIN, to the great joy of the greatest part of Christendome.

The league proclaimed.

Whilst

Whilst these things were in doing, the Venetians the more to entangle the Turke, thought it good to make proofe, if they might by any meanes stirre vp Tamas the Persian king to take vp armes against him: who as hee was a prince of great power, so did hee exceedingly hate the Turks, as well for the difference betwixt the Persians and them about matters of their vaine superstition, as for the manifold injuries he had oftentimes sustained. There was one Vincens Alexander, one of the Secretaries for the State, who hauing escaped out of prison at CONSTANTINOPLE, was but a little before come to VENICE, a warie wise man, and of great experience, who for his dexteritie of wit and skilfulnesse in the Turkish language, was thought of all others most fit to take in hand so great a matter. He hauing receiued letters and instructions from the Senat, and furnished with all things necessarie, traueilling through GERMANIE, POLONIA, and the forrests of MOSIA, in Turkish attire, came to MONASTRON, a port towne vpon the side of the Euxine or Blacke sea, at the mouth of the great riuer Boristhenes: where hee embarked himselfe for TRAPEZOND, but was by a contrarie wind driuen to SINOPE, a cite of great traffike; from whence he trauelled by rough and broken wayes to CVTAY, keeping still vpon the left hand, because he would not fall vpon any part of the Turks armie (which was then marching towards CYPVS through all those countries) neuerthelesse he fell vpon a part thereof, from which he with great danger rid himselfe, being taken for a Turke, and by blind and troublesome wayes, through rockes and forrests arrived at length at ERZIRUM, a strong cite of the Turks, then vpon the frontiers of the Turks dominions toward the Georgians. This journey of Alexanders was not kept so secret, but that it was vented at CONSTANTINOPLE by a spie, who vnder the colour of friendship haunting the Venetian embassadours house at PERA, had got certaine knowledge of the going of Alexander into PERSIA. Whereupon certaine courtiers were sent out with all speed to beset the three straight passages into PERSIA, whereby it was supposed he must of necessitie passe, with certaine notes also of the fauour of the man, of his stature, and other markes, whereby he was best to be knowne. But he in so dangerous a countrie doubting all things, and fearing such a matter, leauing his companie behind him, with incredible celeritie posted from ERZIRUM to TAVRIS, and was a great way gone before the Turks courtiers came into those quarters: who yet hearing of him, followed after as farre as they durst, but could not ouertake him. Alexander comming to TAVRIS, vnderstood that the court lay at CASBIN, about twelue dayes journey further vp into the countrey; comming thither the fourteenth of August of this yeare 1571, he chanced to meet with certaine English marchants, with whom he had beene before acquainted: by whose helpe he not onely got to speake with Ayder Tamas the kings third sonne, but learned of them also the manners and fashions of the Persian Court, and how to beare himselfe therein. The Persians by reason of the intollerable heat doe most of their businesse at that time of the yeare by night. Wherefore Alexander about midnight brought in to Ayder, declared vnto him the cause of his comming: and the next night admitted vnto the speech of his aged father, deliuered his letters of credence, and in the name of the Senat declared vnto him, with what perfidious dealing Selymus the Turkish emperor was about to take away CYPVS from the Venetians, with what greedinesse and pride he had set vpon the Christians, and that discharged of that warre, he would of all likelihood set vpon the Persians; hauing the selfsame quarell vnto the Persians that he had vnto the Venetians, that is, an ardent and insatiable desire of soveraigntie: a sufficient cause for the greedy Turke to repute euery king the richer that he was, the more his enemy. After that, setting forth to the full the prowesse of the Christians, the wonderfull preparation they had made both at sea and land, he perswaded the king with all his power to invade the Turke, now altogether busied in the warres of CYPVS, and to recouer againe such parts of his kingdome as Solyman the father of Selymus had taken from him: Warres he said were more happily managed abroad than at home: that since he alone (the Christian princes all then at quiet) had withstood the Turks whole force and power, he needed not now to doubt of his most prosperous successe, the Christian princes now joyning with him: That he was much vnmindfull of his former losses and wrongs, if he thought he enjoyed an assured peace; which he should find to be nothing els but a deferring of war vnto more vtter times: and that the Turke if he should ouerrun CYPVS, would forthwith turne his victorious armes vpon him: The end of one warre was (as he said) but the beginning of another: and that the Turkish empire could neuer stay in one state; and that he would obserue not the Turkes words, but his deeds; and how that the Orthoman emperours according to the oportunitie tunitie of the times, vsed by turnes, sometime force, sometime deceit, as best serued their purposes. That no princes had at all times by dissembled peace and vncertaine leagues more deluded some, vntill they had oppressed others. He wished also, that at length this his cunning dealing might appeare vnto the world: and that princes would thinke, that being combined together, they might more easily overcome the Turke, than being seperated, defend their owne: That in former times sometime will, sometime occasion, was wanting to them to vnite their forces: and that therefore they should now combine themselves for their common good against the common enemy: That it concerned no lesse the Persians, than the Christians, to haue the power of the Turke abated: and that this taking vp of armes, should be for the good of the Persian king howsoeuer things should fall out; if well, he should then recouer what he had before lost, with much more that was the Turkes: if otherwise, yet by voluntarie, eunning into armes to countenance himselfe, and to giue the Turkes occasion to thinke that he feared him not:

 which was (as he said) the onely way to preferue their common safetie, which would be vnto all the confederat princes easie enough, if they themselves made it not more difficult than the power of the enemy. The speech of the embassadour was willingly heard: whereunto the king answered, that he would consider therupon what he had to doe: and in the meane while, a faire house was appointed for the embassadour and his followers, and bountifull allowance appointed for the kings charge. He was also many times sumptuously feasted by the noblemen, whom he still requested to be mediators vnto the king, to take that honourable warre in hand. The king had at that time a sonne called Ismael, a man of a great spirit, whom he then kept in durance, for that he with too much insolencie made roades into the frontiers of the Turkes dominions, to the disturbance of the league his father had before made with the late Turkish emperor Salyman:
 vnto him Alexander hauing access, was of him courteously heard; who sitting and languishing for verie griefe of reuenge vpon the Turkes, wished, that either the king his father had his mind, or he himselfe the power of a king: and said, That if euer it were his good fortune to obtaine the kingdome, he would in deed shew what he then in mind thought. But of him more shall be said hereafter. Whilest this matter went more slowly forward in the Persian court than the embassadour would haue had it, newes was brought vnto the court, of the great victorie which the Christians had much about that time obtained of the Turkes at sea: vpon which occasion the embassadour solicited the king more earnestly than before, to make himselfe partaker of the victorie of the Christians, by entering into confederation with them, and by taking vp of armes; rather than to hold vncertain friendship with the Turkes in their miseries, by whom he had been so often wronged. This he said was the onely time for the Persian king to recouer his former glorie, the like offer whereof would neither often chance, neither long stay: and that if he suffered so fit an opportunitie to slip away, he should afterwards in vaine wish for the same, when it were too late. This so wholesome counsell was well heard, but preuailed nothing to stir vp the aged king: who then troubled with rebellion in MEDIA, or wearie of the former warres he had had with the Turke, and glad of such peace as he had then with him, answered the em-bassadour, That for as much as the Christian princes had made a perpetuall league amongst themselves, he would for two yeares expect the event, and afterward as occasion serued, so to resolute vpon peace and warre. This improuident resolution of the king, brought afterward vnto profitable and too late repentance vnto the whole Persian kingdome; when as within a few yeares after, all the calamities which the Senat had by their embassadour (as true prophets) foretold, redounded vnto the great shaking thereof. For the Cyprian warre once ended, and peace concluded with the Venetians, Amurath the sonne of Selymus succeeding, his father in the Turkish empire, inuading the Persian king, tooke from him the great countrey of MEDIA, now called SILVANIA, with a great part of ARMENIA the great, and the regall citie of TAVRIS, as shall be hereafter in due place declared. At which time the Persian, who now refused to take vp armes, or joine in league with the Christian princes, repented that he had not before hearkened vnto the wholesome counsell of the Venetians: and taught by his owne harmes, wished in vaine, that the Christian princes would againe take vp armes and joyne with him against the Turke.

A thought he had in his armie two thousand men: began now that Winter was past, in the latter end of Aprill, to draw neerer vnto FAMAGUSTA, and with incredible labour to cast vp trenches and mounts against the citie, of such height, that the defendants from the highest places of the citie could scarcely see the points of the Turks speares, or top of their tents, as they lay encamped:
 which was no great matter for the Bassa to performe, hauing in his campe fortie thousand pioners alwaies readie at his command.

The citie of FAMAGUSTA is situate in the East end of the island, in a plaine and low ground betwixt two promontories, the one called S. Andrewes head, and the other the head of G. A-CIA. It is in circuit foure miles, and in forme fouresquare; but that the side toward the East, longer and more winding than the rest, doth much deforme the exact figure of a quadrangle: it is almost on two parts beaten vpon with the sea, the other parts towards the land are defended with a ditch not about fiftene foot broad, a stone wall, and certaine bulwarks and parapets. Vpon the gate that leadeth to MATHVS standeth a six cornered tower: other towers stand out also in the wall, euerie of them scarce able to containe six pieces of artillerie. It hath a haven opening toward the Southeast, defended from the injurie of the weather by two great rocks, betwixt which the sea commeth in by a narrow passage about fortie paces ouer; but after opening wider giueth a conuenient harbour to ships, whereof it cannot containe any great number, and was now shut vp with a strong chaine. Neere vnto the haven standeth an old castle with foure towers, after the auncient manner of building. There was in the citie one strong bulwarke, built after the manner of the fortifications of our time, with palisadoes, curtaines, casemates, and such like, in such manner, as that it seemed almost impregnable. All which, although they made shew of a strong and well fortified citie, yet for that there wanted many things, it was thought too weake long to hold out against the great power of the Turke: but what wanted by reason of the situation and weake fortification, that the Gouverneur and other noble captaines supplied in best sort they might, with a strong garrison of most valiant souldiours, the surest defence of strong places. There was in the citie two thousand and fise hundred Italians, two hundred Albanoies horsemen, before entertained by the Gouverneur; and of the Cypriots themselves were mustered two thousand and fise hundred mo, all men resolutely set downe to spend their liues in defence of their countrey.

The description of Famagusta.

The number of the defendants
 of Famagusta.

Mustapha with wonderfull celeritie hauing brought to perfection his fortifications, planted
 D his batterie of sixtie foure great pieces; amongst which were foure great basilisks of exceeding bignesse, wherewith he continually without intermission battered the wals of the citie in fise places, but especially that part of the wall that was betweene the haven and the gate that leadeth to MATHVS. And with great mortar pieces cast vp huge stones, which from high falling into the citie, with their waight brake downe the houses they light vpon, and fell often times through their vaults, euen into the bottome of their cellars, to the great terror of the besieged. The wals in diuers places fore shaken and the houses beaten downe, he began to assault the citie: which the defendants (their forces yet whole) valiantly repulsed, and not onely defended their wals and draue the Turkes from the breaches, but furiously sallied out vpon them, and hauing slaine and wounded many, wonderfully disturbed their fortifications, and abated their courage: neither did E the enemy with greater furie maintaine the batterie or assault, than did the Christians the defence of the citie, still sending their deadly shot into the thickest of that great multitude; inso much that in few daies the Bassa had lost thirtie thousand of his men: and the captaines themselves wondering at the valour of the defendants, as if they had not now to doe with such Christians as they had before so oftentimes ouerthrowne, but with some other strange people, began to dispaire of the winning of the citie. The Turkes thus doubting, and almost at a stand, the Christians in the meane time made vp their breaches with earth, baskets, wool-sacks, and such like, not sparing their verie beds and bedclothes, chests, carpets, and whatsoever else might serue to fill vp the breach: Amongst many wants they feared, the greatest was the want of powder, which with continuall shooting began greatly to be diminished: wherefore to reserue some part thereof F against all extremities, they thought it best whilest yet some store was left, to vie the same more sparingly, and to shoot more seldome. But the Turkes still drawing neerer and neerer the citie, and casting vp mounts higher than the wals of the citie, with earth and sagots filled vp the ditch:
 which done, they of the broken stones made wals on either side, to saue themselves from the flanking shot of the Christians: though giting a fresh assault, they vsed not onely their shot and other mislike weapons, but came foot to foot, and notably fought in the breach hand to hand. Which manner of fight (as if it had been so agreed vpon) they euery day maintained for the space of six houres. And although the Turkes by reason of their multitude were diuided into many parts, and fresh men still succeeded them that were wearie; yet such was the courage of the defendants, that euery man requested to haue the places of most danger, and from thence with courageous hand repulsed the Turkes with exceeding great slaughter. But for all that, the furious enemy maintaining the assault not onely by day, but by often alarms in the night also, kept the Christians continually in doubtfull suspence and readinesse, as if they should haue received a present assault: and as soone as it was day, with fresh men that had slept their fill, desperately assailed the Christians almost spent and maigre for lacke of sleepe and rest. Force not preuailling, the restless enemy leauing nothing attempted, by a quaint deuise was like to haue taken one of the gates of the citie: There was growing in the island great plentie of a kind of wood much of the nature of the fire or pitch tree, easie to be set on fire, but hardly to be quenched; but differing in this, that in burning it gaue forth such a noysome smell as was not by any man well to be endured: of this kind of wood the Turkes brought a wonderfull quantitie to one of the gates called LIMOSINA, which once set on fire, could not by the defendants by any means be quenched; although they cast whole pipes and tuns of water at once into it; but most terribly burning close vnto the gate by the space of foure daies, with the vehemencie of the heat and loathsomnesse of the smell, so troubled the defendants, that scarce any of them could endure to stand vpon the wall, but forsaking the same, were euery anone like to haue giuen the enemy leaue to enter.

Bragadinus encourages the defendants.

Bragadinus the Gouvernour, more carefull of the common safetie than of his owne danger, ceased not still to be going about from one place to another, telling the Italians, That now was giuen the fittest occasion they could desire for them to shew their valour in, and to gaine great honor of their barbarous enemies: that it would be to their eternall glorie, if by their only means without any other helpe, the citie so farre off from the reliefe of the Christians might be defended, and the great power of the Turke defeated: This (he said) was the onely time wherein it stood them most vpon to play the men; for if they could keepe that little was left, the rest of the island would be easily recouered: and although the Turkes army exceeded farre in number, yet did they excell them in prowesse and valour; whereby a few, and as it were but an handful of men, had oftentimes preuailed against most infinit multitudes: Now all the eyes of the world, as well friends as foes to be fixed vpon them, so that if they held out against so great a power, both their enemies would admire their valour, and all Christendome extoll their invincible courage and prowesse; and that they themselves should thereby reape both great profit and honour: Neither that any thing could be alleadged, why they should not be compared with the worthie knights of MALTA, who to their eternall fame had deliuered themselves out of the mouth of the Turke, and left vnto the world a most faire example for men valiantly to stand in so good a quarrell vpon their owne defence: NICOSTIA (he said) was lost rather by the cowardise of the defendants, than by the valour of the enemy. He also praised the fidelitie and courage of the Grecians, who for any feare or danger could neuer be remoued from the Vestetians, or induced to submit themselves vnto the Turkes government: and perswaded them, with the same resolution to defend their owne citie that they saw in the Venetian souldiours, fighting for them; and for their owne honour to striue with the Italians, in defence of their State, their country, their wiues and children, against the tyrannie of the Turkes; for as much as aid would in short time come, and set them free from all danger. The Senat. also in like manner had sent letters to FAMAGUSTA, willing them to be of good cheere, and yet a while to hold out the siege, and that they should be in short time relievied. Baleonius also Generall of the garrison souldiours, himselfe in armes was present at euery skirmish, carefully foreseeing what was in euery place and at all times to be done; and by encouraging of his souldiours and aduenturing of his person shewed himselfe to be both a worthie commander and valiant souldior. Neither did the souldiours alone, but euen the women also what they might, struing about the power of the strength M both of their minds and bodies, some bringing meat, some weapons vnto the defendants, and others stones, beds, chests, &c. such like stufte to make vp the breaches. But victuals beginning now to wax scant, 8000. of the vulgar sort of the people were turned out of the citie, who all in safetie were suffered to passe thorow the midst of the Turkes army, to seeke their liuing in the country. Thus

A Thus whilest open force preuailed not according to the Turkes desire, they began in foure places to vndermine the citie, in hope so to haue found entrance. But the defendants doubting such a matter, by diligent listening, and great vessels set full of water neere vnto the wals, and drums laid vpon the ground, by the mouing thereof discovered their workes, and with countermines frustrated those of the enemies: yet in so great a stirre and hurly burly, all things were not possibly to be discovered. Whereby it came to passe, that whilest the defendants were altogether busied in defending the wals; a mine not perceiued, was suddenly blowne vp neere vnto the tower standing vpon the haue: by force whereof, a great part of the wall thereabout was in a moment with a most horrible noise ouerthrowne. With the fall whereof, the Turkes thinking the citie as good as taken, with an horrible shout and outcrie mounted the wall, and in the breach B set vp their ensignes; Countie Peter, who had the charge of that part of the wall, being not now able to defend the same, so suddenly ouerthrown: which Nestor Martinengus quickly perceiuing, came speedily from his owne station, to repulse the enemy now readie to haue entred. The fight became there most fierce and terrible: on the one side, hope; on the other, desperation enraged their minds: the Turkes were in hope, that if they forced themselves but a little, they should forthwith win the citie; and the defendants propounding nothing, vnto themselves, but shamefull death and torture, fought as men altogether desperat. The Turkes trusted to their multitude, and the Christians to their valour. In the meane time, Andreas Bragadinus with certaine great pieces apply placed, out of the castle, slew a number of the Turkes, as they were comming to the breach. Baleonius hearing of the danger, came in hast with a companie of courageous souldiours C to relieue them that were fighting at the breach, and chearing vp his followers, thrust himselfe with the foremost into the face of the breach: and there not onely appointed what was to be done, and with cheerfull speeches encouraged his souldiours, but with his owne hand hauing slaine manie, tooke one of the Turkes ensignes (when as he had before slaine the beaver thereof) and tumbled him headlong into the ditch. With the sight whereof, others encouraged, both on the right hand and on the left, made there a notable battell, as men fighting for their last hope. In fine the Turkes were glad to retire, leauing behind them foure thousand carcases of their slaine fellows in the towne ditch, with fourteene of their ensignes, which were brought into the citie. Neither was this victorie gained without some losse of the Christians: about an hundred were slaine, among whom were Robertus Maluetius, Dauid Nocius, Celsus Feto, Erasmus Firmo, all D capitaines.

The breach is nobly defended.

For all this they in the citie tooke small rest, the Turkes great shot still thundring in amongst them; and that in such furious sort, as that in one day (which was the eighth of Iune) were numbered about siue thousand great shot, shot into the citie. With which continuall batterie, one of the round bulwarks of the towne was so shaken, as that a part of the front thereof was fallen downe into the ditch, and another part stood leaning readie to fall; in such sort, as that it was not longer to be defended: which the Christians perceiuing, presently vndermined the same bulwarke, and in the mine placed certaine barrells of gunpowder. The Turkes comming to assault the place they had so sore battered, the defendants after some small resistance fained themselves to retire for feare, so to draw the enemy the faster on; who was no sooner come to the place de- E fired, but that fire being put to the mine, blew vp the bulwarke with all them that stood thereon: of whom, some were ouerwhelmed with the earth it selfe, other some were blowne vp into the aire, and falling downe againe miserably perished; and other some, shot as it were out of a gun, fell downe a great way off, and so were rent in pieces: which was vnto the defendants a most pleasant sight. About six hundred of the Turkes perished at this assault, amongst whom were Mustapha Generall of the voluntarie souldiours, and Eregetes, a man of great marke amongst the Turkes. But by the hastie firing of the mine, there perished also about an hundred of the Christians, ouertaken in their owne deuise, amongst whom were also some of great account.

Baleonius a valiant capitaine.

The Turkes enflamed with their losses, were more enraged with the speeches and persuasions of Mustapha their Generall; who most earnestly exhorted them with one consent to assaile their enemies, now driuen into a corner of the island, spoiled of their country, trusting more vnto the strength of the place than of themselves, entreating for nothing more than with their liues to depart thence. But what place (said he) is there impregnable for the Turkes? NICOSTIA, ZIGETH, and such other strong townes woon, what are they but the monuments and testimonies of the cowardise of the Christians, and the prowesse of the Turks? This day (said he) will G confirm all your former labours and victories; which you before vnderooke for honour, but here shall you haue honour mixt with gold, and a prey sufficient to make you all rich: The Turks encouraged with this speech of their Generall, as men forgetfull of all dangers; began a more terrible siege than euer before: and hauing with incredible labour made three great mines, and blowing them vp, ouerthrew a great part of the wall with the castle, the notable defence of the hauen: which done, they with all their force oftentimes assailed the citie, as if it should haue been their last labour; neither ceased they so to doe night or day. At which time also, that part of the citie which is beaten vpon with the sea, was assaulted by them in the gallies also.

The poore Christians spent with deadly wounds, continuall labour; perpetuall watching both night and day, and now brought to a small number; hardly withstood the furious enemy, H assailing them in so many places at once, and held out that tempest rather with courage than strength. In the meane time the enemies armie encreased daily, the Turks in hope of the like spoile they had at Nicosia, continually repairing out of the countries round about vnto the campe. The Christian captaines seeing their men with continuall assaults sore spent; in so much, that how many soeuer they seemed to be, there was not aboue three hundred sound men left, but seauen barrels of powder remaining, want of all things daily increasing, hope of aid still decreasing, and the Venetians (their only comfort) so farre from them; the captaines (I say) themselves, began to quail in courage: and the rather, for that such reliefe as was sent from VENICE, could not possibly be brought vnto them, but staid at CRETE, the Turkes gallies still lying before FAMAGUSTA; so that nothing could in safetie be brought thither. This feare of the captaines themselves, could not long be hid or dissembled, but that it was by the citizens perceived:
who hauing neither power to hold out the siege, neither place left to flie vnto, ouercome with necessitie, came flocking to the Gouvernour, crauing of him aid and comfort, and with abundance of teares besought him in this common desperation, to take compassion on them, their wiues and children, a people that had alwaies so well deserued of the Venetian State. Their walls (they said) were beaten downe, their bulwarks ouerthrowne, the few souldiours that remained, spent with wounds, watching, and famine; the enemies strength encreasing daily, so that they must needs in short time all perish with the sword, if the citie were by force taken: wherefore they besought him, that yielding to necessitie, which no power was euer able to withstand, he would at last while time yet serued, prouide for the safetie of so faithfull and kind a people, and not to K refuse any conditions, how hard soeuer.

The requests and teares of the citizens of FAMAGUSTA, with the due consideration of the desperat state of the citie, moued Bragadinus to compassion; who comforting them in best sort he could, perswaded them to be of good cheere, for that he had care both of them and their state; and would so prouide for them, as that they should neuer repent themselves of their fidelitie and loyaltie to the Venetian State. He in the meane time considering the greatnesse of the danger which presently hung ouer all their heads, propounded the matter in a generall counsell called together for the same purpose: wherein after a little debating of the matter, they all agreed to yeeld; onely Baleonius at the first dissenting, as doubtfull of the Turkes faith, but afterwards yeelding vnto the opinion of the rest. So an herald being sent vnto the Bassa, a truce was taken for certaine daies to parley in, and hostages on both sides giuen: during which time, not so much as a dart was throwne or an arrow shot from either side. After a few daies parley the conditions were agreed vpon, whereupon the citie should be yeelded into the power of the Bassa, which were these: First, that the inhabitants of the citie yet left aliue, should in safetie enjoy their liues, libertie, and goods, with the free exercise of the Christian religion: That the Gouvernour with the rest of the captaines and souldiours might in safetie depart with bag and baggage, and at their departure to take with them five great pieces of ordinance, and three horses, which soeuer it should please them to make choise of; and that the Turkes should safely conduct them into CRETE, finding them both victuall and shipping: all which things were with more kindeness promised, than with fidelitie performed. Yet all these matters agreed vpon, and concerned into writing, as also by solemne oath on both sides confirmed: the Gouvernour sending a messenger before, requested that he might haue leaue to come to see the Bassa, and to deliuer vnto him the keyes of the citie. Leau being granted, Bragadinus the Gouvernour, Baleonius, Andrew Bragadinus, Laurentius Theupolus carle of PAPHOS, to Anthonyus Quirinus, Aloysius Mar- tinengus,

A sinengus, with a great sort of other captaines came into the campe: but before they entred into the Bassa's pauillion, they were commaunded to deliuer their weapons, which they all did:
At the first meeting Mustapha entertained them courteously, and with many glorious words, as if it had beene in admiration, extolled their worthie valour and courage: saying, that he was glad now to know them by face, whose valiant minds he had before knowne by their most valiant deeds. Now prowesse and valour seemed not onely in safetie, but also honoured euen of the enemy: when after a long discourse the false Bassa reuolued vnto this mischeefe and recheerie he had before resolu'd vpon: complaining that certaine of his men taken at the siege, had bene asterward against all reason and order slaine. Which the Gouvernour and the rest utterly denying, he start vp as in a rage, and with high words and sterne countenance vying the fact, commaunded them all to be forthwith cast in bonds: and so bringing them out of his pauillion, in the sight of the armie, contrarie to his oath and promise, caused them all to be slaine. At which time Br- gadinus and Theupolus were oftentimes commaunded to lay downe their heads, to haue had them stricke off: yet was their execution deferred, and their liues reserved, not to saue them; but with more exquisite punishment and torture to satisfie the barbarous crueltie of the faithlesse and vmercifull tyrant. The next day after, Bragadinus hauing his eares before cut off in despight, was brought forth to be wondered at, and tortured with the most extreamest kind of torture that ty-rannie it selfe could haue deuised: for despoyled of his Jewels and attire; and a basket layed vpon his shoulders, filled with earth, he was enforced oftentimes to carrie the same: to repaire the ram-piers that were ouerthrowne; and euer as he passed by, the proud Bassa insulting vpon him to fall downe and to kisse the ground at his feet: and so buffered with the Turkes sits, and spurned as a dog with their feet, was in great derision and despight asked, Whether he hoped that Christ his God would come to helpe him or not? Which indignitie of it selfe bitter and miserable, the dignitie of the man made much more miserable: whose comely and stately countenance, with his long and reuerend beard, euen in that extreame miserie, added vnto him a certaine majestie and grace. In this so foule a sight of vertue troden vnderfoot, the poore Christians could neither well stay their teares, nor let them fall, for feare of the displeasure of the Turkes. But the forsworne Bassa, not onely forgetfull of all humanitie, but enraged rather with extreame crueltie, caused that noble and woorthie Bragadinus to be sett in a chaire; and his skin to be flaine off from him quicke: a punishment vnworthie of him that suffered it, but most worthe him that inflicted the same. Yet in so great and horrible a torture he was not heard to let fall any word, nor be seeming a faithfull Christian and the honour of his countrey: onely he called vpon God for mercie, and derided the Turkes perfidious recheerie, and so breathed out his life. But the tyrant worthe eter-nall infamie, not satisfied with the torture of the liuing man, caused the head to be cut from the dead bodie, and vpon the point of a speare to be set vp on an high place for all men to look vpon on. His skin also stuffed with chaffe, he caused to be hanged vp at the yards arme, and so to be carried about: not so true a trophie of his victorie, as a testimonie of his perfidious and Turkish crueltie. Two dayes after, countie Theupolus, after he had bene most shamefully entreated, full of the markes of the Turkes crueltie, was to make an end withall shamefully hanged in the market place. With what crueltie the Bassa had tyrannized vpon the nobilitie, with the same he also raged vpon the meaner sort of the citizens, of whom some he slew, some he chained in the gal-lies, and carried away the rest into bondage. Three hundred Christians, some souldiours, some citizens, which came forth with the Gouvernour to see the Turkes campe, were there also all slaine.
Neslor Martinengus, a famous captaine, escaped the tyrants hands, being hidden by one of the Bassa's eunuchs, who by the helpe of a Greeke fisherman got to LEPIS, and from thence to CRETE, and so afterwards to VENICE, where he faithfully reported to Aloysius Mocenicus the duke, the whole processe of that ware, with the losse of the citie; and that in the space of three-score and ten daies there was aboue an hundred and fortiethousand great shot discharged against the citie. Such noblemen and gentlemen as escaped out of this so generall a slaughter, banished their countrey, and in miserie, disperfed without hope of returne, led afterward a miserable and vagrant life, though some of them euen at this day (as I haue bene credibly enformed) are by the Venetian state right well maintained: The countrey people and artificers were generally by the Turkes spared, for the peopling of the countrey. This was the fatal ruine of CYPRUS, one of the most fruitfull and beautifull islands of the Mediterranean: the losse whereof not without cause griued many Christian princes, as sometime a kingdome of it selfe, and now a prouince of the Turkish empire: our sinnes, or the euill agreement of Christian princes, or both, the cause there. G of I know not, neither if I did, durst I so say.

Whilest Mustapha yet lay at the siege of FAMAGVSTA, the other two great Basses Partau and Haly, the one the Admirall, and the other Generall of the souldiours, (appointed by Selymus for the keeping of the sea, that no releefe should be sent by the Venetians to FAMAGVSTA, and further as occasion serued to infect their dominions) about the middest of May, arrived in EUBOEAE with two hundred and thirtie gallies; whether Plurialis viceroi of ALBANS, with diuers other the Turks notable pyrats, resorted vnto them with their gallies. With this fleet departing from EUBOEAE, and sayling alongst the coast of MYSTIA, IONIA, CARIA, and so directly toward the RHODES, they were met with thirtie gallies moe of the Turkes aduenturers. After that, hauing left certaine gallies for to lie before FAMAGVSTA, they directed their course for the H island of CRETE, and the thirteenth of Iune put into the bay of AMPHIMALEA, now called SVDA, and there landed twelue thousand men.

The Turkes arrive in Crete with a great fleet.

The description of Crete.

This island of CRETE, now called CANDIA, is greater than CYPRVS, but lesser than SICILIA of SARDINIA: but for fertilitie comparable with any of the islands of the Mediterranean. It was in auncient time famous for many things, but especially for an hundred cities which therein stood, as witnesseth amongst others Seneca: Urbius centum spaciofa Crete, but at this day it hath onely three: CANDIA, a colonie of the Venetians, whereof the island now taketh name, CANEA, and RHETIMO. The circuit of the island is fife hundred and twentie miles: full of hils: for which cause the people of the countrey are much delighted in hunting. In it is no nauigable riuer or venomous beast. It is now most famous through a great part of the world, I for the good Malmesey which there groweth, and is from thence in great abundance sent into many faire countries. Therein also groweth great plentie of Cypresse trees, seruing for the vse of shipping. It is at this day subject to the Venetians. The Turkes being landed, and raunging vp and downe the countrey, did what harme they possibly could, burning and spoiling all as they went: vntill that at last they were vpon the sudden encountered by Franciscus Iustinianus, who but a little before their landing was come into the island with a thousand souldiours; and now joyning with the island people, notably charged them, being altogether disperfed and seeking after prey: and hauing slaine many of them, enforced the rest to retire to their gallies. The next day the Turkes landing againe in greater number, burnt diuers townes, and ransacked SETIA and RHETIMO, where they tooke a rich prey, and carried away many prisoners: but loaded with their bootie, disperfed, and fearing nothing lesse than to be at that time set vpon, they were assailed by Lucas Michael a valiant capitaine, two thousand of them slaine, and with the losse of their bootie and prisoners glad to retire vnto their gallies. Thus repulsd from CRETE, they tooke their course to CYTHERA, ZACYNTHVS, and CEPHELENTIA, islands subject to the Venetians: where beside other harmes by them done, they carried away with them six thousand poore Christians into most miserable captiuitie.

The Turkes drive out of Crete.

Departing thence, and sayling alongst the coast of EPHROS, they came to SVPPOLO, an haugen towne in EPHROS, which Venerius in the beginning of these warres had taken from the Turkes, but was now againe by them recovered. After that, they came to DVLICIGNO, which the Turkes had but a little before besieged by land, for that the Gouvernour thereof and of ANTIVARI (another towne of the Venetians vpon the frontiers of DALMATIA) had compacted with three hundred Epirots, to stirre vp the countrey to rebellion, and to reuolt to the Venetians: for the effecting whereof the Epirots requested of the Venetians six thousand souldiours to make head, which the Venetians promised to send them. Whereupon the aforesaid Epirots forthwith tooke vp armes, and raised most part of EPHROS into rebellion: vnto whom was sent at the first one capitaine with an hundred Italians from CATARO. But when the Epirots vainly expecting the promised aid, saw themselves on euery side hardly beset with their enemies; despairing of any good successe, they yeilded themselves vnto the mercie of Achmetis Bassa, Selymus his great lieutenant in GRACIA (who to repress that so dangerous a rebellion, was come thither with an armie of fourescore thousand Turkes:) so was a most faire occasion lost, when as the rest of the Epirots, enflamed with the hope of libertie, were readie to haue come vnto their friends, already in armes; and by their example like ynough to haue raised all GRACIA into rebellion. But now deceiued of their expectation, bewayled their miserie, that trusting to the promises of the Venetians, they had cast themselves and all theirs into most manifest danger. They of

A faire occasion lost.

A of DVLICIGNO seeing themselves hardly beset both by sea and land, sent to Partau Bassa, and couenanted with him, that they might in safetie depart, deliuered vnto him the towne: and so Sara Martinengus, Gouvernour of the towne, with the garrison souldiours, were in foure ships conueyed in safetie to RAGVSVM: as for the citifens, promise was kept with them after the Turkish manner. In the same hurle the Turkes tooke also the townes of ANTIVARI and BVDVA. ANTIVARI was both by situation and fortification strong, and furnished with a good garrison: neuertheless, Alexander Donatus Gouvernour thereof, a man of no experience in martiall affaires, ouercome with the present feare, and despairing to be able to hold the towne, towardly yeilded the same vnto the enemy. Which his beastly cowardise the Senat suffered not vnpunished, but confiscating his goods, and remoouing him from the Senat, cast him into exile. From ANTIVARI the Turkes following their good fortune, departed with their fleet into the bay called RIZONICVS, but now the bay of CATHARO, and both by sea and land laied hard siege vnto the strong towne of CATHARO, called in auncient time ASCRIVVM; against which they cast vp two great bulwarkes, and planted thereon nine great peeces of artilerie, wherewith to haue battered the towne and the castle: but the defendants as resolute men sallying out, put them from their ordinance, and enforced them againe vnto their gallies.

Dileigno, Antivari, and Bvdva, strong towres of the Venetians upon the coast of Epirus and Dalmatia, yielded to the Turkes.

Catharo punished.

Whilest these things were in doing, Plurialis and Caracossa, both men of great account and name amongst the Turkes, got leaue for ten dayes of the Admirall, with threecore gallies to spoyle the islands neere thereabouts, subject to the Venetians. Who comming to the island of CVRZOLA, about fourescore miles Eastward from RAGVSVM landed their men, with purpose C to assault the towne of CVRZOLA, of the same name with the island. Which Anthionius Contarenus the Gouvernour thereof perceiuing, in the dead time of the night fled for feare out of the towne into the rockes and places of more safetie, after whom the townefmen followed also: so that in the towne were not left about 20 men, and about 80 women; who with weapons in their hands, after the rest were fled, came to the wals, as wishing rather there to die, than to fall into the hands of the barbarous enemy. But at such time as the Turkes began to approach the towne, & the women with stones, fire, and such weapons as they had, were beating them off, and with greater courage defending the place than was to haue beene in their sex expected, by the goodnesse of God a great tempest suddenly arose out of the North, which so outrageously tossed the gallies, that Plurialis and Caracossa were glad to giue ouer the assault, and to get them thence into a place D of more safetie. Sayling alongst the coast, they by the way spoiled LYSNA, BRACIA, and LISSA, little islands vpon the coast of DALMATIA, out of which they caried away with them 1600 poore Christians into captiuitie. These arch pyrats at their pleasure roming vp and downe the sea, fortuned to light vpon a ship of the Christians bound from MESSANA to COREYRA, which they tooke; and in rifling thereof found certaine letters directed to the Gouvernour of CORCYRA, certifying him of the league, then but lately concluded amongst the Christian princes: which letters they sent in post to Selymus to giue him knowledge thereof, who thereupon writ to his Admirals, with all hostilitie to infect any of the dominions of the Christian confederats.

Curzola forsaken by the men, is defended by the women.

Selymus advised of the league, lately concluded betwixt the Christian princes.

The Turkes fleet thus raging and raining in the Adriaticke, brought a great feate not only vpon the coasts of DALMATIA, ISTRIA, and the islands thereabouts, which were by them most E afflicted; but also vpon the sea coasts of APVLLIA, and all alongst that side of ITALIE, yea & vpon the cite of VENICE it selfe: inso much that they were glad to fortifie as well the cite as the frontiers of their dominions, with new fortifications and garrisons: as did also the king, and the Pope in ITALIE: for why no ship or gallie could now looke out of any port, but it was presently surprised and taken by the Turkes: which with the sundry calamities before receiued, so confounded the Venetians, that they in their assemblies and consultations seemed rather to quake for feare, than after their wonted maner grauely to consult how the enemy was to be repulsd. Yet for the more safetie of their cite, and for feare least the Turkes fleet should forcibly breake in vpon them; they strongly fortified the passages through the rocke or banke, which defendeth the cite from the sea, and kept continually 12000 men in readinesse in the cite for the more assurance thereof; F All the Turkes fleet being againe met together, Partau and Haly departed from AVRONA the 26 of August, and sayled directly to CORCYRA, which little island seemed to bee compassed in round with the great enemies fleet. Partau Bassa at his first arrivall there, landed eight hundred horsemen and a thousand foot, who ranging vp and downe the island did great hurt, and burnt the very suburbs of the cite: at which time the garrison souldiours sallying out vpon them with a thouland horsemen and six hundred foot, slew a great number of them, and amongst the rest one G Paphus Rays, a man of great name. Thus the Turks fleet having done wonderfull harme in the Venetian territorie, as well in the islands, as vpon the frontiers of DALMATIA, enriched with the spoyle of those countries, and carrying away with them fifteene thousand most miserable captiues; departing from CORCYRA, arrived all in the bay of CORINTH, now called the gulf of LAPANTO, where we will for a while leaue them to ride in safetie.

Austria.

At such time as this great fleet (the terror of that part of Christendome) first put into the Adriaticke, Venerius the Venetian Admirall then lying with fiftie gallies at CORCYRA, and fearing if he stayed there longer, to be enforced with so small a power to fight against so strong an enemy, or els so to be shut vp that hee could not ioyne his forces with the Spanish fleet, which was dayly expected: vpon the comming of the fleet departed thence to MESSANA, where there more commodiously and more safely to attend the comming of Don John of AVSTRIA, Generall of the Spanish forces. At his comming, Columinus met him with twelue gallies (which the great duke of FLORENCE had sent in the aid of the confederats) and three gallies of MALTA, who onely were yet come thither, and with great honour receiued him. Not long after, M. Antonius Quirinus and Antonius Canalis came thither also with threescore and two gallies, before appointed by the Venetians for the releefe of FAMAGUSTA, but now called backe againe to ioyne with the rest of the fleet: and in short time the gallies of SICILIA arrived there also. At last after long expectation, in the latter end of August came Don John with the Spanish fleet, a man then about foure and twentie yeares old, in whom wanted no honorable parts, his mothers blemish onely excepted: who although he was most deere vnto his father Charles the fifth, yet left he him nothing by his will, but onely at his death commended him vnto his sonne Philip, as his brother. The Venetian and the Popes Admirals hearing of his comming, went to meet him, and that with such triumph and joy, that all the former heauinesse before conceiued of his long staying, was turned into gladnesse, with most assured hope of triumphant victorie: their doubled forces, and two great fleets ioyned in one, encouraged them about measure, filling all the West with the expectation of some great matter. The Venetian fleet consisted of an hundred and eight gallies, six galleasses, two tall ships, and a great number of small gallions. Vnto them were ioyned twelue gallies of the Popes, of whom Columinus was Admirall. And with Don John, the Generall, and Auria the Spanish Admirall came fourescore and one gallies, of whom three were from the knights of MALTA. In this fleet, beside mariners, were reckoned to be twentie thousand fighting men: an armie not onely beautifull for shew, as consisting of most choise bodies; but indeed most strong and puissant, old beaten souldiours. almost throughout it, in euery place intermixed with others of lesse skill: many knowne to be men of great experience, rich and lustie bodies, were by name called forth to this so honourable seruice; and diuers other of great nobilitie, as well old men as yong and lustie gallants, for the naturall hatred they bare vnto the common enemy, came and as voluntarie men cheerefully thrust themselves into that religious war: euery of which noble gentlemen, as they were greater by birth or power, so had they drawne after them a greater number of their fauourits and followers, strong and able bodies, of their owne charge brauely armed; who sought after no other pay for their paines and danger, but by some notable victorie to eternise their names, or honourably to spend their liues in so iust a quarrell, as for the defence of the Christian faith and religion. Amongst these most honourable and resolute men, were three of greatest mark, Alexander Farnesius prince of PARRAMA, in time to be the honour and glorie of ITALIE his native countrey, whose vntimely death in the low countries then his honourable enemies lamented; and being dead, is not without cause and worthe deserued counted amongst the most politicke and famous leaders of our age. The second was Francesco Maria prince of VRBINO, a yong man both honourably descended and of an inuincible courage: and the third Pau. Iordanus Ursinus, an honorable gentleman of the family of the Ursini in ROME.

Alexander Farnesius
prince of

All the power of the confederat princes thus met together at MESSANA, and all things now in readinesse, a counsell was called by the Generall, to resolute what course to take in those most dangerous wars, against so puissant an enemy: vnto which counsell were admitted only Don John the Generall himselfe: and Aloysius Rechezenes, of some called Requisienus, great commendator of CASTILE, the Generals lieutenant, or rather director of his actions: Sebastianus Venerius the Venetian Admirall: and Augustinus Barbadius Generall proueditour, of equall authoritie and reputation with the Admirall: and one secrettie: Marcus Antonius Columinus the Popes Admirall,

Admirall, with Pompeius Colonna his kinsman. The chiefe point whereon these great commanders were to resolute was, whether they should aduenture the generall fortune of a battell against so strong an enemy, or onely seeke to defend the frontiers of their owne dominions: Which question (as all other of like sort) was of diuers diuersly phantasied; euery man pleasing himselfe with his owne reasons. Requisienus (Don John his chiefe counsellor, without whom he willingly did nothing, and vndoubtedly a man of great valour and experience) speaking first, said: That the enemies force was necessarily to be known, before they committed all to the fortune of a battell: and that therefore delay was to be vsed, least improuident hast ouerthrew all. Matters of warre that were to be decided by the sword, were (as he said) with great and sound aduise to be administrated; for that the errors of battell, whereby all was to be put in hazard, were not to be againe amended. He highly commended the aduise of Scipio Africanus, who counselled great commanders, not to fight with the enemy but vpon some great Advantage; or else therunto forced by Necessitie. But as things now stood, what opportunitie could be ministréd or advantage taken; the enemy keeping himselfe close within the bay of CORINTH; and no apparant meanes how to draw him out from thence? Neither that he for his part was of so great a spirit, as within the harbour in place of disadvantage, without hope, to set vpon an enemy in common estimation stronger than himselfe: for what dishonour should they incurre, if hauing receiued some notable losse, they should be enforced with shame to giue ouer the enterprise begun? And to besiege ORICVS, DIRRHACHIVM, or CASTRVM NOVVM, frontier townes of the Turks, so to draw them out to battell; what were this other than to shew a certaine feare and distrust in themselves, and to discourage the minds of the souldiours? for as well the enemy as the common souldior, would forthwith deeme such a poore attempt to proceed of a meere feate, as to make a vaine shew of something doing, when as they durst not encounter the enemy in his full strength. As for the other reason drawne from Necessitie: what necessitie had they so desperately to set vpon the enemy? who vpon the approach of Winter must needs in short time lay vp his gallies: and being already in safe harbour, would neuer be drawne to the hazard of a battell, especially like hope, like strength, and like danger appearing on both sides. Wherefore, it were best (in his opinion) onely to make a great shew of their forces, so to terrifie the barbarous enemy: but in no case to hazard the hope of the whole Christian common-weale, vpon the fortune of a battell. He farther also propounded vnto them, the vncertaine euent of things, the common chance of warre, the strength of the enemy, as well by sea as by land; with whom they themselves were not (as he said) in deed comparable: then, what an infinit heape of miseries was like to ouerwhelme the Christian common-weale, if they should in any thing miscarry: And that therefore, safe aduise was in this case to be preferred before that which was attended vpon with greater danger.

On the other side, the Venetians, who thought all delay both infamous and dangerous to their State, were farr of another opinion. Wherefore Venerius and Barbadius not only vehemently perswaded but most instantly requested the Generall, and the rest of the great commanders, that so soone as opportunitie serued, they would commit the matter to the trial of a battell, and not to make that counsell, which their courageous minds might make most glorious and fortunat, by declining of battell to become dishonourable or frustrate. If desire of honour (said they) moue vs not, shall neither these things moue vs? the losse of so great and chargeable a preparation, the spoiling of our frontiers, and the insolencie of our enemies, which we encrease by delay? We defend our selues and ours, we invade not them: wee goe not about to driue the Turke out of his empire; but that we our selues be not by him driuen out of our owne countries. Wherefore we ought so much the more readily and speedily to thinke of battell, by how much the necessitie of him is greater that repulseth a danger, than of him that offereth the same. What ate our weapons blunt, or our hands benumbed? shall the Turkes so often prouoke vs, and we still be vnreuened? shall we alwaies shew our weapons, and neuer fight? One fortunat battell is able to blot out the infamie of former time, and to fill vs with the hope of future happiness: if nothing else, let the verie indignitie of the matter stirre vs vp to battell. And what doubt is there, but that the enemy swelling with pride, will come forth with his fleet and giue vs battell? Thinke you that a small discredit will ensue to our honour and reputation, if contented with a vaine brag, hauing not once skirmished with the enemy, or so much as seene him, we shall returne home, to the generall shame of all Christendome? See how many pestilent inconueniences

ueniences will ensue, if we shall take this course. This manner of proceeding, will fill all mens minds with dispaire: the people will murmure, That they are to no purpose oppressed with exactions and tributs: the confederat princes (carefull of this warre) will say, that they haue in vaine wearied themselves with often embassages and care thereof: the proud enimie will account our departure, or declining of battell, for a manifest victorie. The next yeare we may looke for him againe with a greater and a stronger fleet, which shall not onely make a more heauie warre, but destroy and beare downe all before it: at which time, who can assure vs that the Christians shall haue the like preparation, if we shall now delay to fight? what labour is to be taken, what cost to be bestowed, to set forth againe so great a fleet? Vnto these causes which impose vpon vs a necessity and force to fight, is adioyned not onely a singular regard of our honour, but a most notable opportunitie also offered: we neuer had a greater fleet, nor better furnished with men, munition, and all things else to be required for the gaining of a notable victorie: and who knoweth nor, that the Christian gallies are farre stronger than the Turkes? besides that, the greatest part of their best souldiours are in hope of prey gone into CYPVS, who there seeking after the spoile, and forgetfull of the enimie, without controlment glut themselves with the pleasures of that rich island; whereby their fleet is so much the weaker. All which things, as they promise no hard victorie, so doe they propound vnto vs, honour, glorie, fame, and most honourable rewards; and open vnto vs the way both for the defence of the present, and recouerie of that had been before lost. What then stand we still looking for? or why do we not in Gods name joine that battell, which is vnto vs not only necessarie, but profitable also.

Thus much said, they began to intreat and beseech the Generall and the rest, not longer to suffer the Christian common-weale to receiue losse vpon losse, but to repose their only hope in the good successe of one worthie battell: and neuer to looke for the like opportunitie, if they let slip the present. This matter of so great consequence, thus thoroughly debated amongst the greatest commandours, they thought it good to heare also the opinions of other notable captaines, of no lesse experience than themselves (then in the fleet) before they would conclude any thing. Amongst the rest, Anthonus Cornea, and Gabriel Serbellio, both Spaniards, and for their great wisdom and valour had in generall reputation of all men; being demanded their opinions, with most substantiall reasons declared the necessity of giuing battell, and that it was not so dangerous, as to be therefore shunned or delayed: For so much as that violent enimie was far easier to be dealt withall at sea than by land; where he must fight without his huge multitude of men, the Turkes chiefe hope and only meanes whereby they haue obtained so many victories against the Christians. And so concluded their opinions, with an effectfull perswasion to set forward to CORCYRA, and without delay as occasion serued to giue the enimie battell. Which their opinion being generally well liked, was shortly after by the Generall and the rest approued, and a resolution set downe for the giuing of battell: which was no sooner knowne, but there was a generall reioycing through the armie, euerie man cheerfully preparing himselfe to lay downe his life in the publike defence of the Christian common-weale: and that with such an earnest desire of battell, that euerie day seemed now nothing else, but a delay of a most assured victorie.

Yet before they should come into the sight of the enimie, the three Admirals thought it good to bring forth the fleet into the sea, and there to martiall the same, in such sort, as if they should euen then presently haue joyned battell: to the intent, that by such orderly disposing of their fleet, and by appointing vnto euerie man his place he was to keepe, they might so acquaint them with the order of the battell, as that they should when time serued (of themselves without farther direction) martiall themselves, and so more readily enter into battell. The next day the Admirals brought forth their fleets into the open sea: in the right wing (which consisted of three and fiftie gallies) was Auria placed: in the left wing was Augustinus Barbadiem, with the like number of gallies also: and in the middle battell stood the Generall, with seauentie gallies: on the right hand of the Generall stood Columnius, and on the left Venerius, his associates. Thus with equall front the fleet set forward, as if they should euen presently haue joyned battell. Betwixt the wings and the middle battell, was left no more space but for three gallies to row: in the rearward behind the Generall, followed Requisenius the great Commendor of CASTILE, with his gallies: after Columnius followed the Admirall gallic of GENOVA, wherein was Alexander Farnesius prince of PARMA: and behind Venerius came the Admirall gallic of SAVOY, and in her the prince of VRBIN: in the space betwixt the middle battell and the left wing, was placed

A placed Paulus Iordanus: and betwixt the middle battell and the right wing, was Petrus Iustinianus with the gallies of MALTA: vpon the left wing attended Anthonus Canalis: and Quirinus on the right. About halfe a mile behind all the rest, followed Aluarius Bacianus Marquesse of SANCRA, and Admirall of the Neapolitane fleet, with thirtie gallies; a man of great experience in matters at sea; and now so placed, to be at all times readie to relieue this or that part of the fleet, as the fortune of the battell, or impression of the enimie should require. The Christians had reposed great hope in six galeasses, which furnished with great store of ordinance and certaine select companies of most resolute souldiours, seemed rather like castles than ships. These galeasses conducted by Franciscus Dodus, a most expert capitaine, were placed about a mile before the fleet; two of them before each wing, and the other two before the middle battell: so far distant one from another, as that with equall space they answered the whole breadth of the front of the fleet, which was almost the space of fise miles, and serued the same in stead of most strong bulwarks. The gallies throughout the fleet kept not close together, but such a conuenient distance one from another, as might serue for them at libertie to discharge their ordinance when time should require. In the wings, as also in the maine battell, were the Popes, the kings, and the Venetian gallies indifferently intermixed; that by the equalitie of the danger they should haue more care to relieue one another than if they had serued apart. Ioannes Cardonius, a most valiant capitaine, with eight gallies of SICILY and two galiots, was appointed to go ten miles before the fleet to descrie what he might of the enemies doings, and in his returne to joine the one halfe of his gallies to the one wing, and the other halfe to the other.

C In this sort they departed from MESSANA, with purpose to seeke out the enimie: and not long after came to PAXO, where (of a small broile) at the first was like to haue risen a great mischief: for the next day, whilest Don Iohn staid there to take a view of the Venetian gallies, and how they were furnished both of men and munition; he finding them but weakly manned for supplying of that want, appointed foure thousand Spaniards and a thousand Italians to be put aboard into the Venetian gallies, where most need was.

Amongst these souldiours was one companie vnder the commaund of Mutius Tortona their capitaine, a man of an vnquiet and furious nature: who going aboard the gallic of Andreas Caelergus, first fell to words with the capitaine of the gallic, and after much strife into plaine fight; so that in a trice they were altogether by the eares, as well the souldiours as the captaines: of all which strife Mutius was the onely author. Venerius being not farre off, and hearing of the matter, sent the capitaine of his owne gallic to appease the tumult: who thrusting himselfe into the midst of the furious multitude, was by Mutius in his furie foully intreated, and diuers of them that came with him shrewdly beaten. VVhich thing Venerius (himselfe also of an hoar nature) taking as done in disgrace of the Venetians, and therewith exceedingly moued; to the terrour of others, caused Mutius and his ensign-bearer to be hanged vp at the yards arme of the same gallic, to the great offence of all the Spaniards. The Generall also taking this execution in euill part, full of choler and indignation, grievously complained, That he himselfe as Generall, was therein not a little wronged; and that it became euerie commander to know what belonged to his place, and not to encroach vpon his betters: so should the conditions of the league be the better kept, if euerie commander could keepe himselfe within the bounds of his owne authoritie. Venerius he said, whose authoritie was inferiour vnto his, could not of right without his command determine any thing against Mutius a Spanish capitaine: And that therein his honour was empairod: for which, if he had not a publike and honourable amends, he threatned by force of arms to redresse his wrong, and the league being broken, to carrie away with him the kings gallies. Neither wanted there some who fauouring Don Iohn his quarrell, and angrie with the Venetians, laid still more coles on the fire that was already too great. Hereunto Venerius sent word vnto the Generall, That he should do well to moderat his anger, and at leisure to aduise himselfe, and better to vnderstand the matter, so should he plainly see, that there was neuer more just or wholesome execution done vpon any, than vpon those mutinous persons: But if he, carried away with the heat of youth, should attempt any more violent course than stood with the common quiet, it were not to be marvelled if hee afterward repented. He (as he said) was also in armes, and readie to shew himselfe a man. The matter was growne to that heat, that it was not onely not farre from the breaking off of the league; but euen at the point to haue set all on a broile, and to haue put the whole fleet in danger: had not Columnius the Popes Admirall, against this Cornea and Serbellio persuade the giuing of battell.

this tempest opposed himselfe: He with all his power laboured to cure the wounded mind of G the Generall, and to appease his anger: telling him, That the common enemy would hardly be withstood by them all, being at vnicie and concord amongst themselves; but if vnto the forraign danger were also joynd domestick discord, then were the Christian commonwealth vndone. But if he would moderate his anger, and more regard the honour and credit of the Venetian Admirall, than the punishment of a seditious man, euen they which were vnto him friends, and enemies vnto the Venetians, would highly commend his moderation and staydnesse: yea, that howsoeuer the matter was done, it could not now be vridone. But whatsoeuer Venerius had done, was in his opinion justly done, That it was alwayes so accounted and obserued, that when many princes joynd their forces together in matters that concerned the common managing of the warre, nothing was to be done without the command of the Generall: but in matters belonging to the priuat gouernment of euery mans regiment, euery Generall had powert of life and death ouer them that were vnder his command: which to be so, was as he said hereby, to be vnderstood; King Philip was king of many kingdomes, and that hee might long to bee, hee heartily wished: Now if any Millanoies had committed any capitall crime worthe death in the kingdome of NAPLES, should the iudgement of that crime be of right to be referred vnto the king himselfe, as the cheefe soueraigne: or vnto the Gouernour of MILLAINS, where the offence was borne: or rather to the ciuile magistrate of NAPLES, in whose iurisdiction the fault was committed, and so of right there to be executed? What difference was there then, but that Mutius might rightly seeme to haue bene justly punished by Venerius, who although he were a Spanish capitaine, had yet raised a mutinie in a Venetian galley, which was vnder the command of the Venetian Admirall. Beside that, the discipline of warre sometime required a seuerer and exemplarie kind of punishment: For which cause it was both notably and truly said of Clearchus, That a Generall ought to be more feared of his souldiours than the enemy: and that amongst the auncient Romanes it had bene the custome euen for priuat men with more seuerer punishment to restraine the factious citizen than the most cruell enemy: That the fact was not so much to be regarded, as the intention of him that did it: That it was the dutie of commanders to withstand the madnesse of the mutinous. The author of sedition and tumult hee said had suffered but condigne punishment to his fact: who if hee had escaped unpunished; would but haue bene the more disordered, but now by his exemplarie punishment would deterre others from the like insolencie. Besides that, the externall danger was such, as ought to reconcile them, were they neuer so much enemies: That such men as they were should aboue all things regard what might profit or hurt the common cause, in contemplation whereof all priuat injuries were to be remitted: and the rather, for that the honour and dishonour of the good or bad successe of such important an action should redound vnto themselves, but especially vnto the Generall. His owne dutie he had as he said discharged, in dealing so plainly and faithfully with him, and could no more but pray vnto God, with mercifull eye to behold the troubled Christian commonweale in such a most dangerous time.

beareth a grudge against Venerius

Barbadiocus the Venetian Providior, a notable man,

The Christian fleet as Cephalonia

Thus was the mutinie at PAXO by the great labour of Columnius hardly appeased; nevertheless Don Iohn could not afterwards endure to participate vnto Venerius his counsels, or so much as to come in his companie: all was done by Barbadiocus the Venetian Prouedior. This Barbadiocus was not inferiour to Venerius in courage and valour, but farre beyond him in discretion; a tall and goodly and perfonage, well coloured, his beard grizie, though not for age, for why he was not about fiftie yeares old: besides that, in his eyes and countenance appeared a viuacitie or liueliness of spirit; in his very gate and comely motion of his bodie, he carried a certaine grace and maiestie: his talke and speech was alwayes calme and temperate, his counsell graue and sound, so that he was both greatly honoured and beloued of all men: his cheefe endeavour also was, to further the hope of atonement betwixt the Spaniards and the Venetians, so well begun by Columnius. And so all things brought into some reasonable teames, they departed from PAXO, and came to CORCYRA; the spoyle whereof well declared the enemies late being there. From thence they departed to CEPHALENIA, where they by letters from Pan, Contarenius, Gouernour of ZACYNTHUS, were aduertised, That the Turkes fleet of three hundred and three and thirtie sayle, of one sort and other, lay in the gulf of CORINTH, now called the gulf of LEPANTO. Whereupon they shortly after remoued, with purpose to haue gone to PETALA, an haue opposit oueragainst the islands (or rather rocks)

A rockes called ECHINADES, but now CORZYLAES, and so to the bay of CORINTH; to draw the enemy forth to battell: but stayed with contrarie winds, they put backe againe into the valley of ALEXANDRIA, another port in the island of CEPHALENIA: from whence they afterward departed to the islands CORZYLAES, where by the way they vnderstood by letters out of CRETE, That FAMAGUSTA was lost: with which bad newes they were no whit discouraged, but rather enflamed with the desire of reuenge. From the islands they went to GALANOA, a good harbour, where they stayed one night, purposing the next day to haue gone to the mouth of the gulf of LEPANTO, there to dare the Turkes battell.

The Turkes Bassaes Partau and Haly, who then lay in good safetie within the gulf, hearing of the approach of the Christian fleet, began to consult with the rest of their most expert capitaines, Whether to giue the Christians battell, or to keepe themselves still within their safe harbour: vpon which doubt they were amongst themselves of diuers opinions. Amongst the rest Chiroche a man of great yeares and authoritie, and withall a most noble capitaine, exhorted the Bassaes, in no case, when no need was, vpon a vaine glorie to aduenture all to the fortune of an vncertaine battell: it was (as he said) the part of wise and worthe commanders, to moderate with reason their happie fortunes, for that therunto were incident many accidents, whereby their former felicitie might be disgraced: They had already run alongst the enemies coasts, spoyle the frontiers of his countries, and were with much honour and greater spoyle in safetie returned, hauing encreased the Turkish empire with many strong townes of the enemies: The island of CYPRVS was with wonderfull good fortune brought vnder the Turkes obeisance, the enemies great prouision at sea frustrated, in such sort, as that hauing lost diuers of their gallies, they were neuer yet able to draw their swords: They had with their fleet at their pleasure romed vp and down the Adriaticke, and displayed their victorious ensigns almost vnto the very cite of VENICE. What could they then deuise or wish for more honourable or glorious, than with the safetie of their fleet, yea without any losse at all, to haue performed so great matters? Now the three generall commanders of the enemies fleet to be so at discord amongst themselves, as that they were ready to fall in sinder of themselves; who now vpon the approach of Winter, and for want of victuall, must needs in few dayes returne home with their fleet, neuer after to meet againe with the like strength at sea: and therefore to what purpose were it, by force of armes and vncertaine battell, with danger to seeke for the souerainetie and command of the sea, which would forthwith of it selfe without any danger fall vnto them? Neither should they by the doubtfull victorie so much encrease their honour, as by the vncertaine euent of a battell blemish the same, if any thing should fall out otherwise than well. And that therefore they should doe well to take heed, that in seeking to augment their former victories, they hazarded not their honour already gained; but wholesomely delay the warre, and keepe themselves in safetie with their fleet within the gulf, and not to goe out at the enemies pleasure, but when they should see good themselves, at such time as the enemy was not so well provided: so should they (as he said) without any great labour or danger attaine to the full of their owne desires.

Partau Bassa was of opinion, That the Christians would not at all offer him battell: which opinion the Christians had also of him: and in this question, for giuing or not giuing of battell, seemed neither to approue nor dislike that Chiroche had so grauely spoken, but as a man indifferent and loath to incurre any blame, shewed himselfe ready either to stay or to set forward, as should be thought best by the greater part. But Haly Bassa, a man of an hotter spirit, and the great champion of the Turkes, could not endure to heare of any delay, but of present battell. The pleasure of Selymus, the hope of victorie, the remembrance of the displeasure Piall Bassa had the last yeare incurred, for not giuing the Christians battell, induced him now in no case to refuse battell, but forthwith to goe out of the gulf, and to accept thereof, if it were offered. In which his opinion he was the more confirmed by the relation of Caracoza a famous pyrat, and of great account amongst the Turkes: who in a swift galliot taking view of the Christian fleet, had reported it to be much lesse than indeed it was: deceived as was afterward thought, by not taking full view thereof, by reason of his posting fast; or els blinded by the island, which lying behind the fleet, suffered him not perfectly to descric the same. Vpon which report there was great reioycing amongst the Turkes, who now after their accustomed manner dreamed of nothing but victorie and spoyle. So that Haly vainely perswaded that his fleet was both the greater and stronger, would now needs fight, in hope that the Christians vpon the first sight of the Turkes fleet would either either retire and saue themselves by shamefull flight: or els in aduenturing battell at so great ods, G by their foolish hardinesse receiue a notable ouerthrow. This opinion of the Bassa was also notable confirmed by the persuation of Cassanes, Barbarussa his sonne, Fluzales, and Ohia-Beg, Gouernour of SMYRNA, all men of great marke and experience, especially in matters at sea: And although Partau the other Bassa stood wauering, as a man in doubt, and Chiroche Gouernour of ALEXANDRIA, with Carabuzes Gouernor of CILICIA, and Mechmet Gouernor of EVBOA, men of no lesse worth than the other, vpon better consideration, were of a quite contrarie mind, for not giuing the Christians battell: yet such was the authoritie of Haly, or rather his importunitie, forced to his owne destinie, that his opinion preuailed; so that now out they needs must, and fight. Albeit that two other espials sent out after Caracozza, &c. hauing more perfectly viewed the fleet, returning with speed, told the Bassaes, as truth was, That the Christians, very strong and H well appointed, were comming with ensignes displayed of purpose to fight: and that their fleet was in number much greater than was before supposed. With which newes so farr contrarie to their expectation, the Bassaes were exceedingly troubled: and demanding whether the formost gallies were all Venetians or not: and being answered, that they were intermixt, some Venetians, some Spanish, and of the other VVesterne countries: they began to doubt the wofull and became exceeding persiue. Neuertheless knowing themselves to bee of all things well furnished, hauing new victualled in the bay of CORINTH, and there also taken in twelue thousand Iantzaries and Spahies; drawne out of the garrisons of ASTOLIA, ACARNANIA, PELOPONESVS, and the other countries thereby, all resolute men, and foure thousand other common souldiors; and that they could not now with their honor shrinke backe, they held it still for the best, to hold I on their former resolution for the giuing of the Christians battell. Yet before their setting forward, calling together the capitaines and cheefe commanders of the fleet, Partau the more to encourage them; spake vnto them as followeth:

The Turkes resolve to giue the Christians battell

Partau Bassa encourages the Turke.

We are to fight (said he) fellows in armes, with that kind of men whom our ancestors haue driuen out of EVBOA, the RHODES, MYTILENE, PELOPONESVS, and TRIPOLIS; and wee our selues but yesterday out of the famous island of CYPRVS: whose cities and strong townes, in number infinit, our emperour hath, as the rewards of his warres; whom we haue alwayes vanquished, as well by sea as by land: and shall it then now repent you, that you in this warre embred in the Christian blood, haue sunke or taken many of their ships and gallies? That you haue caried away great and rich spoils? K That you haue taken whole islands and cities at the first assault? That we haue by prooff shewed vnto the world what force is in the Turke to subdue strong cities and townes? and what little power is in the Christians to defend the same? What direction brought vs victorie before, the same shall also at this present giue vs the like. Not to speake of that, that we farre excell them both in number of men and gallies, this is more to be reckoned of, that we excell them in valour and prowesse: for you being old expert souldiors, from your infancie trained up in the warres, hardened in infinit battels, and full of courage and strength, shall fight against weake, fresh water, and effeminate souldiors; who entertained for pay (of the refuse of all nations) know nothing belonging to the warres; or forcibly pressed out of cities, serue not because they would, but because they must neither will nor chuse. But not to speake more of the manner of the Christian souldiors, who are nothing els than the perpetuall exercise of your renowne and prowesse: and to come vnto him, vnder whose fortune and conduct they serue. What should I say? Should I compare either of vs (who haue spent our lines in victories and triumphs: who borne and brought up amongst armes, haue with our right hands gained vnto our selues honour and fame) with this stripling and halfe moneths capitaine, who neuer saw battels but these? who in a lesse matter neuer shewed prooff of himselfe, why should he be accounted of in a greater? who in so weightie a cause needeth a tutor: and such a one, as indeed beareth the name of a Generall, more for his honour, than for any worth in himselfe. Besides, amongst the enemies is such dissension; that euerie man regardeth his owne priuat, serueth as pleaseth himselfe, contemneth and is contemned: whereu with vs is such consent, that it cannot be deuised, how the souldiors in generall should more trust their commanders, or the commanders their souldiors. What things were by the discipline of warre or M carefulnesse of a Generall to be prepared, all those you haue abundantly and plentifully in readinesse: onely this last warlike labour remaineth; which once dispatched, our enemies shall be discomfited euen onely this last warlike labour remaineth; which once dispatched, our enemies shall be discomfited euen in that wherein their greatest confidence resteth. They shall be despoiled of their honour and traffike at sea: and that * citie once subdued, which is alone the glorie of the sea, there shall be no hope left for

* VL Venice.

A for the Christians neither by sea nor land: and (that we haue alwayes wished) ITALIE, faire ITALIE (wherein these matters are plotted against vs) shall be in our hand and power: wherefore let vs with such courage assaile our enemies as becometh most victorious conquerours, when so many times conquered: And so set forward; as if you saw our emperour himselfe encouraging you, and giuing you the signall of battell: of his bountie, and the present victorie, expecting all felicitie and blisse.

This comfortable speech with great grauitie deliuered by the Bassa, so encouraged the Turkes, as that they all with one voice and mind, seemed to desire nothing more than battell: for they still possessed with the first report of Caracozza, and encouraged by the Bassaes speech, were in B god hope to haue fought the battell vpon great aduantage; and therefore, though vpon nothing but present victorie. Whereupon setting forward with great cheerfulness, they came out of the gulfes, and shaped their course for the islands ECHINADES, about midway betwixt LEPANTO and PATRAS; before little islands or rather obscure rocks, scarcely appearing in the sea; but now to be made famous throughout the world, by the most notable battell that euer was fought in those seas.

The Christians also comming still on towards the enemy, the seauenth of October in the afternoon, vnderstood by their espials, that the Turkes fleet was comming, and euen now at hand: whereupon the Generall commaunded the great ensigne of the confederats (the appointed signall of battell) to be forthwith displayed, and a great warning peece to be shot off out C of his Admirall galley. And himselfe glittering all in bright armour, with Cardona Admirall of SICILIA, and Soto his secretarie, in a long boat went to all the squadrons of the fleet one after another, exhorting them with cheerfull countenance to follow their leaders, and to play the men: remembering, that they that day carried in their hands, the wealth, honour, glorie, and libertie of their countries; yea and the verie religion of their forefathers; and that that daies victorie would bring vnto them and theirs perpetuall felicitie: whereas otherwise, if they should as cowards suffer themselves to be overcome and vanquished, it would be vnto them the beginning of all manner of most wofull calamities. To which and other his like speeches, the capitaines and souldiors (before of themselves cheerfull enough) in euerie place where he came, gaue such applause with the joyfull crie of VICTORIE, VICTORIE, so often and so cheerfully in all places founded, as that it was taken as a luckie aboardment of the glorious victorie shortly after ensuing. In like manner Auriz in the right wing, and Barbadiens in the left (for the fleet kept the same order that they had appointed before at MASANA): ceased not by all comfortable speeches to encourage their followers: shewing vnto them, That now the time was come they had so long wished for, wherein they not oppressed with multitude, might at length shew their true valour against the false and faithlesse enemies: who being in deed nothing else but base and contemptible slaves, borne to bondage, and hauing lost their owne libertie, came to impugn the libertie of others; bringing with them a greater terrour of their name, than valour of their persons: and that therefore, if euer, they would, now shew themselves valiant and courageous, and that day wherein of all others true force was to be scene; to abate the pride of the barbarous and cruell E enemy: and to make their rejoycing for the conquest of CYPRVS short, before they had well tasted the pleasure thereof. At which time also the capitaines generally throughout the fleet, with cheerfull countenances and courageous speech, encouraged their souldiors: leaving nothing vsaid, that might hartten them on; or vndone, that might further the victorie.

Neither were the Turkes wanting to themselves (although it was fallen out much contrarie to their expectation, to see the Christians, who they before thought durst not haue shewed themselves, now ready to dare them battell) but encouraged with their former victories, and furthered with a faire gale of wind, came on proudly with their fleet, orderly and gallantly (after their wonted manner in forme of a Croissant or halfe Moone, their fortunat ensigne); and these in their comming on they were much troubled with the brightness of the sun, which F then shining full in their faces with his bright beames, so dazzled their eyes, that they could not well see how to their most aduantage to direct their gallies. In this fleet of the Turkes were two hundred and fiftie gallies, fiftie galiots, and twentie brigandines and other small vessels: all which a farre off shewed like a thicke wood; but comming neerer hand, presented (as we said) the forme of a Croissant. The middle battell in number much like the Christians, was conducted by the great perience at sea, the chiefe strength of the Turkish empire. The right wing was by the appointment of the Bassaes, commaunded by Mahomet Bey with fiftie six gallies, with whom were also many worthie captaines: and in the left wing was Vulzales the old Archpirat, but now the Viceroy of ALGERS with nintie five gallies, accompanied with Caraiolo and Arabey his two sons, H with a multitude of pirats, men of his owne profession, but most valiant and expert souldi-ours. In the rearward came Amurates Dragut with thirtie gallies, and diuers other small vessells.

The great and notable battell betwixt the Turks and the Christians, commonly called the battell of Le-panto.

Now was the day well spent, when both the fleets were readie to giue battell. The enimie still comming on, almost in the same order that the Christians did: for their middle battell came directly against our middle battell, and their wings against ours. So the signall of battell on both sides giuen by the shooting off of certaine great pieces: the Turkes, after their manner comming on with an hideous crie, first light vpon the six galeasses, which lying at anchor almost a mile before the fleet as most strong bulwarks, out of their forecastles powred out their murdering shot vpon the Turkes, now come within their danger; and in their passing by, so plagued them I by discharging their whole broad sides, first the one, and estoons the other vpon them, that hauing receiued great losse, and diuers of their gallies sunke, they were enforced to breake their order, and to fall farther off. Which so much the more troubled the Turkes, for that they had before supposed, those great carts and vnseruicable ships (as they accounted of them) to haue cari-ed little or no great ordinance on their sides, after the manner of their gallies: for the vse of the galeasses was not vnto the Turkes knowne, vntill now that they had receiued from them most notable harmie: which as it was the beginning of their miserie, so was it vnto the Christians of greatest importance, for the gaining of the victorie. At which time also the wind, which all that day had much fauoured the Turkes, was now (God no doubt fighting his owne battell) come about to the West, and with a pleasant gale in the time of the fight, carried the smoake of the K great ordinance vpon the Turkes, to their no small disadvantage. Yet for all this losse and disorder in their fleet, the fierce enimie with wonderfull pertinacie passing by these galeasses, quickly repared againe to their places, and made good their disordered squadrons, and with all their force assailed the Christian fleet. The trumpets, drums, and other instruments of warre, had scarcely well sounded, when all shooke with confused cries, flames of fire, thundring of artillerie, and other noise of the mariners and seamen: wherewith many were so astonied, as if they had been both deafe and blind, hauing vpon the sudden almost lost the vse both of their sight and hearing.
At which verie instant, a man might haue scene whole showers as it were of arrowes and darts mixt with the deadly shot, flying from the one fleet to the other; the masts broken, the saile yards strucke downe, the tackles rent, and all confused with horroure and feare. Haly beholding the L Admirall gallie (which was easie to be knowne by the flag) and vsing the surpasing cheerfulness of his mariners and rowers, ran vpon her with such violence, as if he would haue presently stemmed her: but being with like force encountered by the Admirall, they met together with such violence, that both their beakes were with the feaze broken off, and so fell into the sea. There began a most cruell fight betwixt those two great commanders, who had before drawn vnto them the strongest gallies in their fleets, and the choicest men in their armies. In the Admirall gallie of the Christians, were foure hundred select men picked out of the whole army, most of them captaines and auntients, men of approued valour: who not only valiantly repulsd the furious enemies, but with greater courage enforced them to shrinke backe, and pressing hard vpon them entred the gallie euen to the maine mast; where the enimie strengthened with new supply fought M courageously, repulsd the Spaniards, and cleared againe their gallie. Many were there wounded on both sides, and many slaine. Don John seeing his men giue way, sent in new supplies; wherwith the other encouraged, bestirred themselves more lustily than before, and hardly charge vnto the Turkes: who with like hope and like courage encounter them. The battell was like vnto the ebbing

A ebbing and flowing of the sea: Thrife the Turkes were driuen euen vnto the maine mast, and thrife strengthened with new supplies, they with great slaughter repulsd the Christians backe againe.

Venerius perceiuing the danger of the General, was about to haue assailed the poupe of Venerius com-Haly his gallie, so to haue endangered her being set vpon both before and abathe: but in com-ming thither he was encountred by Pertau the other Bassa, who with a companie of gallies opposed himselfe against him, and that with such celeritie, that hauing made shew as if he would haue charged him afront, he by and by set vpon his side. Which vnexpected manner of fight so suddenly fashioned, at the first much troubled the Christians, who afterward gathering courage, notably defended themselves. Venerius vpon whose valour the Venetian state rested, gallantly armed, not only encouraged his men, one while with intreating, another while with threatning, but was himselfe in the midst of them fighting: whose great honor moued the minds of his souldiors, but his reuerend yeares more; to see him (being aboue threescore and seauente-cene yeares old) to performe all the parts of a braue youthfull commander, in the verie face of the greatest danger. The fierce enimie hauing slaine many of the Christians, pressed on more furiously, and fighting close together, entred the prow of Venerius his gallie now bared of defendants, and with their multitude rather than true valour oppressed the Venetians; who had there no doubt been ouercome, had not Ioannes Lauretanus, and Gatherinus Malipetra, two valiant captaines, and lying not farre off, speedily come to their reliefe. By whose comming in, the fight was in the turning of an hand quite altered: so that they which a little before fiercely assailed the Venetian gallies, were now glad to defend their owne: so for a space the fight stood indifferent, but in proesse of the battell, those two worthie captaines, whilst they also performe the parts of most resolute souldiors, were both slaine; shot through with small shot. The fall of these notable men, did rather enrage than discourage the minds of their souldiors; so that blinded as it were with furie, and suddenly become other men, they desperately pressed in vpon the Turkes.
So that whilst they on the one side kill and wound them, and Venerius more hardly chargeth them on the other; the terrour of the battell was turried from them that were euen at the point to haue beene vanquished, vpon the victors. And our men after great slaughter of the Turkes, tooke two of their gallies: Pertau the Bassa in a long boat escaped the danger, and so got him out of the battell. Not farre offthence, Columnius the Popes Admirall, as a valiant chieftaine D hardly assailed other of the Turkes gallies, and made amongst them great slaughter: one singled from the rest, he tooke, and disordered the other. Lignius the Admirall of GENVA, with like courage thrust himselfe into the thickest of the enemies, & there made a notable fight. Many an enimie fell about the prince of PARMA, Rueres, Vrsinus, Cornea and Iustinianus; who for their present honour and future fame, fought most courageously.

Malipetra slaine

At the same time Chiroche or Sirocke (of some called Mahomet Bey) with his right wing with great confidence came forward against the left wing of the Christian fleet; but falling before he was aware into the danger of the galeasses, was from out of them miserably beaten with the great ordinance, hauing many of his men slaine, and diuers of his gallies sunke and torne, few of the hugie and deadly shot falling in vaine into the sea, by reason of the thicke standing of the Turkes gallies: where also diuers of the enemies were burnt with pots of wild fire, cast into their gallies out of the tops of the galeasses. Chiroche to auoid the danger of the galeasses, and to shun the dangerous shelves betwixt him and the maine (which the river Achelous running betweene the borders of ACHARNANIA and ÆTOLIA, and there falling into the sea, maketh) sent a great part of his gallies vnder the conduct of one Alis, a notable renegat of GENVA, to cast about aloofe vpon the right hand, and so to come vpon the backe of Barbadius the leader of the left wing of the Christian fleet: Which he perceiuing, forthwith turned his gallies, and with their prows receiued the first onset. The great ordinance first on both sides discharged; diuers of the gallies graped fast together, in such sort, as that they encountered one another, not with their misliue weapons onely (as with their small shot, arrowes, and darts) but with their drawn swords foot to foot. Amongst the rest, the fight of two of the Christian gallies was most notable, in the one was Barbadius himselfe, in the other Marcus Ciconia, vpon whom fell six of the enemies gal-lies, and vpon Barbadius fue: who although they were on euerie side distressed with a most doubtfull and dangerous fight, yet did they most valiantly with worthie resolution endure the same. In the furie of this battell, Barbadius encouraging his souldiors, and fighting himselfe even there where most danger was, was hit in the left eye with an arrow, and so stricke into the braine almost through the head: wherewith falling presently downe, he was taken vp for dead; howbeit he died not thereof vntill three daies after. The supposed death of this worthie man much troubled the Christians, and both the armies felt his fall. (Such force there is in the valour of one worthie man) for the Turks now as conquerors lustily boorded the gallic, troubled with the losse of the captaine, and the Venetians as men discouraged, gaue way: the gallic had there vndoubtedly beene lost, had not Federicus Tanius and Syluius Porcia with their gallies speedily come to her releefe: by whose comming in, such an alteration was made, as that the gallic before halfe taken, was not onely cleared, but diuers of the Turks gallies also boorded, and some of them taken, not without the great slaughter of the Turks. In this so hard and mortall a conflict, Syluius was grievously wounded in the thigh, and in his right side. It is reported of Barbadiem, That lying that euening at the point of death, the battell then ended, he like another Epaminondas asked which part had got the victorie: and being told that the Christians had got it, and that the Turks fleet was most part taken, and the rest sunke or burnt: he with his eyes cast vp vnto heauen, gaue vnto God immortall thanks therefore, and not long after joyfully departed this life, to lue in blisse for euer.

Ciconia hardly beset, and in danger to haue been lost, is relieued.

Ciconia in the meane time hardly beset with six of the enemies gallies (as we haue before said) was himselfe fore burnt with wild fire, and hurt in the face: and hauing endured a long and terrible fight, was now euen at the point to haue beene lost; when sudden releefe comming in, he was now contrarie to all hope saued, and therewith so much encouraged, that with his wearie and wounded souldiors, as men from death reuiued, he afresh charged the enemy, and tooke one of his principall gallies, with one of the Turks fairest ensignes, which in the Venetian Armorie is yet there to be seene: of his worthie valour, his honest wounds in his face and the forepart of his bodie, were most certaine and vndoubted witnesse.

An hard fight betwixt Io. Con-sarenius and Chi-roche.

Not farre off, in the same wing, Ioannes Contarenus, an honourable and valiant gentleman, did with his great shot exceeding great harme amongst the Turks gallies: Which Chiroche perceiuing, and therewith enraged, ran so fiercely vpon the side of Contarenus his gallic, that with his beake he had well nere stemmed her; & presently grappling fast with her, was like to haue boorded her: whom neuertheless the Christians notably repulled, with greater slaughter than was thought possible for so small a number to haue made: neither did the enemies fall vnreueged; but all embrued with the blood of the Christians. Seldome hath beene seene a more cruell fight, or more resolute captaines to encounter hand to hand. But after the battell had of long time stood doubtfull, the hope of the Christians encreased vpon two causes, for which the courage of the enemy quailed: first for that many of the Turks being slain or wounded, they were brought to a small number; then for that both parties saw Chiroche himselfe slaine: from which time the enemy, as well destitute of a leader to direct them, as of fresh supplies to relieue them, began to be cut downe right, or taken. Which their danger was the more encreased, because the gallic, bulged with the great shot, was now leake, and in danger to sinke: wherefore the Turks in that wing ouercome with despaire, began to thinke rather how to saue themselves by flight than by fight, reposing their trust in nothing more than in the neceressite of the maine. But as they were turning about toward the shore, they were preuented by the Christians: who entring the gallic, and hauing slaine or driuen ouer boord almost all that were left, tooke Chiroche, yet breathing, but halfe dead; and seeing small hope of his life, with fresh wounds made an end of him.

Chiroche slaine,
and his gallic sa-ken.

An hard and
doubtfull battell

Diuers and doubtfull was the whole face of the battell: as fortune offered vnto euery man his enemy, so he fought; according as euery mans disposition put into him courage or feare, or as he met with moe or fewer enemies, so was there here and there sometime victorie, and sometime losse. Many fights were in sundrie places seene mingled together. Some gallies whiles they run to stemme others, are themselves by others stemmed. Some, which you would thinke were flying away, falling by fortune vpon one victorious gallic or other, suddenly take them. Other some as if they had beene of neither part, row vp and downe betwixt the battels. The chance of warre in one place lieth vp the vanquished, and in another ouerthroweth the victorious. All was full of terrour, error, sorrow, and confusion. And albeit that fortune had not yet determined which way to incline, yet the Christians at length began to appeare much superior both in courage and strength: and the Turks seemed now rather to defend themselves, than to assault their enemies.

Bacianus

Bacianus in the rereward intently marked all the whole fight, and euer as need required sent in present aid, without respect whether they were the Popes gallies, the king of SPAINES, or the Venetians, that were distressed. In this long and terrible fight it chanced, that the Turks seeing the Christian Generals gallie hardly charged on the prow by Haly Bassa, to bee almost bared of defendants in the pouce, all the souldiors hauing their hands full before, were about to haue boorded her abath, and to that purpose were fetching a compasse about her: Which Bacianus quickly perceiuing, glittering in bright armour, came speedily in with certaine gallies, and by opposing of himselfe against them, stayed their course. In all the battell was not seene a more cruell fight: for hauing discharged many volleys of shot, and arrowes and darts without number, they graped at length together, and came to the sword, where with the formost Bacianus not onely with words but with his presence and valour wonderfully encouraged his souldiors, hauing receiued in his targuet of prooffe two small shot. Many were on both sides slaine: the Spaniards attempting sundrie times to haue entered the Turkes gallies, were with great losse repulled; but not giuing it so ouer, neither giuing the enemy leaue to breath, or so much as to looke behind him, valour was vanquished by pertinacie: and the Spaniards hauing ouerthrowne and slaine their enemies, enjoyed their gallies.

Now had Don Iohn with like courage and strength, but with doubtfull victorie, fought three houres and more with Haly Bassa: when after so dreadfull and dangerous a fight, and many a deadly wound on both parts giuen and receiued, our men began to faint, and brought to the vttermost of their deuoir, were in danger to haue beene ouercome, had not Don Iohn betaken himselfe vnto his onely and last refuge. He had (as is before said) referued vnder the hatches foure hundred of his best and select souldiors, for their valour chosen out of the whole armie against all the euent of so long and dangerous a battell: these men attentively attending euery becke of Don Iohn, vpon signe giuen, as was before appointed, suddenly start out, and with a terrible crye and desperate onser assailed the enemy, before almost spent with labour and wounds. This fresh and vnexpected companie so suddenly growne vp, first astonied, and afterwards confounded, and with a great slaughter vanquished the Turkes, and possessed the galley. The Bassa deadly wounded in the head with a shot, and all embrued with blood, was taken, and as a joyfull spectacle brought to Don Iohn: who seeing him readie to breath his last, commaunded him to be despoiled of his armour, and his head stricke off. Which presently set vpon the point of a speare, hee for a space held vp aloft with his owne hand, as a trophy of his victorie, as also with the sight thereof to strike a terrour into the minds of the other Turkes, who in the other gallies fast by fought yet right valiantly: neither was he therein deceiued, for the Turks beholding the knowne countenance of the Bassa, their late Generall, and a flag of the crosse set vp in the top of his gallic, and the noise of the Christians (crying victorie) running through the armie; were therewith so discouraged, that confounded with feare, they turned their gallies and with might and maine made toward the land, which was not much more than a mile off. Which Canalis and Quirinus yet breathing with the late slaughter of the Turkes, perceiuing, with their gallies hardly pursued the flying enemy, and sunke and tooke diuers of their gallies. Partau his sonne by the staying of the rest got time to run his gallic on ground, and so forsaking her, saued himselfe and his men by running ashore: so did also diuers others run themselves aground and forsake their gallies, which presently became a prey vnto the Christians. In this hot conflict was Caracoza the famous pyrrat (who abjuring the Christian religion, had turned Turke, and of long time done exceeding much mischeefe vpon the coasts of the Christian countries) valiantly fighting, slaine by Buzzacharius of PADUA, by whose death many were deliuered of a great feare.

Haly Bassa had brought forth with him his two sonnes Achmat and Mahomet, the one three and twentie yeares old, and the other thirteene, the nephewes of the great emperour Selymus, by his sister married to Haly; them their father had placed in a great gallic, with a strong guard of the Janizaries: who seeing the discomfort of the maine battell, and the danger now drawing nere vnto themselves, were exceedingly afraid; and therefore to saue themselves, thought it best with all speed to make toward the maine. But in so doing, they were preuented by Requisenius the great Commendour, who with his furious Spaniards boording the Turkes, already dismayed and running away, slew of them a great number; and after a great fight and much cruell execution done, tooke the gallic, and that which pleased him more, the two sonnes of Haly both aliue: in the time of which fight, the poore Christians, who fast chained in the gallic, had as slaves long serned in great miserie: now perceiuing the Christians to preuaile, brake off their giues, loosed one another, and with such weapons as first came to hand lustily laid about them, and notably furthered the victorie.

Notwithstanding all this good succeffe, the fortune of the battell stood yet doubtfull in the right wing. There stood in either battell two of the most noble cheefetains; one against another: on the Christian part John Andreas Auria, the Spanish Admirall; and for the Turkes Pluzales: both most valiant and expert commaunders, well knowne the one to the other, for that they had of long vsed the same seas, equal for their militarie discipline, as also for their noble acts, but farre vnequall for number of their gallies: for the Turkes had of one fort and other almost twice so many.

Auria, whether it were for that he would in the beginning of the battell wairly decline the danger, and not hazard his gallies, wherein his cheefe honour would be also endangered; or els afraid least the enemy, who farre exceeded him in number of gallies, should extend his wing at large, and enclose the Christian fleet behind; vpon the signall of battell giuen, shrunke further off from the rest of the battell: but whether vpon policie, that it might be at his choice either to fight, if the rest of the armie preuailed, or to retire, if they should be ouertome; or that he vpon martiall policie declined the force of too strong an enemy: diuers men diuersly glofed: but what the cause was indeed, the wisest could not surely tell. Howsoeuer the matter stood, it seemed his purpose was by policie to counteruaile what he wanted in strength. This his falling off seemed vnto the Turkes most strange, vnto whom his quicke departure seemed at the first in manner of a flight. Neither was Auria content with that space he had first seperated himselfe from the armie: but the second time fell off further, and there staying and hovering aloofe off, seemed to wait some good oportunitie, to take the enemy at some aduantage: hauing in the meane time one of the galeases of Pisa lying before him, as it were in stead of a bulwarke, which with often shot much troubled the enemy. Pluzales also extending his wing, tooke such a space, as that he seemed able to haue compassed in and enclosed Auria: yet offered not battell, but rather lay as expecting if any aduantage should be giuen him by the Christians, than rashly or vnadvisedly to offer himselfe or his gallies to any desperat danger. He had not long so lien, but that according to his desire twelue of the Venetian gallies, which had withdrawne themselves from Auria (and without any order or direction romed too and fro) fell into his danger: these gallies cut off from the rest, Pluzales with wonderfull celeritie enclosed; and with the multitude of his gallies bounding them one by one, slew the defendants, and tooke the gallies. In this fight many of the knights of the Order of S. Stephen most valiantly fighting, were slaine. Benedictus Superantius, a noble Venetian, seeing most part of his men slaine, himselfe mortally wounded, and his galie now almost taken, resoluving rather presently to die, than to fall into the hands of his enemies; desperatly put fire to the store of powder he had in the galie, and so blew vp himselfe; his souldiors that were left, with a great number of the enemies together. The report of the great ordinance, and noise of the battell in that part of the fleet being heard, they which had now in the middle battell got the victorie, together turned their gallies thitherwards to aid Auria, but not in one squadron together, but coming along one after another, as euery man had sooner or later cleared himselfe of his enemy: amongst the rest Petrus Iustinianus (Admirall of the gallies of MALTA) coming formost, was encountered with three of the Turkes gallies, with whom he with his knights had a great and most terrible fight. Which Pluzales beholding; and about all others hating the knights of the Order, speedily sent in other three gallies to helpe their fellows. So Iustinian hardly beset with six gallies, and oppressed with the multitude of his enemies; had lost fiftie of his most valiant knights, with one of his ensignes; and with much adoe hardly defended himselfe. But being now brought to the last cast, and the galie in the iudgement of all men giuen for lost, loe two of the other gallies of MALTA, who had so valiantly fought with other three of the enemies gallies that they were now vpon point to haue taken them all, seeing the danger of their Admirall, forsooke their vanquished enemies; and with all speed came to relieue him: where they found him yet alive, but shot in with three arrowes, and still fighting courageously at the decke of his galie, with those few he had yet left, before round with their enemies: but by the coming in of these two gallies, as if it had beene by helpe sent from heauen, the Turkes were notably repulled, and the Admirall with his galie rescued; as a prey out of the mouth of the greedie lyon. Pluzales vnderstanding that the maine battell and right wing of the fleet was ouerthrowne by the Christians, for feare gaue ouer the fight; and leauing the gallies he had taken, and hoising saile, was the first in that wing that fled. Which Cardonius perceiuing, who was come in before the rest, suddenly shewed himselfe at his backe; and by assailing the hindermost gallies, did what he might to stay their flight vntill the rest of the victorious gallies were come in. But whilst he so eagerly pursueth the flying enemy, sicke of the Turkes captaines enraged with such an vnwonted disgrace, and mindfull of their wonted prowesse, staied their flight; and contrarie to the expectation of the Christians, turned themselves and renewed the battell. What minds they bare, the event shewed, for in a trice almost all Cardonius his souldiors and mariners were slaine: nothing letteth the taking of the galie, but that Pluzales seeing Don John, Columinus, and Venerius neere at hand, and making towards him, and Auria also continuing fast on, was afraid longer to stay, and therefore giuing ouer the fight, fled as fast as he could: yet carrying away with him one galie of Cyprus, and one ensigne of the knights of MALTA, as testimonies of his owne valour when he should appeare before Selymus. The Christians, although wearie of the long fight which they had almost by the space of fure houres endured; yet so long as they were in any hope to ouertake any of their flying enemies; hardly pursued them in chase: but when they perceiued it preuailed not to follow farther, and that it was more than time to see to their wearie and wounded souldiors and mariners; they staied from farther pursuit; for why the night came now fast on, vnder the covert whereof the craftie old pyrat flying for life with sailes and oares, escaped with thirtie (or as some write, fortie) gallies againe into the bay of LEPANTO.

It was a right horrible spectacle to see, how in this battell the sea stained with blood, and couered with dead bodies, weapons, and the fragments of the broken gallies: besides the great number of them that were slaine, and beaten into the sea; many of the Turkes blinded with feare, casting away their weapons, to escape the furie of the enemy threw themselves headlong into the sea: but finding no hope to recouer the land, laboured againe to come to the gallies; or else fainting by the way, were miserably drowned. Others, either halfe dead, weak, and vnskillfull of swimming, or ouercharged with their armour, the sea also deuoured: yea many that could well swim, wearied and wounded, sinke for feate. Others vpon planks and the pieces of the broken gallies, sought to saue themselves, and not knowing what to follow or what to shun, woefully perished. Othersome swimming and pitifully entreating their enemies, rather to take them prisoners than to kill them, were (as it oftentimes chaunceth where things are done vpon choller rather than vpon discretion) without compassion slaine: in which doing, the Christians thought they did rather reuenge former injuries to them done, than to doe them any wrong: with some mercie more pretialed than wrath, who remembering the common chance of warre, chose rather to take the Turkes prisoners, woefully crauing nothing but their liues; than without mercie to kill them. The number of the Turkes lost in this most famous battell, could hardly be known, by reason that many of them were drowned: Antonijs Guarnertus writing the historie of this warre, reporteth two and thirtie thousand to haue perished: but they which write more sparingly thereof, report not past halfe so many to haue beene slaine: of whom these were of greatest name; Haly Bassa the Generall, Mahomet Bey (otherwise called Chiroche or Sirbens) Gouvernour of ALEXANDRIA, Cassanes the sonne of Barbarissa, with his sonne Malamur Gouvernour of MILENE, Gider Gouvernour of CHIOS, Cassambius Gouvernour of the RHODES, Pront Agacaptaine of NAVPLIUM, Mustapha Zelibi the great treasurer, Caracora the famous pyrat, with many others whose names were tedious. The chiefe prisoners there taken, were Achmet and Mahomet the sonnes of Haly Bassa, both afterwards sent as presents to the Pope; of whom the eldest died by the way at NAPLIES; the youngest presented vnto the Pope by Columinus at ROME; was there honourably kept prisoner; and Mechmet Bey Gouvernour of EVBEA; and about three thousand five hundred others were in that battell taken also. The chiefe of them that escaped by flight were Partau Bassa, who seeing all go to wracke, fled in time in a long boat to land; and Pluzales, who (as it was afterwards certainly known) but with fine and twentie gallies and ten gallions fled to LEPANTO. Of the enemies gallies were taken an hundred three score and one, fortie sinke or burnt: and of gallions and other small vessels were taken about sixtie. The Admirall galie then taken amongst the rest, was so goodly and beautiful a vessel, that for her beautie and richnesse scarce any in the whole Ocean was comparable vnto her. The deck of this galie was on both sides thrise as great as any of the others, and made all of blacke Walnut-tree like vnto Ebonie, checkered, & wrought manuellous fair with diuers liuely colouts and varietie of historics.

histories. There were also in her diuers liuely counterfeites, engrauen and wrought with gold, with so cunning hand, that for the magnificence thereof it might well haue been compared vnto some princes pallace. The cabbin glistered in euerie place with rich hangings wrought with gold twist, and set with diuers sorts of pretious stones, with certaine small counterfeites most cunningly wrought. Besides this, there was also found in her great store of the Bassaes rich apparel, wrought with the needle, so curiously and richly embossed with silver and gold, that his great lord and master Selymus himselfe could hardly put on more royall or rich attire. His casket there also found with six thousand duckats in it, with a yearely pention of three hundred duckats, was giuen in reward to a Greeke, borne in MACEDONIA, which slew the Bassa; and was therefore also knighted by Don Iohn: who had also giuen vnto him the Burrell of the Turkes stander, which at his returne to VENICE (where he had of long time before dwelt, and serued in the Arsenall) he sold vnto a goldsmith: Whereof the Senat hauing intelligence, redeemed it of the goldsmith, paying for euery ounce a duckat, and layed it vp amongst the trophies of that most famous victorie. It was all of masiue siluer, guilt and engrauen round about with Turkish letters. On the one side was written: God doth conduct and adorne the faithfull in worthis enterprises: God doth fauour Mahomet. On the other side, God hath no other God, and Mahomet is his Prophet.

This notable victorie thus happily obtained, Don Iohn the Generall, with Venerius and Columna, the other two Admirals, came together; whom the Generall friendly embraced, but especially Venerius, calling him father, and attributing vnto him the greatest part of the victorie. Afterwards, all together with their hands and eyes cast vp towards heauen, they vpon their knees gaue immortal thanks to Almighty God. So did also the rest of the captaines and masters, commending one anothers valour and good seruice: but especially theirs, who for their religion and countrey had there most honourably spent their liues; which were in number about 7566. Amongst whom, the cheefe men, that were slaine, were Jo. and Bernardinus, of the honourable familie of Cardona in SPAIN, Horatius Carassa, and Ferantes Bisballus. Virginus and Horatius, noble Romanes, of the honourable familie of the Visini. Of the Venetian nobilitie, Augustinus Barbadicus, Benedictus Superantius, Vincentius Quirinus, Ioannes Laurentanus, Marinus Contarenius, Catherinus Malipetra, Georgius and Andreas Barbadicus, Marcus Antonius Landus, Franciscus Bonus, Hieronymus Contarenius, Antonius Paschaligus, Hieronymus Venerius, all of the order of the Senagours. Besides diuers other honourable gentlemen, who well deserued to be enrolled in the eternall monuments of fame. Of the knights of MALTA were also many slaine, amongst whom of the Germane nation these were cheefe: Ioschim Spart, Commendour of MOGUNTIA and FRANCEFORT, Ro. of Hamberke, Commendour of HEMMENDORF, and Fra. Droft. Of them that were wounded, these were of greatest name: Don Iohn the Generall, Venerius the Venetian Admirall shot through the foot, Paulus Iordanus, Troilus Sauell, and Mar. Molinus, with diuers others of lesse fame, to the number of almost seuen thousand.

Great was the joy conceiued of this victorie, but to none more welcome than to the poore Christians fast chained in the Turkes gallies; of whom twelue thousand were thereby deliuered from most miserable thraldome, and contrarie to all hope restored to their ancient libertie.

Two dayes after this victorie, Venerius sent Humphredus Iustinianus with newes thereof vnto the Senate at VENICE: who comming in at the Adriaticke port about noone the nineteenth of October, by shooting off of certaine great peeces, gaue warning vnto the cite of his comming, which at that time hung in great suspence betwixt hope and feare. The citizens generally awaked with the report of the great ordinance, came flocking by heapes to the port, euery man longing to heare the first newes. There they might see Iustinian comming afaire off with his gallic, but when he was come neerer, they might perceiue all the mariners attired like Turkes, and foure of the Turkes ensignes hanging behind at the poupe of the gallic, which filled their minds with the hope of good newes, deeming it to be (as indeed it was) part of the spoyle of the enemy. But after that Iustinian was landed (which he had much to doe for the peeces) and was gone to the Court, with a world of people following after him, crying out for newes; and had there deliuered his letters, and at large discoursed of all the successe of the battaille; which was forthwith blowne into the cite; and the mariners also after his departure had reported the victorie; and that the enemy was in a great battaile ouerthrowne: good God, how

A the people as men ouerjoyed, ran vp and downe the streets, doubling and redoubling the joyfull name of victorie. The Senatours also rejoycing together, gaue thanks to God with publicke prayers and joyfull hymnes in euery church: and afterwards by ringing of bells, peales of ordinance, bone-fires, and other such like things, shewed all the tokens of joy possible. And to make this joy the more generall, all prisoners were set at libertie, and all debts that exceeded not the summe of fife and twentie crownes, payed out of the common treasure; which was generally done through all the Venetian seignorie: and a decree made, That that day whereon the victorie was gotten, which was the seuenth of October, dedicated to the memoriall of Iustina, should for euer be kept holyday: and for the perpetuall remembrance thereof, a great masse of money was coyned, with the impresion of Iustina vpon it, and an inscription declaring the victorie.

B Many also their neighbour princes sent their embassadours gratulatorie to VENICE, namely, the dukes of SAVOY, FLORENCE, FERRARA, PARMA, MANTVA, and VREIN, and the knights of MALTA. In which so publicke joy no man was seene to put on any mourning garments, or to shew any token of heauinesse, although many had lost their dearest friends and nearest kinsmen; whose liues they reckoned not lost, but giuen vnto the Christian commonweale. The like rejoycing was also made in ROME, in SPAIN, NAPLES, SICILIA, and MALTA, especially at such times as embassadours from their neighbour princes, came to joy them of this victorie: yea and afterwards in other countries further off was like rejoycing and signes of joy, as with vs here in ENGLAND.

This is that notable battell, commonly called the battell of LEPANTO, fought neere vnto the islands CVRZOLARI, the seuenth day of October, in the yeare 1571, the like whereof was neuer fought at sea against the Turke, wherein he lost his cheefe strength at sea, with most of his best sea captaines: and might thereby well perceiue what he and his successeurs were to feare, if the Christian princes at vnitie amongst themselves, all discord set apart, should in zeale of their religion ioyne their inuincible forces against them.

In the midst of all this joy, generally conceiued of the late victorie, one of the cheefe prisoners of the Turkes, hearing it compared with the losse of CYPRVS (for that Selymus had therein lost his fleet, his best men of warre, with great store of ordinance) by a fit comparison shewed in not to be so, saying, That the battell lost, was vnto Selymus as if a man should shau his beard, which would ere long grow againe; but that the losse of CYPRVS was vnto the Venetians, as the losse of an arme, which once cut off, could neuer be againe recovered. Declaring thereby the great inequalitye of the losse.

The rich spoyle taken from the enemy in this most glorious victorie, was thus deuided amongst the princes confederat. Vnto the Pope were allotted nineteene gallies, two galliots, nine great peeces of ordinance, two and fortie lesser peeces, and fourscore and one prisoners. Vnto the king of SPAIN eight and fiftie gallies and an halfe, six galliots and an halfe, eight and fiftie great peeces and an halfe, eight great murthering peeces and an halfe, an hundred twentie eight lesser peeces, and a thousand seuen hundred and thirteene prisoners. Vnto the Venetians were assigned for their share, nine and thirte gallies and an halfe, four galliots and a halfe, nine and thirtie great peeces and a halfe, fife great murthering peeces and a halfe, fourscore and six lesser peeces, and a thousand one hundred threescore and two prisoners. The rest were bestowed vpon such other princes as had giuen aid, or otherwise well deserued in that seruice.

The joy conceiued of this victorie was not so great amongst the Christians, but that the sorrow thereof was amongst the Turkes farre greater. Selymus himselfe was then at HADRIANO-POLIS, where eight dayes after the battell, newes was brought vnto him, That his fleet was overthrowne and almost all taken or sunke by the Christians. Which so soone as he heard, he was stricken with exceeding greefe: and overcome with melancholie, would not that day suffer any man to speake with him. And the rumor of the ouerthrow still encreasing, had in short time filled all places with feare, teares, mourning, and heauinesse: some bewayling their parents, some their children, some their husbands, some their friends or kinsmen there lost. But that which most grieued the Turkish emperour, was the losse of so many worthie and expert captaines, of so many skilfull masters and notable fouldiors; who brought vp all their liues at sea, were not thought inferior to any then liuing: besides the perpetuall ignominie and vnwonted disgrace, thereby inflicted vnto him and his posteritie for euer. Wherefore full of wrath and indignation, he was about to haue commaunded all the Christians in his dominions (in number infinit) to be put to death.

death. Doubting indeed nothing more, than that they wearie of the Turkish thraldome, and desirous of imouation, should with weapons put into their hands, rise vp against him, and take part with the other Christians his enemies. But whilest the other Bassaes (as men dismaied with the crueltie of the commaund) stood all silent, Muhamet Bassa for his former deserts in great fauour with the tyrant, thought it good to make prooffe if his furie might by reasonable persuasion be mitigated, and some better course taken, both for the honour of Selymus himselfe, and the common good of the State: Yet well knowing how full of danger it was, in that tyrannicall gouernment, openly to speake any thing contrarie to the good liking of the willfull emperor, he durst not apertly contradict him: but leaning as it were to his opinion and pleasure, by little and little to draw him from himselfe; and so before he were aware to lead him into his owne deuile, and by delay to moderate the rigour of his former furie. To which purpose, he cunningly set vpon him in this sort.

Muhamet Bassa cunningly dissuadeth Selymus from so rigorous a resolution, by filling his head with most necessarie considerations.

Your anger (said he) most magnificent and inuincible emperor, against the Christians, is most iust: and in this my desire exceedeth all others, That they should endure and suffer such punishment as they haue of right deserved. Yet it behooueth vs so to satisfie our wrath, as men better regarding their owne good, than the hot desire of reuenge. And for as much as I am for your many and undeserued fauours, in all loyaltie bounden vnto your highnesse aboute others; I reckon it in part of my dutie, so much the more frankly to deliuer my opinion, such as it is, in matters of so great importance. Neither will I attempt my speech in any respect to the comforting of your grieved mind: for how can it be that you, who following the worthie examples of your noble progenitors, haue alwaies heretofore shewed your most heroicall and courageous mind, contemning all the chances of fortune; should not for euer after shew your selfe to be rather dreaded of all men, than dreaded full of any? Let others, whose kingdoms built vpon vncertaintie are subiect to the reuolution of time and change of fortune, yeeld vnto their euill haps: as for you, whose empire is founded by the mightie hand of the most highlest, and compassed about with an impregnable defence, and are your selfe by the power of God appointed king and commaunder of nations and people in number infinit, fortune may well a little pricke you, but neuer ouerthrow you. As for this late mischance, if it must needs so fall out, as proceeding from some immutable and eternall cause, must it be therefore alwaies fixe and permanent? Onely those miseries and mischiefs which the cowardise or foolishnesse of men bring vnto themselves, haue their firme and certaine calamities: other common euents comming from other causes, haue also their common and sudden changes: But how this late mishap at sea may be amended, and your former glorie there againe recovered, is hereafter to be considered. Now for the present (in mine opinion) this one thing, as of all others most necessarie is to be provided; That the weak and worst fortified places of your empire, most subiect to danger, may be presently strengthened with strong garrisons; and that by your present repaire to the imperiall citie, you cheere vp the minds of your heauie and dismaied subiects: which done, what shall let but that you may at your pleasure be reuenged to the full of the Christians? For there is no cause why we should feare the Christians, six hundred times and more before ouerthrowne: both our enemies and we are the same men we haue beene for many ages, we beare the same minds, the same bodies, the same strength, the same weapons, wherewith we haue gotten infinit victories both of them and others. And although such be the state of man, as that he cannot otherwise but some time or other tast of the worse tun; yet I thinke this present misfortune to be rather imputed vnto some fustall cause to vs vnkown, than to the valor of the Christians. Besides that, we may well enough oppose one small ouerthrow against our so many and infinit victories: yea we are to giue immortal thanks vnto almightie God, that we haue by force of armes subdued the rich and famous island of Cyprus, and that your high designs haue in that point sorted to your hearts desire. And hard it is in mine opinion to iudge, whether this late vnfurnat battell shall more hurt vs, or the Christians: for besides that the multitude of the Turkes hath no feeling of so small a losse, they will not as men discouraged, giue themselves to mourning and vaine lamentations, but with greater courage and force come forth againe into battell, and reuenge this losse with the infinit calamities of the Christians: who after this their good hap, will according to their wonted manner giue themselves to excess, pleasure, carelesnesse and ease, vnto their owne farther confusion. Thus haue I in brieue faithfully declared mine opinion: yet with that submissiue loyaltie, as that whatsoeuer shall proceed from the mouth of your imperiall Maiestie, shall be of me deemed most wisely and magnificently considered.

The Bassa was in such grace and authoritie with Selymus, that his opinion in counsell prevailed, and the tyrants wrath by his perswasion was well assuaged. But by the comming of Flucales to court, the remainder of his former grieve and melancholic was fully quieted: who after he had excused himselfe of the late ouerthrow, and declared what he had himselfe done in the battell, and in testimony thereof, presented him with one of the ensignes of the knights of Malta, told him also how that he had left the Christian fleet so rent and torne as that it could not possibly be made seruiceable against the next yeare: which newes was both of Selymus and the rest gladly heard. In the meane time Selymus placed this Flucales in the stead of Flaby Bassa that was slaine: and straightly commaunded the great officers which had the charge of his nauie, to build new shipping night and day: and farther enjoined euerie Gouverneur out of his prouince he had in charge, to haue in readinesse one gallie or two against the next Spring, as well for the defence of his owne dominions, as to reuenge the losse he had so lately sustained: wherunto also many of his great men put to their helping hands, and cheerfully furthered his desire. New supplies of souldiours were also presently raised and put into his frontier towns, great store of new ordinance cast, weapons and armour provided, and whatsoeuer else the necessitie of the present time required. So with the Turkes stood reason and industrie, rather than with the Christians, who (as some note) rather wanted discretion how to vse the victorie, than valour to gaine the same: which whether it chanced for that prosperitie begetteth negligence, or that men joying in their present blisse regard little the time to come, I leaue it to the judgement of the wiser to determine.

After this so memorable a victorie, the three great commaunders of the fleet sat in counsell to consult, what farther course they were best to take. But for as much as Winter began now to approach, and that they could not much doe vntill their fleet were new furnished and manned, they all resolved for that time to dissolve the fleet, and the next Spring in the beginning of Aprill, to meet together againe at Corcyra. Wherupon Don Iohn and Columnius returned to Messana, where they in safetie arrived in Nouember; and departing thence, and taking their leaue the one of the other, arrived, Don Iohn at Naples, and Columnius at Rome: where they were in both places with great joy and triumph received.

The Venetians for all that grieved with the losse of Cyprus, gaue not so ouer, but repairing their nauie with thirtie gallies, wherein were embarked six thousand souldiours, woon a cattie in Epirus called Margarita: and also recovered the towne of Sypetro, which the Turkes had that Sommer before taken from them; but now hearing of this ouerthrow, did vpon the approach of the Venetian fleet, againe forsake it. The gallies also of Creta conducted by Canalis, intercepted many of the Turkes vessels laded with captiues and the spoiles of Famagusta, as they were passing thence to Constantinople.

Although vpon the late obtained victorie, a certaine reconciliation had beene made betwixt Don Iohn and Venerius, yet of the former dissention remained an inward heart-burning of one of them against the other: for which cause, the Spaniards requested the Venetians to appoint an other Admirall in his place. Venerius was now indeed a man of great yeares, and his strength far spent; yet for that in his aged bodie rested great wisdom and courage, and that they thought him for his great deserts worthie all honour, they were wonderfull loath and vnwilling therein to gratifie the Spaniard: for why, they well knew there was no other cause of the Spaniards proud hatred, but that he had stood against them vpon the honour of the Venetians: and farther, they liked not that the Spaniard should so presumptuously prescribe vnto them, whom they should place or displace in or out of their honourable offices. Neuerthelesse, not forgetting what commoditie came by concord, and what euils of discord, and that they might not against so mightie an enemy well spare the helpe of the Spaniard; they resolved to make choise of some other; who succeeding Venerius, might with one consent manage their wars together with Don Iohn and Columnius. There was then one Jacobus Escarinus their chiefe Gouverneur in Dalmatia, who but a little before had notably fortified Adra and the other frontier towns, and for the space of foureteen moneths had notably repressed the furious incursions of the Turkes: of him then absent and not desirous of the place (as of a man of worthie desert) the whole State by generall consent made choise for their Admirall and Generall by sea against the Turke; which most honourable place he receiued not with all the solemne ceremonies thereto belonging, at Venice, as the manner was, but at Adra from whence he in the Admirall gallie sent for that purpose by Aloysius Grimanus his successeur in Adra, sailed ouer to Corcyra: where he found

Whilest Fuscarius thus lay making his preparation against the next Spring at CORCYRA, Sara Martinengus who had the charge of the Adriaticke (by the counsell of Venerius, who was now returned to VENICE) vpon the sudden landed his men, and besieged CASTRO-NOVUM, a strong towne of the Turks in the borders of ISTRIA; where at his first comming he tooke the suburbs, and had in short time brought the towne to great extremitie. But in the height of his hope to haue woon the towne, hearing that the Beglerbeg of GRECE was with great power comming thither, he was glad to raise his siege, and with all speed to get him againe to sea. The Turkes in like manner, to distresse the strong towne of CATARO holden by the Venetians in the borders of DALMATIA, built a great and strong fort vpon the passage from sea to the town, wherein they placed great store both of men and artillerie: in hope by keeping them of the towne from all reliefe by sea, at length to gaine the towne which they had many times in vaine attempted by force; for by land it was already enuironed with the cruell enemy, possessing the country round about it. Iacobus Superantius the great Prouidentour, then lying at CORCYRA with the Admirall, vnderstanding how CATARO a towne of no small importance, was thus both by sea and land by the enemy distressed: with twentie galleys manned with the most chiefe souldiours could be pickt out of the whole fleet, tooke vpon him the raising of the fort, and relieving of the towne. Superantius with this select companie, and certaine other galleys which met him by the way, came by night before the mouth of the bay of CATARO, and there diuiding his fleet, left the one part thereof at anchor before the fort, and with the other himselfe courageously passed by the fort, further into the bay: at whom the Turkes out of the fort made diuers shot, but (by reason it was darke) to small purpose. In passing by, Superantius tooke such view as he could of the fort, and by and by began on that side to batter the same; as did also the other galleys on the other side: and withall, landed their men on both sides; who vpon signall giuen, ran resolutely to the fort, and by plaine force entering the same, preuailed vpon the fearefull Turkes, and put them to the sword euerie mothers sonne; so that of all that great garrison, was not one left aliue to carrie newes of the slaughter. This fort was in length five hundred paces, but not strong towards land, from whence no such feare was doubted. In it was taken seauenteene great peeces of ordinance, with much faire armour, and great abundance of victuals: and seauen galliots which lay at anchor vnder the fort. CATARO thus relieved, Superantius with victorie returned againe to CORCYRA.

Fuscarius the Venetian Admirall with all things in readinesse, hauing long lien at CORCYRA expecting the comming of the confederats, as was before appointed; sent Superantius the Prouidentour with five and twentie galleys to MESSANA, to hasten the comming of Don John; and to attend vpon him by the way. But comming thither, and thinking to haue found a great fleet and a strong power in good forwardnesse to haue set forward; he found such small preparation, as well shewed the Spaniards small care for repressing of the Turke, and that they would not be verie forward in the seruice intended. Which filling him with griefe and indignation, caused him to complaine vnto himselfe of their vnfaithfulnesse, and to bewaile the state of his country, with the whole Christian common-weale: for Don John had before solemnly promised vnto the Venetian embassadour, that all things should be in readinesse against the appointed time: but now a great part of Sommer was past, when scarce some few companies and about fiftie galleys were met together at MESSANA; and when Auria would come with the rest, no man could tell. So that the careful Prouidentour stood now no lesse in doubt of the Spaniards delay, than of the Turkes furie.

Selymus sendeth
out Pluzales
with two hundred galleys.

Selymus, after the great overthrow he had receiued at the islands CYZOLARES, for feare he should be driuen quite out of the sea; was about all things carefull for the renewing of his naue: And hauing partly new built, partly repaired two hundred galleys, commended them to the conduct of Pluzales, with expresse charge, That by how much things had fallen out worse the last yeare, he should with so much the more care now beware the like danger; and not to go out of the bounds of the ARCHIPELAGO, or to aduenture battell but vpon aduantage, or at leastwise vpon an euen hand.

This Pluzales (otherwise called Occhiall) was an Italian borne in CALABRIA, who in his youth

A youth taken at sea by the Turkes and chained in the gallee, and afterwaits renouncing his faith, by many degrees grew vnto the highest preferments amongst the Turkes, and so became an exceeding plague, as well to his owne country as to all other of the Christians bordering vpon the Mediterranean. He now Admirall for the Turke, after the manner of the proud Barbarians, threatned with fire and sword to be reuenged vpon the Venetians: which knowne at VENICE, much troubled them; as well acquainted with the furie of the old Archpyrat. Beside that, Ant. Barbarus their embassadour, all the time of this warre kept in safe custodie at CONSTANTINOPLE, had by letters certified them, what a great fleet, and what a strong armie Selymus had provided against them: and that he himselfe told two hundred and fiftie saile of galleys when they set forward from CONSTANTINOPLE, beside some other that were to meet with them at GALIPOLIS: and that therefore they should beware how they encountered with the Turkes fleet, but vpon equall strength. It was also at the same time commonly reported, that king Phillip chiefe of the confederats, carelesse of the warres against the Turke in the East, was about to turne his forces vpon the kingdomes of TUNES or ALGIERS, neerer vnto him (as in deed he did the yeare following). The Venetians entangled with so many difficulties, were euen at their wits end, and day by day the Senat sat from the rising of the Sunne vnto the going downe of the same, consulting how all these mischiefs were to be remedied. But for as much as the greatest danger was to be feared from the Turkes fleet, as then houering euen ouer their heads, they by letters commanded Fuscarius their Admirall, That whether the confederats came vnto him or not, he should forthwith take his course towards the East; and there according to the enemies designes, and his owne discretion and valour, to doe what he should thinke best to be done for the common good of his country: and not to refuse to joyne with the enemy in battell, if he saw any good hope of victorie. Neither ceased they at the same time (both by their embassadours and letters) earnestly to call both vpon the Pope and the king, to hasten their forces to encounter the enemy before he should come out of his owne seas; and to carrie the terrour of the warre home to his owne doores, rather than to receiue it at their owne. The like message was also done to Don John, putting him in mind what his place, what the time, and what the danger of the time required: entreating him (if it were possible) of himselfe to adde something vnto that hast which the necessitie of so important a cause required. Who neuerthelesse for all the messages and letters to him sent (which were many) went still on faire & softly, delaying from day to day; telling, D that he would by and by come, and that the Spaniards would alwaies be so good as their word. Which was so far from his thought, that afterwards finding one excuse after another, he not only staied his comming, but called back again Requisenus also, whom he had sent before with 20 galleys to CORCYRA. Now were two months (fittest for the wars) vainly spent; when Superantius grieued to see time to no purpose so slip away, & fearing least the rest of the Sommer should to small effect in like manner passe also, with great instance importuned him to hasten his journey. Then at length Don John answered, that the Venetians requested but reason, neither that he wished for any thing more than to satisfie their desires: but that a greater care hindered the lesse, which was first to be preuented: He was aduertised (as he said) that the French king pretending the suppressing of certain pyrats, had assembled a great fleet at ROCHEL, with purpose indeed to invade E SPAIN, now that the king was busied in these wars against the Turke: & that therefore they must pardon him, if he persetued the regard of SPAIN before others, being expressly commanded from the king not to depart from MESSANA, vntill he had other commaundement from him. But whether this his excuse by FRANCE, proceeded of a true feare or otherwise, the Venetians much doubted; and the rather, for that the French king vnderstanding thereof by the Venetians, was therewith (as reason was) exceedingly offended: protesting, that he was euer so farre from that purpose of hindering any the confederat princes in that their religious warre, that if the troubles of his owne country would haue so permitted, he would gladly haue giuen them aid therein. Many there were also, that thought, Enuie the auntient enemy of vertue and valour, to haue had a great power in this delay: doubting whether the Spaniards would more reioyce of the victorie well hoped for, if they should joyne with the Venetians, or grieue if the same should by the Venetians be obtained without them. Superantius wearie of discourses and long expectation, and almost out of hope of any helpe in time from the Spaniard; how vntowardly foucer things went, thought better yet warily to moderat his griefe, than in so dangerous a time to giue any occasion for the Spaniard to fall quite off. Yet spake he not fauntingly or flatteringly of the matter, but with a certaine modest grauitie declared, That he had thought heauen would sooner haue fallen, than that Don John would not at the appointed time haue come to CORCYRA. And withall besought him, and wished him to beware, that he brought not the common State into some great danger: if they had to doe with such an enemy as might be delayed with, then he said he could easily abide delay; but now for that the warre and the enemy was such; as whetein, or with whom neuer any Generall had dalied without losse, to what end did he longer deferre or trifle out the time? or what other fleet did he expect? If they should diuide their forces, then were they all too weake; but vnited together, strong enough to defend the common cause. The neerer the enemy came, the more hast were to be made to joyne with the Venetian fleet. And what could be (as he told him) more honourable or glorious, than for him a noble young gentleman roially descended, of whom the world had conceived a great hope, that he would in martiall honour exceed the glorie of his most famous auncetours, againe to vanquish the proud Turke, the greatest and most mightie monarch of the world; to fight the battell of the highest; to assure the Christian common-weale against so puissant an enemy, and to purchase vnto himselfe immortal glorie and renowne. As for the French, there was no such thing to be feared, as was pretended, who with such slender preparation not worth the name of a fleet, was not so vnadvised as to set vpon a kingdome of such strength and power as SPAIN. Furthermore (he said) that it concerned not the Venetians more than the king himselfe, to haue the Turke repelled, whose kingdomes of NAPLES, SICILIA, and SPAIN, were no lesse than their territories, exposed to danger by sea. The good successe of their affaires in the East, would open the way for the conquest of AFRICKE: but if the Turke should preuaile, then were they to despair, not of AFRICKE, but of all ITALIE, SICILIE, yea and of SPAIN itselfe. The time (he said) and necessity of the warre, with the extremity of the danger of the whole and common State, required that he should with all his power and speed possible, take vpon him the defence of the common cause, or to say more truly of the Christian common-weale, then so dangerously impugned. These reasons drawn from the common good and the truth it selfe, much moued the Generall: but the kings pleasure was to be preferred before all reasons or dangers that could be alleged. But hearing afterward what resolute command the Venetian Senat had sent vnto their Admirall, he became exceeding careful: for he feared least if the Admirall should without his helpe fight the battell and gaine the victorie, he would conuert all the glorie thereof vnto himselfe; but if he should chance to be ouerthrowne, it would turne to his vtter reproach and perpetuall infamie, that in so necessitie a time he had withdrawn himselfe from the common cause. Wherefore as a man perplexed, and in doubt what to doe, he stood for a while as one at his wits end: yet at last, he vpon deliberation resolved to take a middle course, and so neither without the command of the king (by whose prescript order, all was to be done) to depart with the fleet from MESSANA; neither altogether to frustrat the confederats of the expected aid. And to that purpose sent two and twentie gallies vnder the conduct of one Lilly of ANDRADA (a noble gentleman) to the Venetian Admirall at CORCYRA; with whom went also Columinus with the Popes fleet. Now was Pius Quintus the late Pope dead, and Vgo Boncompagnius by the name of Gregorius Decimus Tertius, Pope in his stead, who vpon the same conditions with his predecessor, had entred into the league; and liking verie well of Columinus, kept him still for his Admirall.

Long had Fuscarinus expected the coming of the confederats, and albeit that the yeare was farre spent, August being then come, and no such aid sent as he had expected; yet desiring to doe something worth the remembrance and becoming their honour, he earnestly perswaded Columinus and Lilly to set forward with him toward the East, and with their vnited forces to giue the enemy battell: telling them, That if they were all of like courage, they should go not only to the glorie of the present battell, but to the great honour and aduancement of the whole Christian common-weale. After that he extenuated the power of the enemy, saying, That he could not but maruell, from whence such a number of gallies as was reported, could so suddenly be gathered; or whereupon so great confidence and boldnesse was growne vnto them, so lately ouerthrowne and put to flight: The enemies fleet (he said) was the yeare before overcome and dispersed, the captaines and mariners slaine; and that therefore it was not credible, that so many gallies could with such celeritie be built, and such a number of mariners and masters as was needfull, in so short time prouided: That the prouision of the enemy was by flying fame made farre greater

A greater than indeed it was, or possibly could be; for why, they might easily guesse what the enemy was able to doe, by the Christians then selues, who could not without much adoe and great labour build their fleets, and traine vp their mariners and masters: and that therefore letting fame flie, which commonly maketh things greater and more dreadfull than they are, he was verily perswaded, that the enemy was glad to vse most vnskillfull and ignorant as well mariners as fouldiors; who suddenly taken vp in the inland countries, and put into the gallies, knew not so much as the very names of the ropes and tacklings, and other equippage; and then those gallies which they had, were like ynough to be but weake, as of them which were the last yeare rent and brused, and now againe botched vp, or in hast built of greene timber, could not be nimble or greatly seruiceable. Wherefore he exhorted them, as valiant men, to set forward against the enemy; and that with the greater courage, for that the last yeares victorie had opened vnto them the way for the gaining of another. Which if it should so fall out, as good hope there was, they should thereby take from the proud enemy both power and hope (but in long time) to be able to recouer his strength at sea: so that they in the meane time without feare might at their pleasure take the rich islands in the ARCHIPELAGO. Now if the Turks declining battell, should retire themselves into the HELLESPONT, then might they with fire and sword spoyle all the frontiers of their dominions on this side the straits, and open a way vnto the Christians to doe great matters.

Hardly were Columinus and Lilly perswaded by the Admirall: neither did they thereunto giue their consent, vntill it was decreed, That they should not in any case joyne battell with the enemy, but with their galleons and galleasses first placed in the front of the battaille, in whom consisted the greatest hope of the victorie. So setting forward toward the enemy, and come to COMENTITIA, letters were brought vnto them from Don John, certifying them, That he was now by letters from the king commaunded to come towards the East, and to joyne his forces with the confederats; but yet that for certaine dayes he could not come, vntill he were better prouided of all things necessary: and that therefore they should in the meane time carefully looke vnto all things, promising so soone as he possibly could to come vnto them. Vpon these letters Columinus and Lilly began to doubt, Whether to goe on further, or to expect the coming of the Generall: yet for as much as he had not expressly written anything concerning their staying, and Fuscarinus vrged them forwards, on they went, with the fleet diuided into three battels. The whole fleet consisted of an hundred fiftie five gallies, six galleasses, and twentie tall ships: in the right wing was Superantius; in the left wing Canalius; and in the middle battaille Columinus, Fuscarinus, and Lilly: and in the rereward followed Quirinus. Before each battell went two of the galleasses, still in readinesse for present battaille. In this order they came first to ZACYNTHVS (commonly called ZANTO) and so to CERIGO: the next day after to COLVERARIA (commonly called DRAGONARIA, outragaint CERIGO): Here Angelus Surianus, a valiant gentleman, sent before to discouer the enemy and what strength he was of, returning vnto the fleet, declared vnto the Admirall, That the Turkes fleet, consisting of an hundred and threescore gallies, threescore gallions, and foure great ships, lay about MALVASIA, in the entrance of the bay called SINVS ARGOLICVS, vpon the borders of PELOPONNESVS, about fiftie miles off from the Christian fleet. Shortly after the same fleet was againe discouered, making for MALBA: whereupon the Christians before resolved to fight wherefoeuer they should meet the enemy; forthwith put themselves in order of battaille; and so with their galleasses in the front, made with what speed they could toward him. These two fleets were thought for many respects almost equally the enemy was in number more, but inferior in strength. The Christian fleet by reason of the heauinesse of the galleasses, made but small way; and the enemy afraid of the great store of ordinarie the galleasses carried, durst not come neere them. The Turkes fleet was rather nimble than strong; but ouer more firme and forward. Looke wherein each exceeded the other, therewith they endeouored to helpe themselves and annoy the enemy. The Christians fearing to be circumscribed by the multitude of their enemies, opposed their ships and galleasses before them as a most sure fortresse: and the Turke, by how much he had had the worse successe the yeare before, was so much the more careful to beware how he endangered himselfe within the reach of the galleasses. The Christians desired nothing more than to fight, & to come to handy blows: but the Turke, who thought it sufficient for the present not to be overcome, sometime made by declining battell away as fast as he could, and by and by stayed againe, if happily he might haue taken the gallies seperated from the gallies, neuer seeming willing to aduerture further than reason and discretion were. The enimie seeing the Christian fleet comming still on, and readie to giue battaile, first seemed as if he would haue done the like, but afterwards turned his course vpon the right hand, and kept aloofe alongst the coast of MALBA: At which time the Christians, although they were very desirous to haue followed them, yet the Turks with their nimble fleet were quickly too farre gone for the Christian fleet to ouertake them, especially with their heauie ships. That day almost spent as it were in the chase of the enimie, towards the going downe of the Sunne the enimie put into the current of the sea betwixt CERRIGO and the Harts island, in breadth about ten miles; and there deuiding their fleet into three parts, lay in good order, as expecting the comming of the Christians, with the prowes of their gallies turned, as if vpon the confidence of the place, which they had filled ouerthwart, they had purposed nothing more than to fight. Yet both fleets seemed resolu'd; the one not to fight without the galleasses, & the other not to come neare those hot ships, from whom they had but the yeare before receiued so great harme. And although the enimie, as was afterwards knowne, purposed nothing lesse than to fight, but vpon great aduantage: yet fearing by open flight to dishonour his lord and master, and by granting as it were of victorie, to encrease the fame of the Christians, the craftie pyrat made a great shew of that he least indeed purposed. For pretending a great desire to fight, he indeed deluded the Christians hope: who although the wind had failed them, yet in hope the enimie would abide them battell, with much labour and rowing came so neere him, that the great shot began to flie too and fro on both sides: but when the matter should haue come to haue been tried by dint of sword, then it plainly appeared what the enimie had indeed purposed; for still keeping the prowes of his gallies vpon the Christians, hee by little and little shrunke backe: and beside that the shadow of the night began then to approch, he caused all his great ordinance, charged only with powder, to be shot off, and so in the thicke of the smoke retired vnseene; colouring his subtil departure also by certaine lights left in their cocke-boats, making shew as if the whole fleet had still there stayed. By this meanes the Turks with great celeritie escaped, being also holpen in this, that the Christians hindered by the heauinesse of the galleasses, could not but faire and softly pursue them: for these galleasses, as they are vessels of great seruice, so are they also heauie and vnweldie, and not fit for chase. The departure of the enimie at length known, the Christians also vnwilling to fight by night, returned to CERRIGO. Two dayes after the Turks stayed in the bay of TENARVS, now called METAPAN, and the Christians at CERRIGO; contented in that, that the enimie was the cause that the battell was not fought, and reckoning his warie and couert declining of battell, as a secret confession of the victorie. The third day after, the Christians desirous of nothing more than to ioyne in battell with the enimie, in their former order set forward from CERRIGO, and sayling all the night, were in the breake of the day descried from land by the Turks: whereupon Pluzales by shooting off of certaine warning pieces, commanded all his men to goe abourd, and to put themselves in readinesse for battell. And now the Christians were not farre off, when as the Turkes (least declining of battell might reprooue them of feare) came out of the hauen, with their fleet deuided into three battels: whereof the left wing was extended a great way into the sea, the right wing still keeping neere vnto the maine, and in the middle battell was Pluzales himselfe: who came all on no faster than the tide draue them, staying their course oft times of purpose, to haue drawne the gallies of the Christians from the galleasses and ships. Pluzales seeing his fleet thus in order, and fearing nothing more than the galleasses, commaunded both the wings of his fleet (hauing in each of them fourescore gallies) to fetch a great compassse about, the one on the right hand, and the other on the left, aloofe off from the galleasses, and so to assaile the wings of the Christians on the sides or behind: in hope so to haue disordered their battell, and without danger to haue drawne the gallies from the galleasses and the other heauie ships. Which their intent the Christians perceiuing, in their wings turned about their gallies also, in manner of the new Moone, their maine battell still facing the middle battell of the Turks. The wings of the Turks fleet thus farre seperated from the middle battell, seemed to present vnto the Christians a great aduantage: which Fuscarnus (intentione to all the offers of good fortune) quickly perceiuing, and calling vnto Columnius and Lilly, and shewing them the enimies maine battell at hand, and the wings gone a great way off, requested and perswaded them, That not staying for the heauie ships and galleasses, they would with him vpon the sudden assaile the enimies middle battell, now destitute of the wings: not doubting, but so to ouerthrow the

The Christians desirous of battell, goe against the Turkes.

A the enimies greatest strength there, before the wings could, now they were so farre gone, ioyne themselves to the battell againe. What could as he said haue happened more wisely, than to haue their battell deuided? So that they might at more aduantage fight against euery part thereof, now seperated, than against all three parts at once. If they had thought themselves not orieley equally, but too strong for the whole enimies fleet vnited, should they not the better ouercome them apart and disperied? The oportunitie he said was but short, and therefore to be forthwith resolu'd vpon. If they would take the present occasion of victorie then offered, and as resolute men charge their enimies, little fearing any such thing, they should by their celeritie and valour teach the Turks, what the Christian discipline of warre and power was able to doe: but if they would therein vse delay, they should ere long in vaine wish for the like occasion, they had let slip; when as their battell was againe strengthened with the wings. This the Admirals speech was of most that heard it joyfully receiued, and his counsell well liked; and that with such a general cheerefulness of the souldiors, as shewed in them no want of courage to haue giuen the enimie present battell. But Columnius and Lilly, being of the same mind they had beene alwaies, said it were dangerous so to doe, for feare of drawing the whole three battels of the enimie at once vpon them, against which they should be too weake, without the helpe of the galleasses and heauie ships: and therefore said flatly, That without those vessels, so much feared of their enimies, they would not in any case hazard the fortune of a battell. But whether Columnius and Lilly were of that opinion, for that they so thought, or were so charged by Don John (of whom they altogether depended) not to fight in his absence, many doubted. The wings of the Christians in turning about, to confront the wings of the enimie, were a little disordered: which the Turks perceiuing, and taking the present oportunitie, with fiftene of their gallies were about to haue charged the stragling gallies. Which Superantius perceiuing, to stay their course, went out coutagiously against them with foure gallies, and made with them a great fight: in the heat whereof, Superantius seeing fortie moe of the enimies gallies making towards him, and doubting to be enclosed, with all speed sent for releefe, which came presently in, namely, twentie gallies; with two of the galleasses: which forthwith sent their thundering shot so thicke, and furiously amongst their enimies, that in a little time eightene of their gallies were by them all rent and torne; and the Turkes therewith dismayed, were glad in such hast to returne, as if they had rather fled than retired. Superantius hauing in that fight but one of his gallies shot through, returned againe vnto his place. Of this light fight many deemed what would haue been the euent of the whole battell, if the opinion of Fuscarnus had preuailed. Both the fleets falling againe into their order, although the Christians could not so fast follow, as the Turks went before them; yet came they so neere them, that oftentimes they changed bullets, as well with their small shot as their great. And yet for all that, it was by many signes gathered, that neither the Turks would abide present battell, neither the Christians longer delay, if by their enimies they so might. The Christians had agreed (as is before said) not to ioyne in battell without their galleasses and tall ships: which Pluzales well vnderstood both by the fugiues and his owne cipals, as also by their manner of sayling. And he himselfe although he had no great desire to fight: yet to be the better able to frustrate the endeouours of the Christians, who with great labour drew with them the galleasses and other heauie ships, sent his chargeable great ships to MALVASTA, there to be vnrigged; whereby he discharged himselfe of a great burthen, and made himselfe able at his own choice, and pleasure to leaue or take, to fight or not: and also with such souldiors and other necessaries as were in the same great ships, supplied the wants of his whole fleet. By which policie the matter was brought to that passe, that if the Christians would needs draw the enimie to battell, they must of necessitie forsake their galleasses, their most assured strength: or if they would not leaue them, then they could not by any meanes enforce the readie enimie to fight. The day now declining, the enimie supposing himselfe to haue done ynough for that time, both for the abating of the heat of the Christians, and encouraging of his owne people, in seemely order, as one not afraid, sayled with his fleet to CORONA. The Christians in like manner retiring themselves to CERRIGO.

Whilest things thus went, Don John by a frigot sent of purpose gaue knowledge to the fleet, that he was come to CORCYRA, sharply blaming the great commanders for their departure, and that they stayed not for his comming: and further commaunded them as their Generall, all other things set apart, forthwith to meet him at ZACYNTHVS, there to resolu'e of all matters.

Columnius

The Turkes fleet at Corona, and the Christians at Cerrigo.

Don John sendeth word to the fleet to meet him at Zacynthus.

Columnius wholly deuoted to the Spaniards, and preferring the fauour of Don Iohn before the rest, hearing this message, was in such haste to haue returned, that he would haue perswaded Fufcarinus to haue left the heauie vessels and other weake gallies at CARIGO, and with an hundred of the best gallies with all speed to haue returned to the Generall. Of which opinion was also Lilly. But Fufcarinus more carefull than the rest, as he whom the danger more concerned, would not yeeld to that perswasion: for that in so doing they should (as he said) leaue the ships and galleasses, the cheefe part of their strength, in danger to be spoyled by the enemy; whom they now kept at a bay, without the helpe of the Generall; and should, as he well hoped, by often prouoking of him, at one time or other draw him to battell; and haue ouer him a notable victorie. And therefore requested them for the loue of God, and the zeale they bare vnto the common good of all Christendome, not to depart further off, nor to suffer the enemy to escape out of their hands, neither by their departure to leaue the islands of the Venetians subiect to the furie of the enemy: whereas the Generall might at his pleasure and without danger come vnto them, they lying betwixt the enemy and him. But Columnius and Lilly resolutely set downe, that what hap should, to do what Don Iohn had commaunded, would not listen vnto the reasonable perswasions of the Venetian Admirall, but told him flatly, That if he would not in that they had said yeeld vnto them, they would forthwith leaue him vnto himselfe, and with their gallies presently return to ZACYNTHVS, as the Generall had commaunded. Whilest they were yet thus discoursing, newes was brought, That the enemy was come with his fleet into the fret of CARIGO: which caused them all with one consent to resolute in such order to passe by the enemy, as if they should haue giuen him present battell: whereas before they were determined by the perswasion of Fufcarinus to haue gone to CERTE, and there leauing the ships and galleasses in safetie, to haue afterwards returned to the Generall. In such order the Christians passed by the enemies fleet, which lay still in the fret of the sea without moouing, standing as it were rather vpon the guard of themselves, than resolute for battell. In three daies sailing they came to ZACYNTHVS, where they found not Don Iohn, but two of his gallies, and commandement, that they should there leaue their heauie ships, and with their gallies come to CEPHELENTA, where they should not faile to meet him. Hereupon the Venetians were exceedingly grieved, and muttered through the whole fleet, That the Spaniards bearing themselves vpon their wealth, were too proud, and in comparison of themselves regarded neither the conditions of the league, neither any other mans credit, but trode all men vnderfoot; and would now vse the Venetians not as their friends and confederats, but as their slaues and vassales, feeding them in the meane time but with vaine hope. Yet for as much as the time and necessitie so required, they were content to be oueruled: and so leauing their ships and galleasses at ZACYNTHVS, went with the rest of the fleet to CEPHELENTA: whither Don Iohn was not yet come, but had sent word thither, That if they had any desire to joyne their forces with his, they should yet come further backe vnto him to CORCYRA. This message, which they had rather feared than expected, much troubled the Venetians: who readier to suspect euery mischeefe, than to hope for any good, began to fret and complaine, That the Spaniards could very well tell the Venetians what they had to doe, and forget in the meane time what was on their owne part to be performed. A hard thing it was to say (and yet to be said) that now they had more to doe with those their dallying friends and confederats, than with their enemies: for with their enemies they were to fight but in time of battell, but with them they were to wrestle and strue at all times and in all places. They were by them (as they said) drawne from the sight of their enemies, when as they might haue bene ouerthrowne: not to the intent that with their vnited forces they might more safely fight against them, or vnder the conduct of Don Iohn gaine the victorie; but rather least any thing should haue bene done, which might be to the honour or profit of the Venetians: and that time which was to haue bene bestowed in the managing of the warre, spent in lingering and delaying, and vaine going forward and backward to no purpose. One onely way there was (as they said) to haue dispatched with the Turke, which was, by ouercomming him in another notable battell, and so to haue vtterly broken his strength at sea: which course the confederats made no lesse difficult by their ofwardnesse and delays, than the enemy by declining of battell: That they had long ago by many secret signes probably conjectured, that the Spaniards had more care to hinder and crosse other mens doings, than to doe any thing of themselves: That their indeuours were, to frustrat those great hopes which promised vnto the Christian common-weale the greatest felicitie and happinesse, together with immortall

A mortall glorie: and, That the Turkes, of late discouraged with the fortunate proceedings of the Christians, might againe rejoice at their mishaps.

The Venetians, notwithstanding all these their mutmuring speeches, loath to fall off from the Spaniard, kept still on with the rest vntill they came to Don Iohn at CORCYRA, who then lay with three and fiftie gallies and eigheteen ships at SITICA, in the vttermost end of the island. At their first meeting, Don Iohn shewed himselfe not a little offended, that they had not with more dutie before attended his coming: and they againe not a little complained of his long stay, with many other their grieuances, which were tedious here to rehearse. The fleet now all with much adoe at length met together, which consisted of two hundred gallies, nine galleasses, and thirtie six tall ships: it was by generall consent agreed, that they should againe set forward toward the enemy: They were not yet vnder saile, when two of their espials brought them newes, that the enemies fleet (weakly furnished both of mariners and souldiours) was come to NAVATINVM: which filled them all with good hope, that the Turke fleet so euill provided, might in that place vpon the sudden be easily oppressed; and the rather, if they came vpon them v unexpected. Wherefore, because they would not be delcied, they kept not their course on right soorth, but sayling by night, kept aloofe vpon the right hand: and hauing passed ZACYNTHVS, came with great silence vnto the STROPHANES, where they lay at anchor all that day. In the euening they loosed thence, so casting their course, that the more to terrifie the enemy they might before day fall vpon him; and be seene in the mouth of the haven where he lay, before there could be any report made of their coming thither. But this course so well set, the time was so euill cast, that it was three day long before they could come to the appointed place; when the Turkes out of their watch towers discovering a farre off the coming of the Christian fleet, gaue warning thereof vnto their fellowes: whereupon an alarm was presently raised in the towne, and all men in armes ran headlong to the wals and to the haven. But the Turkes out of hope with their euill rigged fleet to be able to withstand the Christians, and not daring to tust to that weake harbour, and all now in a great hurly burly, ran confusedly hand ouer head, souldiours and mariners aboard: and whilest they had yet time, got them in haft out of that harbour, and as men chased by their enemies got them into safe harbour at MODONA, a strong town of PELOPONNESVS about six miles off. Columnius was sent before the rest of the fleet to haue pursued them: but they were got so farre before him, that they had recouered the harbour before he could ouertake any of them. The Christian fleet coming before the harbour, and leauing a space as it were of purpose for the enemy to come out into, there lay in the face of the towne, daring the Turkes battell. But when they had so lien almost all that day, and no man durst come out; and now toward the euening certaine signes of tempest appeared, the Christians fearing to be by force of weather driuen on ground, put farther off againe to sea. Then at length Pluzales sent out certaine light gallies to follow in the taile of the fleet, when the confederats suddenly staying their course, and turning their prowes vpon them, draue them headlong againe into the harbour: and afterwards retired themselves with the whole fleet into the islands OBVSIA, now called SAPIENTIA, right opposite against MODON. The next day wanting fresh water, they remoued vnto the bay of MASSANA, there to water in the mouth of the river Pamifus, which there falleth into the sea: where in passing by CORONA, they were oftentimes shot at out of the towne; and landing their men to water, were encountred by certaine troupes of horsemen, sent for that purpose by Pluzales. There was water deely bought with the liues of many there slaine on both sides: in the end, the Christians preuailling, watered, and so againe returned vnto the OBVSIA from whence they came.

METHON or MODON (for it is by both names knowne) standeth almost in an island stretching farre into the sea, where toward the West runneth out a long point of the land a great way into the sea; in the vttermost part whereof, standeth a great round tower. The towne it selfe is on the one side enclosed with the sea, and toward the land so strongly fortified, as that it seemeth almost impregnable. Towards the South commeth in a faire bay about three miles wide, safe from all winds except the Northerly wind only: and shut vp by a little island in the mouth of the bay, maketh a safe and quiet harbour, with two entrances thereinto on either side of the island. Within this bay lay the Turkes fleet, with the sternes of their gallies toward the land, and their prowes towards the sea. At the Southerly coming in of the bay standeth an hill, which the inhabitants call ALVS; on the top whereof, the enemy had placed six great pieces of ordinance, where wherewith to keepe the Christians from entering that way. So had they also vpon that point of the maine, which (as we said) runneth out from the towne, and vpon S. Bernards rocke, planted other great pieces of ordinance to defend that passage also. The Christians, comming vnto the mouth of the bay, there lay with their fleet diuided into foure parts, but yet doubtfull what to doe: for beside that the entrances of the bay were but narrow, they were also farre more dangerous to be entered, by reason of the great ordinance planted vpon them. Neuertheless, the Venetian Admirall in hope of good successe, and loth to let the fearefull enemy so to escape out of their hands, would faine haue persuaded the Generall, with his whole fleet to haue entered the bay, and there in the harbour to haue oppressed the enemy: which he shewed to be no matter to doe, for that the enemy was too weake in strength, and could not be from land relieved. In which doing, they should indeed ouerthrow but one fleet; but in the ouerthrowing of that one, they cut in sunder all the sinewes of the Turkish empire by sea: and raising a tumult in the bay, and filling all with a generall feare, should vndoubtedly at the first onset put the enemy to flight. Which done, what should let, but that, carrying about with them the terror of this victory, they should with their victorious fleet, take from the Turke all the islands of the Egean. It was truly and wisely it was said of Themistocles, That whosoever had the command of the sea, must needs also preuaile in the rest, and at length carrie away the victorie by land also. It was (as he said) the part of good chieftains, not to be wanting vnto themselves when occasion was offered: besides that, they were the same Turkes whom they had but the yeare before vanquished; and what had that one yeare either taken from them, or giuen vnto the Turkes; or what should they feare six pieces of ordinance mounted vpon an hill, who if they should vndertake the battell, were not to, feare the great store of ordinance in two hundred and threescore of the enemies gallees and galliots? I my selfe (said he) will be the guide and leader, in whatsoever shall seeme most difficult and dangerous: and will in person my selfe be the first that shall enter the harbour, and aduenture the first danger. Great victories (he said) were not to be gained but with great aduentures; and that therefore the matter were to be hastened, before more aid should be sent vnto the Turkes. Wherefore they should as resolute men attempt that, the Turkes thought, the Christians durst not to haue attempted; and with the same courage breake into the bay, wherewith they had but the yeare before broken the strength of the same enemy; and by the power of God, carrie away another notable triumph of the vanquished Turkes: who ouercome in a second battell at sea, must needs depart with all their maritime territories. VVith euill liking of the Spaniards was the Venetian Admirall heard. And Don Iohn the Generall, deeming both the time and place vnsuited for the attempting of so great an exploit; rehearsed on the one side, the strength of the enemy, the disadvantage of the place, the difficultie of the battell, with the manifold and great calamities received by the ouerhastie and rash attempts of their enemies: That the enemies strength was not to be so much deemed by the eye, or by report, as by reason; and that many in seeking to increase their former glorie, had in so doing ouerthrowne the same: That the Christians in entering and aduenturing the harbour, should on the one side be beaten with the artillerie from the hill; and on the other with the artillerie out of the castle of Modon: And that it was not like, that Pluzales should if need were, lacke aid from land, who but the other day had sent great troupes of horsemen to haue kept the Christians from watering: That a matter of so great importance, was (by Fuscarius his leaue) not rashly to be taken in hand, vpon an heat and haughtinesse of stomacke, but vpon graue and mature deliberation: for if they should in a place of so great disadvantage, hazard the fortune of a generall battell, it should seeme that either he knew not that kind of fight, and force of the enemy, or else would make the bay of Modon more famous by the ouerthrow of the Christians, than was the Cyzlari by the slaughter of the Turkes. Then what a shame would it be, if they which were about to oppress the enemies fleet, should themselves be ouerthrowne, and that in their owne deuise. He had rather (as he said) preseeue his owne fleet, than to take six hundred of the enemies gallees; and to account the same for a greater honour. Which he determined not, for that he would not haue any thing done, but that vnto occasions should not be too much hastened, and as it were thrust headlong forward: whereas time would giue opportunitie for the ouerthrow of the Turkes fleet, so that they ran not blindly on headlong; and that in future time, the Venetians would reioice that they had so moderated their desires. The Christians (he said) had sufficiently preuailed, if those things should fall out well, which were warily and aduisedly considered and resolved vpon.

The

A The matter thus on both sides debated, and nothing done, they returned with the fleet into the port of NAVARINVM. This proceeding, as it diuersly moued the Spaniards and the Venetians, so brought it forth diuers speeches, euery man speaking in fauour of his owne nation. The Spaniard openly vaunted, that he had most proudly resolved; for that how deere the counsell of the Venetian Admirall would haue cost if it had beene followed, the thing it selfe (as he said) shewed, by the extreame danger thereof presented, not in the doubtfull opinion of men, but laied open before their eyes. The Venetians on the other side more desirous of battell, the nearer they had seene the opportunitie to haue preuailed vpon the enemy, the more impatiently they endured so assured a victorie to haue beene let slip out of their hands: and thereof spake accordingly.

B The Christians lying at NAVARINVM, consulted of many things what they were best to take in hand: and resolving at last by sea and land to besiege the castle of Modon, which kept the passage into the bay, and defended the Turkes fleet; they returned againe thither, and landed seauen thousand of their best souldiours to besiege the castle. And at the same time, appointed the galleasses with certaine gallies to batter it also from sea: which the more commodiously to doe, they joynted two of their greatest gallies together side to side, which they made fast with masts and strong ropes, and so boured them cleane ouer, whereon as on a platforme, they placed gabions all afront, filled with earth, and great ordinance betwixt to haue battered the castle. But when this engine (in manner of a floating fort) should haue performed the seruice for which it was deuised, it prooued vseniceable, after it had with much adoe been brought thither, being C readie to sinke with the waight of the great ordinance and other things wherewith it was ouercharged. For which cause, and for that they vnderstood a great number of horsemen to be come into the towne, they gaue ouer the siege vainly begun, and put againe with their fleet to sea. It fortuned at the same time, that a tall ship of VANICA departing from ZACYNTHVS, and comming alongst the coast of Peloponnesvs with prouision for the fleet, was descried by the enemy; who thinking to doe the Christians a great dishonour, if they could almost in the sight of their fleet surprise her, they sent out certaine light gallies to haue taken her; Pluzales in the mean time with the rest of his fleet, lying in the verie mouth of the bay, readie to come out if the Christian fleet should once stirre to relieue her. Which the Christians perceiuing, and well hoping that so the enemy would be drawne to battell, sent out Columnius with his gallies to rescue the ship; and others also which lying aloofe, might get in betwixt the Turkes gallies and the bay: Don Iohn and the Venetian Admirall, lying readie to haue giuen battell, if Pluzales should haue come forth. But the Christians comming on with a small gale, the enemy being afraid, by shooting off of certaine warning pieces within the bay, in time called backe the gallies that were already gone out of the bay: who all forthwith came in, excepting Mahomet the nephew of Barbarussa, a most famous captaine amongst the Turkes, who as one of great courage, and desirous of honour, staid a little without the bay, with greater courage than discretion, expecting who should assaile him. Him the Marques S. Crucis set vpon, and had with him a great and terrible fight: but in the end, the Marques preuailling, slew Mahomet with all his Turkes, and with honour carried away the gallie. So the dishonour which Pluzales would haue done the Christians, fell vpon E himselfe, hauing in his owne sight lost one of his best captaines with his gallie.

The next day, because the yeare should not passe without something done, nor the hope of so great a preparation come to nothing, the Christians determined to besiege the castle of NAVARINVM (which was in auncient time called Pylus) more famous for nothing, than for that it was the natie place of old Nestor. The citie of NAVARINVM standeth vpon a rising ground, stretching somewhat into the sea; whereinto it hath a large prospect, and a faire large haven, but subject to the Northwind. It is defended with a point of the maine running compass into the sea, whereon standeth an old castle. Some sent before to view the situation of the place, brought word backe, that the castle might in three daies be woon. The performance of which exploit, was committed to Alexander Farnesius prince of PARMA, whom the Venetians furnished with F munition and victuall. He landing with two thousand Italians, a thousand Spaniards, and five hundred Germanes, began with twelve great pieces to batter the castle. And albeit that the batterie was planted so farre off, as that it did the enemy no great harme; yet happily the enterprise had taken effect, if by taking the straight and troublesome passages through a rough and thicke Forrest, the citie had been kept from reliefe: but for as much as those passages were left free, the enemy

enemie cunningly opposed policie against force, for falling out of the citie, they gaue the Christians an hot skirmish: and in the meane time whilest the Christians were so busied, by a port toward the forrest on the other side of the citie, receiued in great number both of horse and foot. The report of this new come aid caused the prince to raise his siege, and to goe againe aboard. And now rested all the hope of the gaining of the towne in the strength of the fleet: and that not small, for that the Turks not reliued with victuals by land, were by the confederates kept from them also by sea: for at that time the Turks were troubled with two great mischeefes, the plague, and famine. For no prouision had there beene made, as in a thing not feared; and that little being spent that was in the towne, they were enforced to seeke for victuals further off: which comming but sparingly, as in time of dearth, was oftentimes by the way intercepted by the fouldiors that lay about in the countrey villages, wanting victuals no lesse than they in the citie. And the moe men the Beglerbeg of GRACA brought down for defence of the sea towne, so much the more the wants of all things dayly encreased. So that no man doubted, but that in short time all would be brought to extreame penurie. What a death the mortalitie had made, the want of men in the gallies well declared: for many of the gallies for lacke of mariners and fouldiors were sent away into EVBA, or left at MALVASIA, or carried away to CONSTANTINOPLE. Those which stayed in the bay of MODON, were scarce an hundred gallies, and fortie galliots: and they so slenderly manned, that the greatest gallies had scarcely an hundred and twentie men left in them, and they so meigre and faint, as that they could scarcely hold vp their weapons. The Christians vnderstanding of these things, were in good hope, that by continuing the siege, they should without danger gaine a notable victorie: For which cause Fuscarinus I persuaded the Spaniards, of whose constancie he doubted, to hold it out, as men of resolution; shewing them, that in the euent of this action rested for them for euer to be feared or contemned of the Turks: who except they should be changed into fishes or into birds, could not (as he said) without a notable ouerthrow escape their hands out of the Bay. But vnto this his hope and counsell the euent was not correspondent: For the Spaniards, whether it were for the tediousnesse of the siege, or for want of victuals, or for the approach of Winter, or els moued with some other reasons, began to thinke of the matter diuersly: and at the first a report was raised, That the Christians giuing ouer the siege, would shortly returne home: and the reason was, for that they wanted bisket, and had scarcely victuals left for fiftene dayes, which was to be referred for their long journey home: Besides that, the approach of Winter did call them from the action: K and that hauing done what they might, they could neuer draw the enemie forth to battell; and that therefore hauing sufficiently and as farre as was possible already discharged their duties, they were now also to regard their safetie, and to foresee that their fleet, wherein the welfare of them all was reposed, were not too farre endangered. At the first these speeches were divulged by the common fouldiours and mariners of small credit or reputation; but afterwards by moe, and they also men of better place and sort: Yea Don John himselfe, whether it were to some other purpose, or that he so spake in good earnest, began to lay the fault vpon others, why that hee, so lately come from MESSANA, should in so short time want victuals and all things els necessarie.

marinere against the Spaniards.

With these vnexpected reports, and so farre different from the confederation, the Venetian Admirall with the rest of the Venetian commanders were exceedingly troubled and grieved aboue measure: for it seemed not credible, that they which but a little before were come from the most fertile and plentifull countrey of SICILIA, in all ages the most faithfull and abundant granarie and storehouse of ITALIE, both in peace and warre, could so soone want victuals. Could eightene tall ships (which ought by the capitulations of the league to haue come loaded with bisket, victuals, and other warlike and necessarie prouision) become emptie? or but to haue brought so much as might but suffice for a month onely? If this were done without the knowledge of Don John, where was then the care of a Generall? If he winking thereat, where was his zeale to the confederation? or to what purpose came he to CORCYRA? was it to auert the Christian fleet (hauing once or twice met with the enemie) from doing any good vpon him? Could it come into any mans head (besides that in so doing he was therein to extinguish the glorie of a most certaine victorie, like to worke the Turks confusion) by the infamie of a voluntarie returne to encrease the glorie and renowne of his enemie, and bring a perpetuall ignominie and disgrace vnto the honour of the Christians? verely the Spaniards, therein to shew themselves not so willing

A willing to haue the power of the Turks abated, as the strength of the Venetians not encreased.

These things Fuscarinus and the Venetians sometimes fretted at amongst themselves; and otherwhiles the Admirall himselfe expostulated the same with Don John and Columinus; and in the presence of the greatest counsellours shewed, not onely how profitable but also how necessarie perseuerance was in all martiall affaires: That it was an old and vsuall matter for men in besieging of their enemies to suffer many difficulties: if they should, hauing performed nothing, returne with the fleet, who would doubt but that both their labour and charge was againe the next yeare to be renewed? And what could this delay be els, but a prorogation of their further calamities? That therefore it much concerned the Christian commonweale, although they had not all things in abundance, yet resolutely and with patience to endure the scarcitie of victuals. If want of bisket were feared, the Generall might easily remedie that matter, by speedily sending for those ships which lay laden with victuals good store at TARENTUM; which thing might in short time be performed. In the meane time he promised to supplie the Spaniards wants with part of his own store: and that he had rather his men should liue with roots, than to let the enemies fleet coupt vp, so to escape his hands: That the desire to protect the honour of the Christians, would ouercome all difficulties. Besides that, the matter would be but short, if it were done at once, in one continued course; and would vndoubtedly be by them performed, if they gaue not ouer the thing they had so well begun, vntill they had accomplished it. They (as he said) might in good safetie lie with their fleet in the ports of NAVARRINUM, SAPIENTIA, and CAPRARIA: whereas the enemie, lying shut vp in the bay of MODON, should haue but a bad and dangerous Winter harbour; and October being now begun, should in short time be in danger to perish with blustering stormes and rage of the sea, familiar vnto that time of the yeare; or els enforced with the extremite of the weather, and with want, to aduention into the open sea and with their weake forces to joyne battell. What should therefore let, why they should not for ten or for fiftene daies continue the siege, as best befecmed the honour of themselves, the valour of their fouldiors, and worthinesse of the Christian name? What a terrour it would be vnto the enemie, to see the Christians readie to endure all extremities and wants to gaine the victorie ouer the Turks? Again, what dishonour and discredit would it be vnto themselves, if they should suffer the enemie (shut vp and not daring to fight) to escape: especially, when as they might sitting still, end the warre? The Senat of VENICE he said most rested vpon the valour and courage of Don John, and therefore he requested him not to deceiue the great hope they had of him conceiued: For how much should he himselfe blemish his owne honour, if when he had before relieved the afflicted state of the commonweale, he should now, when it was most of all to be holpen, forsake the same? Which should not be much vnlike, as if a man should with great labour purchase great store of pretious pearles, and vpon an humourous passion cast them all into the sea: That men generally held a great opinion of him the Generall, an honourable remembrance of his victorie, and regard of his valour; all which, how much the more pregnant and honourable should they be, by the second vanquishing and subduing the most mightie monarch of the world: And that if the action well begun should be effectually prosecuted by the goodnesse of God, the direction of the commanders, and the resolution of the fouldiors, in short time the Christians should carrie the victorie from the Turkes, and make him their Generall equall not onely with the great cheefetaines of the present time, but euen with the most famous commanders of all former ages. Whereunto Don John replied, That the action then in hand no lesse concerned the Spaniards than the Venetians: and that he had in his life desired nothing more, than to stand the Christian commonweale in stead: That he pointed at the same marke with Fuscarinus, and in zeale to doe good vnto the Christian commonweale, gaue place to no man; but indeed to performe it, was a thing much more difficult than to say it: Lesser things he said were to be ouerpast, to reserve themselves for the performance of greater: and therefore marvelled that Fuscarinus alone could not see things most manifest before his eyes, who otherwise could with his piercing wit see through the deepest matters: Could he thinke by any other means to abate the power of the Turke, than if they kept their fleet whole? That it was euer the manner of the greatest and most worthie commanders, rather to shun the present dangers, than to encrease their territories: That nothing was so well purposed, which might not be of some wrongfully suspected: but his faithfull meaning to be pure and without spot; and albeit that the oportunitie fetted not for him to shew it, yet was his desire and endeuour nothing the lesse: And that Fusca- rinus should doe well more intently to consider, what the cause, the matter, and the time required: That the manner of warre at land and at sea, were much different: And that although warres of both sorts were to giue place vnto the most vnseasonable time of the yeare, vnfit for any kind of warre; yet might men at land, better endure the winter stormes in their tents and cabins than at sea in their gallies, where oftentimes, will, skill, wisdom, nor valour helpe not: but that (except it be so prouided and foreseene, that the seasonable time of the yeare, and commodious for sayling may be taken) all must together perishe by shipwracke. What, would hee haue them to strue about their power with the winter stormes, and famine, the greatest extremities of nature? Besides that, he was verily perswaded, that the Turks enjoying the commodities of a good harbour, and of a rich citie, would there in safetie winter; the countrey of PAPHOS, NABVS relucient them with all necessaries: When as the Christians in the meane time, except they in time returned home, should lie exposed to the rage of the sea, standing as it were in a continuall watch, not laying away their weapons in the depth of winter and dead time of the yeare, which in reason ought to giue rest to all men. And that therefore euerie man ought for the present to beare his owne grieuances, and not by the harmes of his friends and confederats, to seeke his owne auail. And that he, bearing himselfe vpon the inward integritie of his good will towards the Venetians, would this say, howsoeuer Fuscarinus should vnderstand it, That if the kings fleet should by long staying there perishe, it would no lesse concerne the Venetians than the king himselfe: and taking God to witnesse, would solemnly promise, Nothing to be vnto him more leiser or religious, than to be prest so soone as the time of the yeare would giue leaue; and by his endeouour to make all men to know, that he had no lesse care of the Venetian State than of the kings affaires; neither desired any thing mote, than to be accounted; and in deed to be, a most constant vpholder of that most Christian league; and that beyond all expectation, euen in the iudgement of the Venetians themselves: but for the present they must pardon him, if he gaue place vnto the necessitie of the time. As for the offer of the communicating of their victuals, that would not be any helpe, but the destruction of both the fleets; for so they should both sooner feeble the want: wherefore it were much better to preserve the fleet which they might see in the next yeares warres, than wilfully to cast away the same by famine, and the rage of the sea. In brieffe, what an indignitie should the Christians sustaine, if they themselves should by the same meanes be ouerthrowne, whereby they had thought to haue ouerthrowne others.

about to returne without the knowledge of the Venetians.

Now the Spaniards were so resolutely set downe for their departure, that not only without the consent of the Venetians, but euen without their priuie, their departing was resolved vpon, and secret commandement giuen vnto the masters of the gallies, with all the hast that might be, to depart thence to MESSANA. Which the Venetian Admirall vnderstanding, and therewith troubled as with an vnexpected matter, came aboard the Generall, and greatly complained of his purpose, for so sudden a departure: requesting him a while to stay, vntill the two gallies made fast together in the harbour of NAVARINVM (as is before said) with the ordinance vpon them, might be put in good safetie; and neither they, or any thing else left for a prey vnto the enemy. With much adoe, Fuscarinus perswaded him to stay that night, that those gallies might be brought out of the harbour, and all things put in order for their departure. The rest of the night was spent in debating of the matter too and fro: where Don Iohn would needs haue it conceived into a publicke instrument in writing, That the fleet by the generall consent of the three Admirals, returned for lacke of victuals: whereunto the Venetian Admirall hardly consented. But when the instrument should haue been made and confirmed, Don Iohn better aduised by one of his secretaries, That the same would redound vnto the great dishonour both of the king and himselfe, that the fleet coming out of the fruitfull countrey of SICILIA, should in a moneths space want victuals; changed his mind for the writing, and onely requested the Venetian Admirall to credit him and Columnius, in that they had said concerning the want of victuals: promising him, that if vpon the way he should meet with the victuals that were sent for, he would forthwith returne and giue him aid, as the time and occurrents should require: but in the meane time to proceed by common consent, to doe that which was most needfull. Hereupon they returned: and M coming to CORCYRA, they met the expected ship laded with victuals. Now is not Fuscarinus vnmindfull of his dutie, but coming to Don Iohn, put him in remembrance of his promise; telling him, That it was not vnlike, but that the enemy so soone as he vnderstood of their departure, would come out of the bay, and returne with his fleet towards CONSTANTINOPLE; and being

A being but weakly manned, and worse furnished of mariners, might easily be ouertaken vpon the way, and ouerthrowne. But Don Iohn was not by any meanes to be thereunto perswaded, pretending, that he was by the king commaunded forthwith to returne. So the expectation of great matters to haue been this yeare done, came to nought but vanished into smoke: and nothing performed worth so long a discourse, more than to see with what difficultie great actions are managed, wherein the hands of many great ones are required; who jealous of their owne honour, or enuying at others, corrupt with delaies the fairest opportunities, and by their crosse dealing, no lesse than the enemy, hinder the common good whereat they would all fairest seeme to aime. From CORCYRA Don Iohn departed to MESSANA, and Columnius vnto ROME. Fuscarinus with greater honour than successe, returned to VANICIA; where he was with great joy receiued, both of the Senat and the citizens in generall: and so (no lesse famous for his patience and moderation towards the other confederats, than for his pollicie and valour) with the good liking of all men gaue vp his charge, in few yeares after to receiue a greater.

About this time, Amida king of TVNES (of whom much is before spoken in the life of Solyman) being but a little before driuen out of his kingdome by the Turks (who had of long by little and little encroached vpon him) and as a priuat man liued in exile with his two sonnes at GVLETTA with Franciscus Touares Gouverneur thereof: hearing of the great ouerthrow of the Turks at LEPANTO, and of the good successe of the Christians, sent embassadours to Don Iohn Generall of the confederat princes then lying in SICILIA, humbly requesting his aid for the recouerie of his kingdome, promising to defray the whole charges of the warre, and for euer to hold his kingdome of the king of SPAIN, as his vassalle and tributarie. Which his request well considered of, and the matter thought of no small consequence, for the safetie of the Christian countries lying ouer against that part of AFRICA, to haue so dangerous an enemy removed: Don Iohn the yeare following (in the beginning of October) by the commaundement of the king of SPAIN his brother, departing from DREPANVM in SICILIA with an hundred and five gallies and fortie ships, arriued the next day about noone at GVLETTA, where the gallies of MALTA came vnto him; and shortly after, Io. Andreas Auria the Admirall with nineteene mo; and Columnius the Popes Admirall with fourteene mo, all well appointed. At his arriuall at GVLETTA, he vnderstood by Amida and the Gouverneur, the whole estate both of the citie, and of the kingdome of TVNES: and that the Turks and Moores, terrified with so great a fleet, were about to forsake the citie. Wherefore hauing well viewed the place, he the next day after landed his forces about foure miles from the citie, and sent 2500 footmen before the rest of the armie to the citie; who found it all desolat, the Turks and Moores being before for feare fled, some to CARAVANA, some to BISERTA: who entring without resistance, came to the castle, wherein they found two hundred Moores, who said, they kept it for Amida their king; but yet would by no meanes suffer the Christians to enter. All which was forthwith made knowne to Don Iohn, who then because it was almost night would not moue, but early the next morning set forward with his whole armie: and entring the citie before abandoned by the inhabitants, and so coming to the castle, found nothing therein, but great store of oyle, butter, and wooll.

E Amida the late king, by the commaundement of Don Iohn, all this while staid at GVLETTA. But whilest Don Iohn was yet at TVNES, newes was brought vnto him the thirteenth of October, That the Turks garrison before fled out of TVNES, with diuers Moores, coming to BISERTA, were there kept out by the citizens and not suffered to enter: For which cause they began to burne and spoile the countrey thereabout. Whereupon the Generall sent Touares the capitaine of GVLETTA thither with part of the armie; who encountering with those Turks, ouertrew them, and had the citie by the citizens peaceably deliuered vnto him.

The kingdome of TVNES thus easily once againe recouered from the Turks, Don Iohn thoroughly enforced of the faithlesse and cruell dealing of Amida the late king, and that in detestation of the Christians and their religion, he had already had intelligence with the Turks; and F procured the death of some of the Christians: gaue this definitiue sentence vpon him, being yet in the castle of GVLETTA: That for as much as he had of long time been the authour of great discord, and endlesse troubles in that kingdome, and had most vnnaturally depriued Muleasses his father, first of his kingdome, and afterward of his sight; and in like manner tyrannized ouer his naturall brethren, the rightfull heires of that kingdome, whereby the Turks had taken occasion

sion both to invade and possesse the same: he should therefore by the commaundement of the king of SPAIN, be carried prisoner with his two sonnes into SICILIA, there to remaine for euer. Which heauie doome hee taking most grieuouly, and yet crying out for mercie, was forthwith thrust into a gallie, and with his wife and children transported into SICILIA, there to liue in perpetuall exile: the just reward of his mercilesse and vnaturall dealing with his father and brethren, God no doubt requiting him with the like measure he had before measured vnto them.

Mahomet, Amida his elder brother, made king of Tunis, and vassal to the king of Spaine.

After that (the king of SPAIN so commaunding) Mahomet, Amida his elder brother, and right heire of that kingdome, was appointed king in his place: who departing from GVLTTA to TUNES, was receiued asking, and there by solemne oath promised for euer to be the king of SPAIN his vassalle, and to doe whatsoever he should commaund.

There was before departed out of TUNES fortie thousand Moores, who now came and offered their supplication to Don Iohn, that they might againe returne and liue with their new king: which their request being easily granted, they in great numbers euerie day returned into the citie. Shortly after, fiftene hundred Turks, with three thousand of those wild people which some call Arabians, some Alarbes, sore troubled all the passages about the citie: who were at last by the Christians ouerthrowne, and an hundred and fiftie Christians whom they had taken prisoners, rescued. After that, Don Iohn by the aduise of his most expert and skilfull captaines, commaunded a strong castle to be built in the middle way betwixt GVLTTA and TUNES: and for the performing thereof, left Gabriel Serbellio with two thousand Italians, and Salaçar a Spaniard with other two thousand at GVLTTA. And so hauing performed that he came for, and disposed of all things as he thought best, returned againe into SICILIA.

A griefe of griefes it is, and sorrow almost vnconsolable, when worthie actions most happily begun, fort not to such happie end as was in reason hoped for. The greatest and the most famous victorie of all ages gained against the Turke, seemed to haue lightened the Christian common-weale: and great hope there was, that the Christians falling into vniue among themselves, would by an happy exchange make the Turkish empire the seat of their warres; and to turne into the Turkes dominions, the terrour, slaughter, and other calamities of warre, which had so many years afflicted the Christian common-weale. But by how much the more the joy was amidst such daily calamities and teares; so much greater was the sorrow, so great an hope to be comē to nought, and men to be so blinded with the darknesse of enuie and disdain, that they could not so much as thinke with what dishonour and danger of the common state, they should shrink from so iust, so honourable, and so needfull a seruice, including in it selfe the generall good of all Christendome. When posteritie shall consider what things might then haue bene done, and the deuises whereby the common cause was ouerthrowne; it will worthily blame, and greatly lament so notable a victorie and fit opportunitie, sent as it were from heauen, for the effecting of great matters, to haue been let slip and passed over so lightly regarded. This made, that they who before had reposed all their hope in armes, had now no other confidence or hope of their welfare, but in concluding of peace. Truly the Venetians both spoke and thought honourably of king Phillip; as of a most faithfull, iust, deuout, and honourable prince: yet greatly blaming his officers, and others of great authoritie about him, as men more regarding their owne priuat, than the good of the Christian common-weale. In these perplexities of the Venetians, king Phillip promised them to set forth a greater and stronger fleet against the next yere, and to be sooner in readinesse with all his forces and warlike prouision, and so to help them in all he might: who for all that, gaue small credit vnto those promises, and so to help them in all he might: times before deceiued. And therefore as trusting most vnto their owne strength, they with all carefullnesse and expedition entertained mo souldiours; of whom, some they put into their fleet, the rest they placed in their garrisons, in CRETE, in DALMATIA, and their frontier townes in EPIRVS. Neither were the Turkes then idle, as the report went; yet were they thought to manage that warre with greater fame than strength: for they had of purpose giuen it out, That they would the next Spring with diuers armies, invade the Venetian territories in CRETE, in DALMATIA, in EPIRVS, yea and in ITALIE it selfe; and with their innumerable multitude both of horse and foot, so ouerwhelme the Venetians, that they should not be able possibly to hold out. This & more too they brauely vaunted of: but in deed Fluzales comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, had brought his fleet so shaken and so weake, as that it seemed not possible, but in long time to be againe repaired, and furnished with souldiours and mariners, in stead of them that had been lost, some in fight, but moe by the contagioufnesse of the infection. But howsoeuer the matter stood, the Venetians carefull with the expectation of great matters, and in small hope of good successe; comparing their owne strength with the strength of the enemy: yet were they no lesse discouraged with the delays and grosse dealing of the confederats, than with all the prouision of the enemy. It sticke in their minds, how that the Spaniards at such time as CYPRVS might haue bene defended, delayed their comming so long, that NICOSSIA being lost, it was time to returne: Neither could they forget that lingering delay to haue bene the cause of the great mortalitie amongst their men; lying in the fleet at TADERA: They remembered also, that the commodities; which of so notable victorie were most plentifully to haue bene reaped; were by the slender prosecuting of the same, so sparingly taken, that the former dangers still remained: And that Don Iohn, who ought by appointment to haue bene at CONSTANTINOPLE in the beginning of Summer, was scarcely come thither in the latter end of August: and that he in the third yere of this warre; at such time as their fleet was with great labour and charge againe repaired, would not or listed not to aduenture to haue againe ouerthrowne the enemies fleet; but in the very action to haue alwayes trifled away the greatest part of Summer, before his Spaniards could set forward: and when hee might safely haue come to CRETE, to haue called backe Tuscarinus and the rest, then facing of the enemy, and euen readie to haue giuen him battell: It was then secretly suspected, the Spaniards to haue stayed of purpose, and to haue dalked on the time, that the Venetians hauing spent their forces might be the more exposed and subject to their injuries: It sticke fast not in their minds onely, but euen almost in their eyes, what things had happened of former times in their confederations with that nation: They were grieved in the space of three yeres an hundred times, twentie hundred thousand ducats to haue bene to little or small purpose spent in that warre: Besides that, they doubted least the Flemings with their confederates should so entangle the king of SPAIN in defending of his owne territories; as that he should not be at leisure to send any aid into the East: in which case, what hope or helpe were they to looke for? How should they then defend the rest of their Seigniorie in the East? How should their emptie cofers suffice to maintaine so great armies both by sea and land, as might withstand so puissant an enemy? Long were the discourses, and effectuall the persuasions, that the Venetians had amongst themselves, to induce one another, and all in general more circumspectly to consider, not onely what had alreadye passed, or was presently in hand; but also right warily to foresee, what would be the course and what the euent of a matter so important: and betime to breake off the confederation, which they had alwayes found to haue stood them in small stead. In reuoluing of these things, onely one remedie seemed most effectuall for the curing of their afflicted state: which was, By desisting from warre, to conclude a peace with the Turke, howsoeuer: which they were the rather in good hope to obtaine, for that diuers speeches concerning the same had passed at CONSTANTINOPLE, and were from thence againe reported at VENICE. All men thus enclining to peace, the Senat referred the proceeding therein vnto M. Antonius Barbarus their embassadour (who all the time of these wars had liued in safe custodie at CONSTANTINOPLE) willing him therein to vse the helpe of the French embassadour, who had alwayes bene a persuader of peace.

Selymus hauing got the island of CYPRVS and diuers other places from the Venetians, and yet well wearied with the harmes and losses he had himselfe receiued both by sea and land; was also desirous ynough of peace. So that the French embassadour might, as it was thought, haue got a reasonable and indifferent peace, if he had but expected the opportunitee of time: But he, (whether mooued with the common harmes, or some other secret causes to him best knowne) in making too much hast, and seeming too desirous of peace, much hurt the common cause of the Venetians, which he most desired to haue furthered. Selymus hauing found him, resolued with Mahomet the great Bassa, what he would haue done: who at such time as the same embassadour came vnto him about the matter, told him, That he had himselfe many times mooued, yea and so farre forth as he might importuned his great lord and master for peace, but could neuer find him willing to heare thereof, vntill that now at length ouercome and wearied with the continuall sollicitation of such as might doe most with him, he had yielded thereunto. So the thing that Selymus himselfe vndoubtedly desired, that the craftie Bassa seemed him with much difficultie to graunt, rather vpon the instance and contemplation of them that laboured for the same, than for any desire he had thereunto of himselfe. For certaine dayes at the first the French embassadour G was most courteously heard, and the Bassa with faire and cunning speech promised that the mat- ter of pacification should easily and in short time be composed: and so at their first conferences things passed rather in generall tearmes, than that any conditions of peace were particularly agreed vpon: onely this was on both parties consented vnto, That the Venetians should send their embassadour of purpose; for the full concluding and confirming of the desired peace. VVhich charge was by the Senat committed to Iacohus Superantius; in whose wildome and va- lour they had reposed great hope and confidence. He was no sooner come to CONSTANTINOPLE, and the Turks deliuered of the feare of the Christian sword by the dissolution of the confederation, but that all things were changed; and the Venetians glad perforce to endure the proud lookes of the Turkes, their disdainfull cares, their despihtfull speeches, their long and insolent attendance, with many other shamefull indignities: Yea the Bassa was, so shamelesse, as proudly to aske them, How they durst be so bold, as to impugne the great emperor Selymus his fleet at sea: VVhereunto the embassadour answered, That the Venetians had alwayes honoured the maiestie of the Turkish emperours, neither had at any time taken vp armes against them, but in their owne reasonable defence, when force was by force to be repulled; a thing lawfull, euen for the wild beasts in the wide wilderness to doe. At the first entreatie of the peace, the Bassa com- mended to put the Venetian embassadour in good hope, that the Venetians according to his request should enjoy their territories in DALMATIA in as ample manner as in former times, and bound- ed with the same bounds, whereof they had in these warres lost some part about IAPHRA. But when the matter should haue come to the shutting vp, the Turke began to shrink from that he had before promised, refusing not onely the restitution of the territorie they had indeed by rea- son got; but by cautelous expositions of his meaning, framing the conclusion of the present peace vnto the forme of their former leagues, required, That as the Turks had then yielded vnto them MALVASIA and NAVPLIUS, so now they should redeliuer vnto them other two places of like worth and importance: As for not restoring the territorie they had taken about IADERA, to col- our their deceit, they pretended, That they might not by their law restore vnto the Christians any towne or place, wherein were any church or temple dedicated or conuerted vnto the Maho- metane religion, as was there; and further, That the same territorie was alreadye giuen by Selymus in reward to his souldiours, men of desert, from whom without great iniurie it might not be againe taken. Hereupon the French embassadour complained, That promises were not per- formed: & the Venetians so fitted, that they were euen about to haue returned, as men shamefully deluded, without concluding of any thing. Yet when no better could be obtained, the Turke still standing vpon so hard tearmes, the embassadours by the appointment of the Senat concluded a peace with the Turke, whereof these were the cheefe capitulations: first, That the Venetians should giue vnto Selymus three hundred thousand ducats; one hundred to be presently payed, and the other two hundred by equall portions in two years next following: then, That the mar- chants goods should be indifferently on both sides restored: and lastly, That such places of the Venetians as the Turke was alreadye possessed of, should still remaine vnto the Turkes; but that such townes or places as the Venetians had taken in the Turkes dominion, should be againe forthwith restored. For the first payment of the money, the Turke was earnest, thereby as by a fine for an offence committed, to make this league vnto him more honourable.

Venetians.

The peace pro-
nice.

This peace at CONSTANTINOPLE concluded the eleuenth day of Februarie, in the year 1574, was by the decree of the Senat confirmed: and afterwards the thirteenth of Aprill follow- ing solemnely proclaimed in VENICE, to the great wonder of the other confederates. For the better satisfying of whom, the Popes Nuntio, with the embassadour of SPAIN, were sent for into the Senat house. And although there were many things that grieved the Venetians, yet did they forebore all hard speeches, and of that their moderation receiued so much the more honour, as it is more difficult for an angrie man to overcome himselfe, than others. The duke with calme and temperate speech, framed to the purpose, declared vnto them, That anger and hope, two euill counsellors, being set apart, he had concluded a peace with the Turke: not for that he was desirous of the Turkes friendship, which what account it was to be made of, he right well knew; but for the loue he bare to the State, which was not only with losse, but euen with death it selfe, to be maintained. How he had bene spoyled of the kingdome of CYPRUS, he further declared: and that the Venetian state grew euery day weaker and weaker by the continuall war: and

A and that therefore, before it were by losse vpon losse come to the vttermost of extremitie, they not able to maintaine so heauie a warre, were to take some better course for the preferuation of that which was yet alreadye left of their Seigniorie: for that the safetie of the Venetian state should at all times be a sure forresse and defence for the Christian commonweale against all the furious attempts of the enemye, and vncertaine euent of time.

The same of this sudden and vncertaine peace was for the iust and common hatred of the Christians against the Turkes, generally euill taken: and the Venetians for the concluding there- of hardly spoken of, as if they had betrayed the whole Christian commonweale, or at leastwise their confederats. For men were for the most part of opinion, That the Turkes peace would be but fained and deceitfull; and that hauing gained time to set things in order, according to his de- sire, he would for the naturall grudge he bare vnto the Christians, come to his old course, and as he had alwayes done, breake the league, and take vp armes. Some said, That the Venetians, for- faken of their friends and confederats, would in their owne deuices perish; yet so, as that their de- struction should turne to the generall harme of all Christendome: and these men were of opi- nion, That in that case, and against that enemye, a dangerous warre was to be preferred before an vncertaine and dishonourable peace. Neuerthelesse the Venetians, besides that they for the pre- sent eased themselves of many an heauie burthen, so haue they thereby enjoyed the fruits of a long and happie peace, and found the same vnto their state both wholesome and profitable euen vntill this day. It was thought by the sequell of matters, that Selymus was the more willing to haue peace with the Venetians, that he might the better recouer the kingdome of TVNES, C and the strong castle of GYZZETA from the Spaniards: who with the knights of MALTA now gaped more after TRIPOLIS and the other port townes holden by the Turkes vpon the coast of BARBARIE, than how to defend the Venetians their confederates. Thus with the losse of CYPRUS, and some part of the Venetian territorie in DALMATIA, ended the mortal- lall and bloudie warre betwixt Selymus and the Venetians. In the course whereof is well to be seene, what great matters the united forces of the Christian princes were able to doe against this most mightie enemye, if all discord and contention set apart, they would in the quar- rel of the Christian religion joyne with heart and hand against him, and fight the battell of Christ Iesus.

The peace by ex-
profitable vnto
the Venetians.

Selymus now at peace with them who before most troubled him: to keepe his men of warre D busied, shortly after conuerted his forces against Iohn, Vayuod of VALACHIA, and so at length joyined all that prouince to his empire. This countrey of VALACHIA was in auncient time called DACIA: it hath on the East the Euxine (now called the Blacke Sea) on the South the fa- mous riuer Danubius, on the West TRANSYLVANIA, and on the North RVSSIA. It is di- uided into two parts, the one called TRANSALPINA, and the other MOLDAVIA (of the riuer Moldauus running through the midst thereof) but farre passing the other both in greatnesse and abundance of pasture. That part called TRANSALPINA, Mahomet (sumamed the Great, which woon CONSTANTINOPLE) made subject to the Turkish empire; but vpon MOLDA- VIA, the other part, he only imposed a yearly tribute of two thousand ducats. After which time the Vayuods of that countrey, aided sometime by the Hungarians, and sometime by the Poloni- E aus, rise vp oftentimes against the Turkes, and refused to do their homage. It chanced, that Bogda- nus, Vayuod of that countrey, fauouring the Polonians, and joyning in league with them, liued much in RVSSIA, as purposing from thence also to haue taken his wife. VVhich Selymus suspec- ting, with a great power chased him into exile, and placed in his stead one Iohn (called of his countrymen Iwan, and of some Ionian) the supposed son of Stephanus, sometime Vayuod of that country: who with Teremias Czarnieueczius (a Moldavian, who afterward notably betrayed him) hauing of long time liued amongst the Turkes, to be the more gracious amongst them, renoun- ced his faith, and being circumcised, turned Turke: and following the trade of merchandise, be- came among them a marchant of such fame, that he became very familiar & well acquainted with the great Bassas of the Court, and at length with Selymus himselfe. Hee vnderstanding by his friends neere about the Turkish emperor of his purpose for the remouing of Bogdanus, corrupted with rewards the great Bassas, to be mediators for him to Selymus, that commended by them, he might be preferred to be Vayuod of MOLDAVIA; still encreasing the suspicion Selymus had conceiued of Bogdanus, and telling him, That he supported by the Polonians, was like ynough in short time to reject his obedience to his imperiall maiestie. Selymus at the instance of the Bassas nominated this John to bee Vayuod : who with a great power of the Turkes horsemen entred into MOLDAVIA, easily possessed himselfe of the countrey, Bogdanus being then absent in Rvs. sia, and as then suspecting no such matter : who yet afterwards attempted in vaine by the helpe of the Polonians to haue againe recovered his countrey, but finding no possibillitie so to doe, fled afterwards into MVSCOVIA, where he long time after liued.

John now quietly possessed of MOLDAVIA, for some few years held the same with the good liking of the Turke, paying him his wonted tribute : but afterwards repenting himselfe of his wicked reuolt from the Christian faith, and now estoones againe embracing the same, and (ignorant of his owne fortune) persecuting with too much seueritie those which withstood his coming into the countrey, especially such great men as tooke part with Bogdanus ; and now after his returne vnto the Christian faith, not fauouring the Turkes as he was wont, but crossing them in many matters, became suspicious both vnto Selymus and the Bassas his old friends. Which the Vayuod of the lesser VALACHIA (commonly called VALACHIA TRANSALPINA) vnderstanding, he became a suter vnto the great Bassas of the Court for his brother Peter, and earnestly trauelled with them, That as John supported by Selymus, had driuen Bogdanus out of MOLDAVIA, so Peter his brother might in like manner by his helpe driue John out also. In which his sute he spared for no cost, neither ceased by malicious suggestions to encrease the suspicion already conceived of John the Vayuod : who hauing rejected the Mahometane religion, and againe embraced the Christian faith, would (as he said) in short time, as had Bogdanus, joyne hands with the Polonians, and cast off his obedience towards the great Sultan, by whom he had bene so highly promoted. Beside that, this malicious man offered, That his brother Peter for such his preferment should pay yearely vnto Selymus twice so much more as did John, namely an hundred and twentie thousand duckats by the name of a tribute.

The Bassas before corrupted and moued with the greatnesse of the tribute, perswaded Selymus, by an embassadour to send for John the Vayuod, to come vnto him himselfe in person, and to commaund him to giue place to such a man as he should send thither in his stead : which if he should refuse to doe, then to denounce vnto him open warre. Hereunto Selymus, who had euen then much emptied his coffers with the losse of his fleet in the battell of LEPANTO, & the chargeable warres against the Venetians, was easily induced : and to that purpose sent his embassadour to the Vayuod : who hauing audience the one and twentieth of Februarie, at the same time that Henry Valois, afterward the French king was crowned at CRACOVIA, deliuered his message as followeth :

The commanding speech of the Turks em-bassadour to John
the Vayuod.

Selymus the great emperor of the Turkes sendeth me vnto thee John, Vayuod of VALACHIA his tributarie, with this commaund (whereunto his pleasure is, that thou shouldst without delay send him answer :) first hee chargeth thee to send him not such a tribute as hee was wont, but twice so much more, to wit, an hundred and twentie thousand duckats. If thou shalt refuse so to doe, there is another readie to giue it, both for himselfe and his posteritie. But Selymus mindfull of thy constancie, fidelitie, and valour, will not be troublesome to thee in thy gouernment, if thou forthwith send the aforesaid tribute. Which if thou shalt refuse to doe, then his will is, that thou shouldst giue place to another, and thy selfe returne with me to CONSTANTINOPLE, there to answer the matter : otherwise I am in his name to denounce all hostilitie, and the calamities of warre both vnto thee and thy countrey.

This proud message of the embassadour stricke further into the mind of the Vayuod than any would haue thought : yet dissembling his griefe, he commaunded him to be brought to the lodging appointed for him, telling him, That in a matter of so great importance, and so much concerning the whole state of his countrey, he could not giue him so present answer as he required ; but that vpon mature deliberation had with his nobilitie and counsell, he would in short time answer him accordingly. The embassadour being gone to his lodging, the Vayuod forthwith began deeply to consider of Selymus his demands ; and that in the Turkes faith was no assurance, which he kept or brake with the Christian princes, as best fitted his owne turne : and besides that, that if he should graunt to pay that so great and heauie a tribute, in so great povertie of his kingdom, sore waisted with ciuile warre, Selymus would not be therewith long contented, so long as any man would giue him more, but happily would the next yeare exact a greater, and in the end and such an one as he with all his subjects should not be able to pay ; which it should not be safe for him at any time to refuse, so long as any man would giue it. VV herefore calling together the nobilitie and states of his countrey, he brake with them in this sort.

If euer you were to consult and deliberat of a most important and difficult matter, this verily is The speech of the that time : for Selymus the Turkish emperor, enflamed with insatiable auarice, and I know not by whose persuasion, not contented with his wonted tribute, exacteth of vs twice so much more. If you shall grant it, it shall not much concerne me, as not to be paid by me your soueraigne, but by your selues and your posteritie : if we denie it, forthwith he denounceth vnto vs fire and sword, with all the calamities of warre. And in this barenesse of our kingdome, almost spoiled by ciuile warres, how shall we be able to pay it him ? wherefore declare your mindes. Verily I foresee, that if you shall in this yeeld vnto Selymus, and grant him so great a tribute, he will not therewith long hold himselfe contented, but euerie yeare extort a greater, untill he haue altogether eaten vs vp. Wherefore it were better for vs (in mine opinion) to lose our liues together with our wiues and children, than to suffer so great an indignitie : neither is it mine owne estate that troubleth me, for why it is you that are to pay it, and not I. Wherefore if you list not to endure this so dishonourable and base a seruitude, let me forthwith so vnderstand from you : and I will for my part so provide, as that I will not onely not pay vnto the barbarous tyrant the new and heauie tribute he demaundeth, but not so much as any tribute at all ; so that you be not wanting both to your selues and me. I know right well (beloued and fellowes in armes) what I owe both vnto you and the common-weale, for whose good and welfare I am alwaies readie to lay downe my life.

He had no sooner thus said, but that a secret sorrow and vnwonted silence, had as it were oppressed the whole assembly. At length, as men awaked out of an heauie and dead sleepe, they murmured among themselves, that the Turkish emperor should so without reason oppress them, with doubling and redoubling of his tribute : and were generally of opinion, That the Vayuod had not so plainly as truly spoken of the intollerablenesse thereof : and that therefore they had rather die, than to endure so great dishonour, joyned with so foule a slauerie. And thereupon offered vnto the Vayuod to setue vpon their owne charge, and with him vpon the banke of Danubius to meet the proud enemy, and there in defence of their liues and libertie, to fight it out vnto the last man. The Vayuod in few words commending their fidelitie, and taking of them an oath for the faithfull performance of that they had so resolutely promised, sent for the Turks embassadour, and gaue him this short answer.

I, for the auncient fidelitie and allegiance which I owe vnto my lord and dread soueraigne, the mightie emperor Selymus, would willingly yeeld vnto him the tribute he requireth, were it not that I know the minds of my people to abhorre the same : wishing rather to endure all calamities, hap what- soeuer hap may, than to yeeld vnto so dishonourable and shamefull slauerie. Wherefore since I cannot by any meanes extort the same from my subjects, tell my lord Selymus, That I most humbly request him, not to take the same in euill part ; whose amitie I wish to be vnto me, rather an ornament and refuge, than disgrace or hinderance. And that vpon that good hope I both asked, and for my singular fidelitie obtained of him the Vayuodship of MOLDAVIA : which my good hope I most heartily beseech him may not deceiue me.

With this answer he dismissed the embassadour vnrewarded, and with a safe conuoy brought him vnto the banke of Danubius : which his homely vsage of the embassadour, caused him not a little to be suspected, to be in mind changed from Selymus. The embassadour sent away, the Vayuod not ignorant of the sudden inuasions of the Turkes, forthwith began to raise his army : and at the same time, sent embassadours vnto Henrie king of POLONIA his nearest neighbour, certifying him of the dangerous state of MOLDAVIA, the surest bulwarke of the Polonian kingdom, which once ouerthrowne, opened a faire and easie way for the common enemy into POLONIA : and therefore requested him, that as the kings of POLONIA had of auncient time, euen for the safetie of their owne state, protected that countrey ; so it would please him now in like manner in so dangerous a time, to giue him aid ; or at leastwise to giue leaue vnto such of his subjects as were willing to setue for entertainment, to come vnto him, whom he would with all honour honour and bountie vs according to their place and qualitie. Whereunto the king answered, G that for as much as he and his predecessours the kings of POLONIA, had for the space of more than an hundred yeares beene in league with the Turkish kings and emperours, he could not ei- ther send him aid, or yet giue leaue vnto any of his subjects to serue against the Turke as he desired. With this answer the Vayuod was much troubled, as there deceived where he most ho- ped for reliefe: yet hearing of certaine companies of the Polonian Cossacks, which hauing long lien in hope of prey vpon the side of the great riuier Borysthenes, were returning emptie home, he by fit messengers sent of purpose, offered them great entertainment to serue him in his warres against the Turke; of which his offer, they (as men liuing for most part by seruice) gladly accep- ted; and so without the knowledge of the king went vnto him, to the number of twelue hun- dred, with their capitaines, men of great courage and valour, of whom Suiercenius was chiefe: H who were by the Vayuod honourably entertained, and did him in these wars right worthy ser- uice. These Cossacks are light horsemen, lying most commonly vpon the borders of the Polo- nian kingdome towards the Tartars: an hardie and valiant kind of men, whose best liuing, is the spoile they take from the enemy; and their best lands, their horse and launce. For albeit that the Turkes and Tartars are most commonly in league with the Polonians, and seeme neuer so defi- dous of peace; yet doe they oftentimes in great numbers, vpon the sudden breake into the coun- tries of PODOBIA and RYSSIA, part of the Polonian kingdome, and there doe great harme, if they be not in time repressed or cut off by the afore said light horsemen, who for that purpose lie alwaies in wait for them, as doth the hawke for the prey.

his forces against the Vayuod.

Selymus vnderstanding the answer of Iohn the Vayuod, was therewith exceedingly enra- I gged, and the more by the bitter complaint of the embassadour, who angrie with the Vayuod that he was of him no better regarded nor rewarded, spared not to the vttermost of his power, to incense the angrie emperour against him, as if his honor had been in the person of himselfe con- temned and violated. Wherefore without delay, he sent thirtie thousand Turkes, and two thou- sand Hungarians vnto the Palatine of VALACHIA TRANSALPINA, that joyning those forces to his owne, he might take Iohn the Vayuod, and sending him in bonds to CONSTANTINO- PLE, to place Peter his brother, Vayuod in his place. The Palatine glad of this commaund, and hauing raised his owne power, together with the Turkes and the Hungarians, swam ouer the riuier Moldauus, hauing in his armie about an hundred and two thousand fighting men: a power, not onely sufficient to haue driuen the Vayuod out of MOLDAVIA, but also to haue shaken a right K puissant king in his kingdome. The Palatine in the midst of so great a strength, little fearing, and lesse regarding the sudden coming of the Vayuod, suffered his men with their horses to lie disorderedly here and there, disperfed in the large medowes and pastures all alongst the faire ri- uers side; so the better to refresh themselves, wearie of their long trauell. In the meane time cer- taine scouts came to the Vayuod then at dinner, certifying him, that the enemy with an huge ar- mie, the certaine number wherof they could not well descie, was come ouer the riuier: and now resting themselves, had turned off their horses into the rich medowes thereabout, in such disor- dered and carelesse manner, as that they might with a small power be easily ouerthrowne. The Vayuod glad of this newes, forthwith sent before Suiercenius with his Cossacks, and fiew thou- sand other light horsemen, more certainly to descie what the enemy did, with the manner of his lying; and he himselfe with the rest of his armie, followed faire and softly after. Suiercenius with great silence approaching the enemies campe, suddenly light vpon the enemies scouts, in number about fiew hundred; who enclosed before they were aware, were taken euerie man by the Cos- sacks, and by them straightly examined of the state of their armie and campe. Who for safeguard of their liues now in their enemies power, frankly confessed, how that the Palatine lay securely there by, resting his armie, not so much for the refreshing thereof after his trauell, as with greater strength to set vpon the Vayuod with his fresh souldiours: and that in the armie were about seau- entie thousand Valachians, thirtie thousand Turkes, and three thousand Hungarians; who now disperfed, and sleeping in securitie, might easily be ouerthrowne. Of all these things Suiercenius aduertised the Vayuod, requesting him with all possible speed to hasten his coming, for the obtaining of a most notable and assured victorie: he in the meane time lying close with his men not farre from the enemy. The Vayuod certified of all these things, came without delay, and forthwith commaunded Suiercenius with his men to giue the onset vpon the enemy: purposing himselfe with the rest of his armie on the other side, to charge the disordered campe in three pla- ces.

The Palatine
with the Turke ouerthrowne by
the Vayuod.

A cc. Suiercenius according as he had in charge, with a great and terrible outcrie, suddenly set vp- on the secure enemies: who dismayed with the suddennesse of the vnexpected danger, stood as men astonied, not knowing which way to flie, or how to make resistance. But whiles Suierce- nius with his light horsemen thus on the one side filleth the campe with tumult, terrour, slaugh- ter, and feare; behold, euen as a sudden tempest commeth the Vayuod, bearing all the disordered campe downe before him: neither had the enemies any meanes to flie, hauing put their horses a great way off from them into the rich pastures; but there taken vnarmed, were miserably slain. In all the campe was lamentation and mourning, death raging in euerie place, with such furie, that of so great an armie as of late passed the riuier, few or none escaped, more than the Palatine, with Peter his brother, who, by great chance with much adoe getting horses, swam ouer the ri- uer, and so came to the castle of BRAILOVIA IN MACHIA. All the rest were slaine and left to be of the beasts of the field and birds of the aire deuoured. It was a most horrible spectacle to see the ground couered with the bodies of the dead, all stained with gore blood, and their wea- pons of all sorts lying by them. In the campe were found great riches, all which the Vayuod gaue vnto his souldiours, and there staid foure daies to refresh his wearied men. After that, he with his victorious armie entred into VALACHIA, the Palatines countrey, where he tooke ma- nie castles and townes, and put to the sword all that came in his way, men, women, and children, without respect of age or sex: and burnt all the countrey, townes and villages before him; he went; so that all that part of the countrey of VALACHIA TRANSALPINA, was couered with smoke and fire, to the terrour of the beholders. The aged fathers were in euerie place drawne forth to slaughter, the young babes were cut in pieces, the matrons and virgins defiled, and after- wards slaine; and in briebe, all the crueltie that could be deuised, performed: in the bloudie exe- cution wherof, the Vayuod commended his men, perswading them in like manner still to pro- secute the victorie, and that the rest of their labours was all but for prey and bootie, for the enri- ching of themselves. In this haucke of all things, it was told him, that the Palatine with his brother Peter, the men whom he most sought after, were in the castle of BRAILOVIA, not farre off; whereupon he forthwith marched thither with his armie. The citie of BRAILOVIA standeth vpon the riuier Danubius, and had in it a castle of some good strength, defended, both by the na- ture of the place, and a strong garrison of the Turkes which Selymus had appointed for the kee- ping thereof, as the key of the countrey: not farre from this citie the Vayuod encamping his D armie, writ vnto the capitaine of the castle, forthwith to deliuer vnto him the Palatine, with Peter his brother, his mortal enemies; who neuer wronged by him, had invaded his countrey, and sought after his life, and being ouerthrowne in battell, were fled vnto him: which if he should refuse to doe, he threatned neuer to depart thence, vntill he had to his farther harme, constrained him by force to yeeld them. These letters he sent by two Valachian captiues, to be deliuered vnto the capitaine of the castle: whereunto he returned answer by foure Turkes, two of the citie, and two of his owne seruants, by whom he also sent ten great shot, and as many small, with two Turkish arrowes, and this message.

For that I know thee to be the seruant of my dread soueraigne Selymus, I regard thee: and will E not denie the same men to be with me, whom thou so much requirest. But for as much as I vnder- stand, that thou of late hast slaine a great number of the seruants of the great emperour, who by his commaundment were bringing Peter the brother of the Palatine into MOLDAVIA: I therefore tell thee, that except thou betime raise thy siege, I will feed thee and thy followers, with such dishes as these; whereupon thou and thine armie gorged to the full, shall all afterwards dangerously surfeit and cast. Farewell.

The blint answer of the captaine to the Vayuod.

This rough answer so much moued the Vayuod, that he commaunded hands to be laid vpon the afore said foure messengers: and their noses, lips, and eares being cut off, both their feet to be with great nailles fast nailed vnto a long piece of timber, and so with their hands hanging downward, to be set vp before the citie, and so left for the capitaine and the citizens to gaze vpon. Signifying withall vnto the capitaine that sent them, that he himselfe with the other fugitiues his guests, should in like manner be serued, if they fell into his hands. Immediately after he assaulted the citie, and vsing the cheerfulness of his souldiours, by plaine force tooke the same, the desert- ants being not able to hold them out. There was made great slaughter of the Turkes, whereas no man was taken to mercie; the very babes were slain, together with their mothers, and blood ran like riuers into the Danubius. For the space of foure dayes this bloudie execution endured, no place serued for refuge; euen the most secer and obscure places were searched, and the poore creatures there found, drawne forth and slaine. The faue was so great, that no liuing thing; no nor so much as the very dogs, were spared. Much gold, siluer, plate, jewels, and other rich spoyle was there found, all which became a prey vnto the greedie souldiours: for that cite was of all others in those quarters the richest, as a place much frequented, and enjoying long peace, as after such time the Turkes were fully possessed of Græcia, not being troubled with any warres, untill now, that it was by the Vayuod first ranackt, and afterwards rased downe to the ground, and nothing thereof left standing, more than the bare castle it selfe, which the Vayuod durst not aduenture vpon, for that it was well fortified, and furnished with so strong a garrison, as their could nor without his great losse be taken.

The Turke again ouertrowne by
the Vayuod.

While the Vayuod was thus buied in the spoile of Brailova, newes was brought vnto him of the comming of fiftene thousand Turkes to the reliefe of the castle: against whom he forthwith sent Suiercenius with his Cossackes, and other eight thousand Moldavian horsemen; who suddenly comming vpon the Turkes, disordered and fearing no such matter, slew almost foureene thousand of them, and chased the rest vnto the castle of Tina. Of this victorie Suiercenius in all hast certified the Vayuod; and withall, that there was another great power of the Turkes comming, which might easily be also ouerthrowne, if he leauing the siege of the castle of Brailova, would without delay come and joyne his forces with his. He glad of that newes, and well perceiuing how difficult and dangerous that siege would be vnto him, ile forthwith with his armie, and went to Suiercenius: and afterwards vpon conference had with him, laid siege to Tina: which cite taken without much labour, he put to sword all the people found therein, not leauing one alieue; and by the seruice of Suiercenius ouerthrew the Turkes comming towards Brailova.

Selymus in doubt to haue bene shrount out of Valachia by the Vayuod.

Selymus in the meane time much troubled with the proceedings of the Vayuod; and doubting to be quite thruft out of Valachia Transalpinia (which he was like ynough to haue bene, had not the treason of Czarnieuc hindered the matter) prepared new forces for that seruice, and after the manner of the Turkes, in time of their greatest distresse appointed generall supplications and prayers to be made vnto his prophet Mahomet; for the better successe of his wars; the vndoubted signe of his feare.

The Vayuod after so many victories against the Turkes, purposing for a while to breake vp his great armie, called vnto him his old friend Ieremias Czarnieuc, vnto whom, as vnto the man he of all others most trusted, he had resolved to commit the charge, with part of his armie, to keepe the Turkes from passing againe ouer the riuier Danubius into his countrey: and in deliuering to him his charge, spake vnto him as followeth:

The kind speech of the Vayuod to Czarnieuc.

Sith fortune hath hitherto answered our desires (worthie Czarnieuc) with most rare and perpetuall successe against the Turkes, our most cruell enemies, we are thankfully to take the same, and to render most humble and heartie thanks vnto Almighty God, that it hath pleased him, the author of all victorie, so to haue prospered our endeours against these fierce and deuouring enemies. Now what remaineth for the present, but to disband mine armie, wearied with labour and trauell, and to giue my soldiours leaue to depart home to rest themselves, that so I may as occasion shall require againe use their fresh forces for our better seruice: you in the meane time with thirtene thousand of my select souldiours, shall lie vpon the side of Danubius, to keepe the Turkes from passing the riuier. Haue good regard I pray you vnto this your charge, which I vpon an especiall trust, grounded vpon your ancient loue and fidelitie, haue at this time imposed vpon you. And let me from time to time with all expedition vnderstand from you of every motion of the enemy, that so we may in due time provide for him accordingly.

And so in token of his greater fauour, taking his leaue of him with a kisse (as the manner of those people is) gaue leaue vnto the greatest part of his souldiours to depart home, yet with this charge, to be alwayes in readinesse whensoever they should be called vpon.

Czarnieuc hauing receiued his charge, and promising vnto the Vayuod the vntmost of his faithfull deuoir, went towards Danubius, and there most carefully kept the passages with continuall watch and ward. It was not long but that great numbers of the Turkes were come downe

A to the other side of the riuier, and moe were still comming, yet none of them was so hardie as to aduenture the great riuier; Czarnieuc with his horsemen lying in the faces of them, readie to receiue them on the other side. Which the Bassa whom Selymus had sent with his armie, perceiuing, sent certaine men pickt out for the purpose, to Czarnieuc, to sound him, if he might by any meanes be drawne to come ouer, in secret to talke with him: and the more to moue him, beside his conduct for his safetie, sent him by the same messengers thirtie thousand Hungarian duckats for a present. With which so faire a bait Czarnieuc allured, receiued the money, and faithfully promised to come. And so shortly after, secretly passing ouer the riuier, had conference with Peter the Palatines brother, who then lay on the further side of Danubius, with a great power of the Turkes. In this conference, Peter declared vnto him in how great danger the Vayuod stood; and how highly Selymus was offended with him, That he his tributarie and vassale should worke the destruction of his so great armies: which his heauie displeasure he could no otherwise satisfie but with his head: and that therefore he should no longer rule in Moldavia, for that government was by the great emperour giuen vnto him. Wherefore (said he) if thou be wise, whilst it is yet in thy power, gaine the good will of Selymus by some good desert: for an easie matter it is to begin any warre, but an hard matter to end the same. For as much as it is not alwayes in the same mans power to begin warres, and at his pleasure to make an end. Euerie foole may when he list enter into amies, but must lay the same downe when it pleaseth the conquerour. Now you haue a faire oportunitie, and it is in your owne power to procure his friendship for euer, better standing with your affaires than war. And albeit you may hope well of the power of the Vayuod, yet wisdom would not, that you should preferre vncertainties before things certain: you haue now receiued thirtie thousand duckats, the earnest of your further deserts; which shall hereafter haue also their due rewards in most full and bountifull measure. Wherefore if you will doe your selfe good, and prouide both for your safetie and preferment, confound not your owne good fortune, with the broken and desperat state of the Vayuod, but suffer the Turkes to passe as friends ouer the riuier of Danubius. For I am come (said he) with a great and puissant armie from the mightie Selymus, to take vpon me the gouernment of Moldavia, and to send the Vayuod in bonds to Constantinople: and of me, being once Vayuod, what is it that for so great desert thou and thine may not aske and obtaine? Wherefore I pray thee conceale the comming of the Turkes, and withdraw thy selfe from the riuier: so shall we, passing ouer the riuier with our populous armie, easily oppresse the Vayuod with all his power, and at once reuenge all the former injuries and disgraces done both vnto Selymus and vs.

hath secret conference with Peter the Palatine's brother, who cunningly persuadeth him to giue the Turke passage.

With greedie men what will not the foule desire of gold worke? Czarnieuc overcome with the golden promises of Peter, and forgetfull of his faith before giuen vnto the Vayuod, yeelded vnto all he requested: and drawing his forces further off from the riuier, as if it had been for his more safetie, gaue the Turkes free passage. There was then in the Turkes armie two hundred thousand men, well appointed, and furnished with great ordinance and all other things necessarie both for the field and for siege, who by the sufferance of the false traitour passed quietly ouer the riuier. Czarnieuc forthwith posting to the Vayuod, certified him, how that the Turkes trusting to their multitude, had passed the riuier of Danubius, against whom he was not able (as he said) to make head: and that therefore he should doe well, without delay to goe against them with such forces as he had then in readinesse; which joynd vnto his, might easily ouerthrow them. Glad was the Vayuod of this newes, and filled with the hope of good successe, demanded of him what strength the enemy might be of? They are (said he) not much about twelue thousand that be already come ouer, but are still comming more and more, and will before your comming thither be about fiftene thousand.

corrupted giueth the Turkes leaue quietly to passe
Danubius.

The Vayuod lay then at the siege of the castle of Tina (hauing before taken the cite) but hearing this newes, raised his siege, and so in foure dayes came and encamped within three miles of the enemy: and forthwith sent forth Suiercenius with his Cossackes, and Ieremias Generall of the horsemen, with six thousand horse to take view of the enemies campe, and to vnderstand what might be of their designs. These two capitaines marching together, chanced to fall vpon the Turkes scouts, in number about six thousand horsemen, with whom they had a light skirmish, and in a short time put them to flight. Of these scouts they tooke one, and him grieuously wounded: who being examined of the strength of the enemy, and feeling himselfe wounded to death, told them dissemblingly, that the Turkes were not in number many. But the Cossackes doubting doubting of the truth of that report, and probably conjecturing by so great a number of scouts, G that the enemy was of farre greater strength than was supposed or reported; quickly certified the Vayuod thereof, wishing him in time to provide for the safetie of himselfe and his armie, and not too much to trust Czarnieuiche, whom they had a good while before suspected. But the Vayuod nothing doubting of the faith of him whom he had of long time found most faithfull in the time of his hardest distresse, and vsed as a most trustie companion in all his trauels; answered nothing, but that he knew whom he trusted; and that it was not now time to stand in doubt, or to be afraid; and that he would ere long come and take a view of the enemies campe himselfe: for that he was not come so farre to flie, but to fight in defence of his countrey and subjects, euen to the last gaspe. And so fortifying his campe neere vnto a lake that runneth out of Danubius (for the more conuenient watering of his armie) he set forward with all his power against H the enemy.

Neere vnto the enemies campe was an high hill, from whence the Vayuod had thought to haue descied the number of them, with the manner of their lying: but comming thither, he could descie nothing but foure companies of scouts as farre off, one companie from another; who also vpon the sight of the Moldauians withdrew themselves of purpose out of sight vnto the armie, which then lay in a low valley behind an hill, not to be discouered vntill a man were almost vpon it. The Vayuod suspecting the enemy to be at hand, deuicd his horsemen, in number thirtie thousand, into thirtie companies, and placing before euery companie certaine field pieces, so marched readie to giue battell. His footmen, in number many, a rude and homely kind of people, but vnto him of all others most faithfull, and armed with such countrey weapons as they had, he placed by themselves. So marching on, he came to another hill, from whence he might not farre off easily descie the huge armie of the enemy, and how he had been by the treason of Czarnieuiche deceived: whereupon he presently sent for him; who sent him word backe againe, That he could not now come, the enemy being so nigh at hand, but that he should forthwith see him in the field as forward as the forwardest against the enemy. Czarnieuiche had then vnder his command thirteene thousand of the most choice souldiours in the armie: who vpon the signall of battell on both sides giuen (for the Turkes were now also readie) first according to his promise set forward, as if it had beene to haue giuen the onset: but being come neere vnto the enemy, forthwith (as he had before agreed) caused his ensigne to be let fall, and his men with their caps vpon the points of their speares and swords, in token of their voluntarie yeelding and submission, K to bow downe their heads and bodies; whom the Turkes with their speares and lances holden vp on high, joyfully receiued as their friends, or rather as men taken to mercie. The rest of the armie almost discouraged with this so sudden a reuolt of so great a man, retired in halt to the Vayuod, crying out vnto him, that all was lost. But he nothing discouraged therewith (as a most resolute man in the most sudden dangers) with comfortable words cheered them vp, willing them as couragious men to follow him against the enemy, whom they in all things exceeded, excepting number, which alwayes gaue not the victorie. The Turkes perceiuing the Moldauians lately reuolted vpon the joyning of the battell (as men in conscience wounded) to shrink backe, thrust them perforce into the head of their battell, making of them no more account, but to blunt the enemies swords; and such as hung backe, they themselves slew: vpon whom as false L traitors the Vayuod caused his field pieces to be most furiously discharged; so that most part of these trecherous men there slaine, some by the Turkes, some by their owne friends, receiued the iust reward of their infidelitie and treason, accompanied with perpetuall infamie.ouer

by the Moldauians; and after a most cruell fight, as if they had beene discouraged, began to re- tire, but indeed of purpose to haue drawn the Christians before they were aware, within the dan- ger of their great ordinance, and ambushes, which they had before aptly and couerly placed for that purpose. Which Suiercenius well acquainted with the Turkes finenesse, perceiuing, with much adoe staid their further pursuit, and so auoided the danger prepared for them. The Turkes deceived of their expectation, came on againe afresh, with no lesse furie than at the first: whom M the Christians right valiantly receiued, and made with them a most cruell and mortall battell; wherein many both of the Turkes and Christians fell, and neuer rise againe. But what was so small a power against such a world of men? After long fight, the Moldauians oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, began to giue ground: and seeing no other remedie, but either to flie

A or to die, betooke themselves to flight, wherein most part of them were slaine, the furious ene- mie still hardly pursuing them at the heeles: of the Cossackes were left onely two hundred and fiftie. The horsemen (the chiefest strength of the Vayuod) thus by the treason of Charniaiche ouerthrowne, the Vayuod with twentie thousand footmen, and such horsemen as had now after the battell joyned themselves vnto the footmen, retired vnto a towne not farre off, which he but a litle before had rased; but was now glad in the ruines thereof to fortifie himselfe against the sudden and furious assaults of the Turkes: who the same night so beset the Vayuods campe with such a multitude of men, that no man could go in or out of the campe; or the vttermost part of that huge armie be from any place descied.

The next day (which was the eleuenth of Iune) the Turkes shot diuers great shot into the B Vayuods campe, but to small purpose, for the Christians had (for so short a time) notably fortifi- ed themselves within the ruines of the old towne. Which the Turkes well perceiuing, and withall considering how hard and dangerous a matter it would be to assault the Vayuod in his strength: they sent messengers vnto him, to persuaide him without delay to yeeld himselfe, and to repose more trust in the mercie of the Turkes, than in his owne broken forces; especially in his so hard distresse, being so beset, as that he could not possibly escape, and out of hope of all reliefe; and therefore should by such voluntarie yeelding, seeke for grace of his enemies, rather than by a des- perat obstinacie to cast himselfe into a most certaine destruction, where no mercie was to be ex- pected. Whereunto the Vayuod answered, That he was not ignorant into what danger he was brought, rather by the treason of Charniaiche and his followers, than by the valour of the

C enemy; yet had left with him a strong power of most valiant and resolute men, who would in his quarrell and defence of themselves, sell their liues verie deare vnto the Turkes: neuerthelesse, that to auoid the farther effusion of blood, he could for his part be content to yeeld vnto his hard fortune, so that the great commanders of the Turkes armie would condiscend vnto such reaso- nable conditions as he should propound, and for the performance thereof giue him their faith, not once or twise, but seauen times by solemne oath to be taken. Of this his offer the Turkes ac- cepted, willing him to set downe the conditions: which were, first that the Polonian Cossackes might in safetie depart into their countrey, with their horses and armour: then, that they should without any violence offered to his person, send him aliue and in good safetie vnto the great em- perour Selymus, before him to answer his owne cause: as for the Moldauians, he said he nee- ded not to covenant any thing, for that the iniurie offered vnto them tended also to the hurt of

D the emperor himselfe, and of him whom he should appoint Vayuod, whose subjects they were. These conditions (as reasonable) were well liked of the Turkes, and so according to his desire, confirmed seauen times by the solemne oath of euery captaine and commander in the armie, both for themselves and their followers. Vpon this agreement, the Vayuod brought all his ar- mie out of the trenches wherein they had lien strongly encamped, and there with heauie heart tooke his last leaue of his souldiours, to the generall grieve of them all: amongst whom he diuided such money and jewels as he had, as a remembrance of his kindnesse. And there in the sight of them all disarming himselfe, accompanied onely with Osmolius a Polonian, went in manner of a suppliant vnto the Turkes campe, where he had full foure houres talke with the great com- mander of the armie; vntill that at last Capucius Bassa (either offended with his speech, or vnindfull

E of his faith before giuen) with his scimitar vpon the sudden stricke him a great blow ouerthwart of the face, and an other crosse the bellie: whom so wounded, and as yet but halfe dead, the Tanizars tooke and cut off his head, which was forthwith set vp vpon a lance, for all men to behold. His dead bodie they bound by the feet vnto two camels, and so shamefully rove it in pieces: and his hap was he that could get any litle piece thereof, or emburie his sword with the least drop of his blood. This was the lamentable & wofull end of John the Vayuod of Moldavia, a right valiant and worthie man, shamefully nurthered by the perfidious Turkes, who had he beene more constant in the Christian faith, had not happily fallen into so great miserie. Whose wofull fall may serue as a most notable example of the vncertainie of these worldly things: for as no man for a time had of the Turkes more or more glorious victories, so in the end, and as it were in demonstration of mans fragilitie, no man perished more miserably. The Vayuod thus perfidiously murdered, the Turkes with like treacherie forthwith set vpon the Moldauians, and slew them downeright as beasts appointed for the slaughter. Which the Cossackes beholding, and them hoping for no better measure, thrust themselves into the thickest of their enemies, and there va- hoping for no better measure, thrust themselves into the thickest of their enemies, and there valiantly fighting were all flaine, except some few of the better sort reserved for raunsome, amongst whom was Suerceuius with some other captaines; who were afterwards for great summes redeemed, when as they could by no means be persuaded to forsake their religion and turne Turke.

All Valachia made subject to the Turkes.

The loss of Moldavia dangerous to Poland.

After this victorie and shamefull murder of the Vayvod, the Turkes ouertan all Moldavia, and put to sword all the nobilitie of that countrey, with many of the countrey people: of whom they also as their manner is in countreies new conquered, sent great numbers in Colonies into the farther parts of the Turkish empire: and for the more assured possession thereof, placed strong garrisons in euerie towne and castle, as they thought it most conuenient. Thus all Valachia (both the higher and the lower) fell into the Turkes hands in the yeare 1574, and was by Selymus joynd vnto the Turkish empire, none of the least things by him done: For beside the gaining of so great a countrey (the most assured bulwarke of Polonia) he hath thereby opened a faire and casie way for his successours, at their pleasure to enter into Podolia, or Russia, parts of the Polonian kingdome, yea and into Polonia it selfe: which they will undoubtedly in time doe, if God in mercie bridle not their immoderat desires, and with his mightie hand protect the dangerous state of that kingdome.

Selymus at the same time, nor a little grieued with the losse of the kingdome of Tynes, and that Don Iohn had there done the yere before; began forthwith to cast in his mind, how he might againe recouer the same, and withall, thrust the Spaniards out of the strong castle of Gvletta; which they had now almost fortie yeares kept, euer since that it was by Charles the first taken from Barbarossa in the yeare 1535: for hee well saw it to be a matter of no small moment, to whom that strong forresse (standing so commodiously in the frontiers of Affricka) belonged. There was (and still is) vpon that coast diuers of the Turkes aduenturers, which liuing altogether vpon spoile, had to that place safe recourse, as to a most assured refuge: and if no bootie were to be met with thereabout, then would they run out towards Malta, Sardinia, Sicilia, and the other islands thereabouts; yea oftentimes into Italie and Spaine, and from thence carrie away with them great booties both of men and cattell, and whatsoever thing else came in their way: for which cause, many of the Turkes men of warre resorted thither in hope of purchase. But after that Gvletta was possessed by the Spaniards, they were not onely deprived of that so commodious an harbour, but many times intercepted euen by them of that place, and by the galleies of Malta: which two places fetued as two most sure bulwarks against the Turkes and Moores aduenturers, by whose means they many times came short home. For which cause the Turkes, especially these pyrats (of whom the Turke maketh great account, as not his least strength at sea) wonderfully desired to haue both those strong places gotten out of the hands of the Christians. In the castle of Gvletta was continually a strong garrison of a thousand Spaniards, who kept them of Tynes in great subjection, and oftentimes cut short these pyrats and rousers, who much troubled those seas. Wherefore the Turkish emperor Selymus, hauing made great preparation both for sea and land seruiue, commaunded Sinan, Piall, and Pharules, his chiefe Bassaes, and men of great experience, with all speed to passe ouer with his fleet into Affricka, to besiege Tynes and Gvletta. Who when they had put all things in readinesse according as they had in charge, set forward, and with three hundred saile of galleies came before Gvletta the thirteenth day of Iuly: whither also resorted vnto them other the Turkes men of warre, from Alexandria, Algiers, and other places, in such number, as that all that coast seemed to be couered with shipping. The Turkes at their first arrivall laid siege to the water tower, wherein were eight hundred souldiors of all things needfull for defence, who most valiantly maintained the place, vntill such time as that most of them being by the often assaults of the enemy flaine: the rest by the commaundement of the captaine retired to him into the castle. In taking of this tower the Turkes lost 3000 of their men.

Gvletta besieged by the Turkes.

After that, they began to besiege the castle of Gvletta, against which they cast vp diuers mounts, and from thence most terribly battered the castle: from whence the deadly shot was sent againe amongst them not sparingly; so that in one day two hundred great shot were reckoned to haue been shot out of the castle amongst the thickest of the enemies. But after manie furious assaults, too tedious to report, and much harme done on both sides, the Turkes to their great aduantage tooke the chanell of the lake of Tynes; and fearing least some reliefe should be sent to the besieged, maintained their assault day and night without intermission. Neuerthelesse, certaine companies of Spaniards sent from the new castle by Serbellio, got into Gvletta: after which,

A which, they in the besieged castle sallied out, and the twentieth of August repulsed the Turkes, with an exceeding great slaughter: But the Bassaes fully resolu'd vpon the winning of the place to gage their whole forces, and without ceasing still bringing on fresh souldiors, after they had all the day continued a most terrible assault, at length about two houres after Sun set, they tooke the castle the three and twentieth day of August, when there was now scarcely two hundred souldiors left aliuie to defend the same; who altogether with the other weak people in the castle were without mercie cut in pieces. What wealth the Turkes found in this castle, is hard to say; but certaine it is, that they had therein great store of victuals, armour, shot, and powder, and foure hundred great pieces of artilerie.

Gvletta taken by the Turkes.

Gvletta thus taken, the Turkes forthwith laid siege to the new castle, appointed by Don Iohn the yere before to haue beene built betwixt Gvletta and Tynes, which was not yet altogether finished: wherein the two auintent and valiant captaines, Serbellio and Salaazar (left there of purpose for the building thereof by Don Iohn) lay with a garrison of four thousand good souldiors. The Bassaes when they gaue the first summons to the castle, the foure and twentieth of August, required to haue it forthwith deliuered vnto them: to whom Serbellio stoutly answered, That he had promised the king his master, to giue him a better account of the place; and being now also verie old, could not endure the Turkes heauie yoke, but would therefore hold it out vnto the last man: which both he and Salaazar truly performed, not omitting any thing that was by men to be done for defence of the place; and sallying out, sometimes the one, and sometimes the other, made great slaughter of the Turkes, giuing them also repulse vpon repulse when they came to the assault. But the great Bassaes, little feeling, and lesse regarding the losse of men, so that thereby they might gaine the place; after many most terrible and desperat assaults, at length (namely the thirteenth day of September) when they had with all their force for the space of six houres, furiously assaulted the castle and flaine most of the defendants, at last tooke it.

The notable assistance of Serbellio.

The new castle taken.

Serbellio shot in with two bullets, and wishing rather to die than to fall into the hand of the enemy, thrust himselfe into the midst of the Turkes, there to haue perished: but by the hastie comming in of Piall Bassa, both he and Salaazar were taken aliuie; as for all the rest that followed them, they were put to the sword. The Bassa in his rage stricke Serbellio, and the more to grieue him, caused his sonne to be cruelly murdered before his face. Neither was this victorie by the Turkes obtained without blood, hauing in lesse than three moneths space that the siege endured, D lost aboute thirtie thousand men.

These strong holds (the greatest strength of that kingdome) thus taken, the Turkes marched to Tynes, which they easily tooke, and afterwards ouerthrew the fortifications therof, because it should no more rebell. Mehomet the young king, but the yere before placed in that kingdome by Don Iohn, was there taken, and in bonds sent aboard to be carried with Carrera captaine of Gvletta, prisoners to Constantinople. And thus the kingdome of Tynes, with the strong castle of Gvletta, fell againe into the possession of the Turkes, to the farther trouble of the Christian countreies lying ouer against it. The proud Bassaes hauing (as they thought) best disposed of all things at Tynes and Gvletta, departed thence, and with their fleet of 400 saile, came the fourth of October within sight of Malta. But vnderstanding that they of Malta were provided for their comming, and remembering what dishonor their most magnificent emperor Solyman had not many yeares before there sustained, wherof diuers of them had been eye-witnesse, they turned thence, and sailed directly to Constantinople.

Shortly after, this great emperor Selymus spent with wine and women, vnto whom he had giuen his greatest strength, died, the ninth of December, in the yeare of our Lord 1574; when he had liued one and fiftie yeares, and thereof reigned eight, and lieth buried at H Adrianople. He was but of a meane stature, & of an heauie disposition; his face rather swollen than fat, much resembling a drunkard. Of all the Othoman kings and emperours he was of least valour, & therefore least regarded, altogether giuen to sensualitye and pleasure: and so dying, left his empire vnto Amurath his eldest sonne, a man of more temperance, but not much greater courage; who nevertheless by his valiant Bassaes and men of warre did great matters, especially against the Perfians, the mortall and dangerous enemies of the Turkes, as shall be hereafter in his Historie declared.

The Worthies praise I challenge not:
for who deserves the same?
Except the noble Worthies minde, deserve the Worthies fame.
Prowd fortune set me proud aloft,

And still my haucie thoughts they were equall vnto my place.
So that although naught pleased but that best fitted my desire:
Yet to increase my fame, I still

And sent my mightie Worthies out,

By whose knowne valour my prowde name,

Prowd Siman, Ferrat, Mustapha,

Th' Armenians stout I vanquished,

And Regall Tavris stately towers,

But what availes my glorie great,

THE LIFE OF AMVRATH, THE THIRD OF THAT NAME, SIXT EMPEROVR OF
THE TURKES.

He death of the late emperour Selymus was for feare of the insolent Ianizaries notably concealed by the great Bassaes, vntill such time as Amurath his eldest sonne, then in Asia, by speedie messengers aduertised thereof about twelue dayes after, arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE: and there receiued into the Seraglio, tooke possession of the empire, the five and twentieth day of September, solemne amongst vs Christians for the natiuitie of our Sauour Christ Iesus. He was about thirtie, or (as some write) seuen and twentie yeares old, when he began to reigne: of a manly stature, but pale and corpulent, wearing his beard thin and long: in his countenance appeared not the fierce nature of the Othoman princes, being indeede himselfe of a peaceable disposition, a louer of justice, and in the manner of his superstition very zealous. The riot and excesse growne amongst the Turkes by his fathers euill example, he reformed, by his owne temperance, and the seuerer punishment of notorious drunkards: yet is it reported, that he would oftentimes himselfe drinke plentifully of wormewood wine: he was much subject to the falling sicknesse, and sore troubled with the stone: more spare handed than was for the greatnesse of his state: and yeelding more to the counsell of his mother, his wife, and sister, than of his great Bassaes; which was of many imputed to him for simplicitie. At his first comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, to appease the murmuring of the Ianizaries (griued to see themselves so disappointed of the spoyle of the Christians and Iewes, which they were wont to take in the vacancie of the empire) he beside the vsuall largesse which the Turkish emperours at their first entrance into the empire bestow vpon them, augmented also their dayly wages, and graunted them this priuiledge, That their sonnes as soone as they came to be twentie yeares old, should be enrolled amongst the number of the younger Ianizaries, and be partakers also of their immunities; wherby he wooon their fauors exceedingly. And immediatly to rid himselfe of all competitor, he after the vnnatural manner of the Turkish policie, caused his five brethren, Mustapha, Solyman, Abdulla, Osman, and Tzibanger, to be all strangled in his owne presence: The mother of Solyman pierced through with the cruell death of her young sonne, as a woman ouercome with sorrow, desperately stricke her selfe to the heart with a dagger, and so died. At which so tragicall a sight it is reported that Amurath let some teares fall, as not delighting in such barbarous crueltie, but that the state and manner of his gouernment so required.

In the beginning of his reigne he established diuers wholesome lawes, altered the coyn, and bountifully relieued the poore. And albeit that he was of a mild and peaceable nature, yet because he would not seeme to degenerate from the Othoman princes his progenitors, he prosecuted his fathers warres, and by the Tartars (called Præcopenses) in the moneth of October, in the yeare 1575 entred into Russia; part of the Polonian kingdom, where he burnt and destroyed two hundred noblemens houses, besides an infinit number of townes and villages, made great slaughter.

Amurath is killed upon him the Turkish empire the 25 day of December in the year 1574.

slaughter of the poore country people, and carried away great numbers of cattell and prisoners bound in thongs made of raw hides. But whilest they were deuinding the spoyle with Peter the new Vayuod of VALACHIA, who had before solemnly promised to giue the Tartars no passage that way, the Polonian Cossackes, who had lien waiting for their returne vpon the riuer Borylthenes, brake into the Tartars country, and there requited them with like harme, and brought backe with them a number of old captiues, who little expected that their so sudden deliuerance.

The Polonians at this time were at variance among themselves about the election of their new king (Henry Valois their late king being the last yeare, after the death of Charles his brother the French king, secretly stolne from them into FRANCE, to take vpon him that kingdome: after whose departure some of the Polonian nobilitie made choice of Maximilian the emperor: other some no lesse enclining vnto the choice of the great duke of MOSCOWIE, and some vnto others also.) Whereof Amurath vnderstanding, and loth that either of those two great princes his enemies should be inuested or strengthened with that so great a kingdome, and so neere vnto him: to hinder that their election, and to bring in another of lesse power, and so lesse dangerous vnto himselfe, euen in the beginning of his reigne wrote vnto the Polonians to that purpose, commending vnto them Stephen Battor the Vayuod of TRANSYLVANIA, for their king, in manner as followeth:

Amurath God of the earth, Gouernour of the whole World, the messenger of God, and faithfull seruant of the Great Prophet: vnto the most honourable Nobilitie and Counsellors of the kingdome of POLONIA, greeting.

Amurath his letters vnto the Nobilitie of Polonia.

It is not vnto the world unknowne (most honourable and mightie Senatours) our noble progenitors to haue of long time and for many yeares holden good friendship and religious leagues with the kingdome of POLONIA: For which cause it hath seemed good and reasonable vnto vs, to put you in remembrance of this so auncient a league and bond of friendship; for that we vnderstand your kingdome to be of late become destitute of a king, by the departure of the noble king Henry, your crowned king (descended of the royall race of the French kings) our friend: who for the small regard you had of him (so great and worthie a prince) and for your disloyaltie, is departed out of your kingdome, without purpose of returning any more into POLONIA. Whereupon, as it is reported vnto vs (but how truly we know not) you passing ouer your said crowned king Henry, are about to make choice of a new king, and especially of Maximilian the emperor, or of the duke of MOSCOWIE, both men of running wits, and of vs greatly hated: for why, you may well know they will be troublesome and grievous not vnto every one of you onely, but euen vnto vs also. Wherefore be you ware that you be not deceived; and take heed lest your confederations and leagues cannot long by their valour and prowess be established; and withall consider well the great dangers and losses which you may thereby fall into, whereof we haue thought good to giue you a taste: wherefore beware that heavier things befall not your State. We know there are right noble and wise men amongst you, which know better than they how to rule and gouerne: and if so be it please you not to make choice of any of your owne nation; there is not farre from you one Stephen Battor, prince of TRANSYLVANIA, a man of great honour and valour, by whose labour and dexteritie you may easily procure the peace and quiet of your kingdome. Whereas if you shall doe otherwise, we take to witnesse your God, and his seruant our Great Prophet, to destroy all your wealth and goods, which together with you selves, your wines and children, shall be giuen for a prey vnto our souldiours; with the cheefe men of your cities of CRACOVIA and LEPERIS: which for all that we say not as any thing at all doubting of your fidelitie and constancie towards vs. As for the rest which it pleased vs by word of mouth to haue told vnto you, we haue giuen charge vnto this our embassadour and counsellour, vnto whom our desire is that you should giue full credence. From CONSTANTINOPLE the last of September in the yeare of our Prophet Mahomet 983, and first of our reigne.

This the great Sultans commendations so much preuailed with the Polonians, that notwithstanding that Maximilian the emperor was by the Archbishop of GNESNA and some others chosen king, yet was that his election by the greater part of the Nobilitie reuoked, and both both he and the great duke of MOSCOWIE being passed ouer, the noble princeesse Anne (of the most honourable Iagellonian house) chosen queene of POLONIA, yet with this condition, That she should marrie Stephen the Vayuod of TRANSYLVANIA, to them by Amurath commended. Who afterward elected king, all the time of his life right worthily gouerned that noble kingdome, not onely defending the same in such state as he found it; but also notably extending the bounds thereof, enlarging it with such territories as he by force of armes got from his neighbours, especially the Muscouite. Of this election Amurath would oftentimes afterwards boast and say, That he had giuen the Polonians their king. But of him and of the league by him made with Amurath, more shall be said hereafter.

The yeare following great troubles arose in PERSIA, whereby the flourishing state of that most mightie kingdome was sore shaken; and opportunitie giuen for the Turkish emperor to inuade the same; which he laying hold vpon, entered into that bloudie warre, which to the great quiet of the Christian commonweale, for long time after exercised the forces of those most puissant princes one vpon the other. For the better vnderstanding whereof, it shall not be amisse compendiously to set down the same troubles of the Persian kingdome, the very ground of the long and mortall warre betweene those two most mightie Monarchs.

Old Tamas the Persian king, sonne to the noble Hismaell, who with great glorie had more than fiftie yeares worthily gouerned that large kingdome, and mightily withstood the often inuasions of the Turkish emperours, now spent with yeares, died the eleuenth of May in the yeare 1576, leauing behind him eleuen sonnes, namely, Mahomet the eldest, of an infirmie in his eies, C surnamed Codabanda, a man of a peaceable and quiet disposition, more delighted with the sweet pleasures of a contented life than the carefull honors of so great a kingdome: Ismahel the second sonne, of a more fierce and troublesome nature, so much abhorring quietnesse, that not regarding the league hardly concluded betwixt his aged father and the Turkish emperours Solyman and Selymus, he would now and then without his fathers knowledge vpon a youthfull heat breake out into the frontiers of the Turkes dominions, and there make great spoyle; for which doing although he was both of his father and the people the more regarded, yet was he by his fathers commaundement (who in outward shew seemed to mislike of those his youthfull pranks, tending to the breach of the league) restrained of his libertie, and sent to the castle of CAHACA, betwixt TAVRIS and CASBIN; where he remained at the time of his fathers death: Aidere the third sonne, no lesse ambitious than was his brother Ismahel, but not of like valour, kept by Zalchan, Piry Mahamet, and other his kinsfolkes, all men of great power and authoritie: The other eight were, Mamut, Solyman, Mustapha, Emanguli, Aichan, Amet, Abrahin, and Ismahel the younger.

The old king before his death had by his last will and testament solemnly appointed Ismahel his second sonne to succeed him in the kingdome; as of all his sonnes most fit to take vpon him so great a charge. Which thing Mahomet his elder brother seemed not much to dislike, contenting himselfe with such honours as his father had before bestowed vpon him.

Tamas thus dead, Ismahel was by the Sultans sent for to CAHACA, to take vpon him his fathers kingdome at CASBIN; when in the meane time there arose a great tumult in the citie, yea euen in the kings pallace: for Aidere the third brother, who in the time of his fathers greatest sicknesse had entered the chamber where he lay drawing towards his end, and in his sight most presumptuously set the royall crowne vpon his head, to the manifesting of his ambitious desires, for which he was then worthily reprobued: now after the death of his aged father, carried headlong with the same aspiring humour, and supported by Zalchan, and other his mightie fauourites, had so effectually dealt with the great ladie Periaconcona, his eldest sister, and the other Sultans counsellours of estate, put in trust to see the will of the dead king put in execution, as that the succession could not be any longer kept from him, and preferred for Ismahel, but by the helpe of some fine and fecter deceit. This ladie Periaconcona (elder than all the young princes the sonnes of Tamas, her brethren, a woman of great spirit and deepe conceit) left in great trust by her father, of seeing the proceeding of her brother Aidere, durst neither openly to moue any thing vnto the Sultans, prejudiciall to his designs; neither could she in her heart endure so great an iniurie to be done to her brother Ismahel, appointed by his father to succeed him. Wherefore in this perplexitie she cast in her wily head, how to satisfie her ambitious brother present, how to saue the right of Ismahel absent, the honour of her dead fathers will and testament, and the safetie of the kingdome.

dome. For hauing thoroughly debated the matter with the Sultans, she resolved, That Aidere inuested in royall apperrell, and setled in the grear gallerie, should attend the acclamation of the people, and be there openly enthronised, as the very elected king. With which vaine shew the vnwise youth (blinded with ambition) suffered himselfe to be led: and being set in his maiestie, verely perswaded himselfe, that he should now be honoured both of his friends and foes as king. But vnto these his so hastie and prosperous designes, the successe that spring from the subtiltie of those counsellours and his dissembling sister, were nothing conformable: for that she by their aduise tooke order for the gates of the pallace to be presently locked, leauing at euery passage a sure guard, and onely one wicket open, safely warded with a companie of most faithfull and valourous captaines and fouldiours, wholly deuoted to Tamas and Ismael: with straight charge, to suffer euery man to enter in, sauing onely the knowne friends of Aidere. In this sort did he thinke to haue entertained the young man, vntill such time as Ismael should arriue from Casbin, and so put in execution what he thought best for the honour of himselfe and the generall quiet of the kingdome.

Who joyeth now but Aidere? in conceit a king, replenished with vnwonted joyes, receiuing honour from all men, sauing from his best friends. By meanes wherof perceiuing now the prohibition of them, and moued also with the great stirre of Zalchan his greatest fauourit (who discouering the deceit, and crying vpon king Aidere, threatened the ladie, the Sultans, and the rest that waited vpon the fained succcession, indeed ordained but for the scorn and despite of the ambitious man) stricken with an exceeding feare, and full of sorrow, he withdrew himselfe closely amongst certaine women of the Court, hoping so to find some way to escape with life.

In the meane time so greatly entreated the cries and threatenings of the friends and fauourits of Aidere (who now had all of them prepared themselves for some dangerous and pernicious attempt) that the counsellours with consent of the ladie his sister, were enforced to take order, That to beraue this tumultuous & seditious people of all their hope and courage, Aidere should be deprived of his life. Whereupon Sahamal the Georgian, vncle to Aidere by the mothers side, by the appointment of the ladie Periaconcona and the Sultans, after long search made for him, at last found him hidden amongst the women, and without further delay taking him by the lockes, stricke his head from his shoulders; and in the place where Zalchan and the rest of his vnfortunate fauourites stood crying and threatening, amongst the thickest preafe of the proud conspirators flung the head all bloudie, and as it were yet breathing for hear, crying aloud vnto them: Behold there your king, enjoy him at your pleasure. At which sudden and horrible spectacle euery man burned in rage and anger: neither for the present wanted there many a rash head, that vainly threatened most cruell reuenge. But in the end, when they perceiued the neere succcession of Ismael ineuitable, and the death of Aidere irremediable, euery man betooke himselfe to his owne priuat affaires, and so at last deuided themselves one from another, and so departing from the pallace, scattered themselves some one way some another euery man as hee thought best for his owne safetie.

Shortly after Ismael the desired king arriued at Casbin, where he was of his sister and the Sultans joyfully receiued, as their lawfull and vndoubted soueraigne, and with the great acclamation of the people saluted king: who as soone as he saw himselfe possessed of the royall seat, and his power now answerable to his desires, he (after the manner of the Turkish policie) most vnaturally caused the heads of his eight yonger brethren to be stricken off: and withall vsed such further diligence, that not onely all those which were neere vnto them in blood or affinitie, were bereaued of their liues, but also all the fauourits of his late slaine brother Aidere, were destroyed in that publicke slaughter: so that all the streets of Casbin were defiled with bloud, and all the citie resounded with mourning and complaints. Which vnexpected crueltie, altogether vnworthie so worthe a thought king, so altered the minds of his subjects in generall, that all their former hopes were now conuerted into new feares, and their joy into mourning. But much greater and farre more lamentable did the miseries grow, as soone as it was giuen out, That hee would change the religion of the Persians (who with great deuotion honor their foolish Prophet Ah) into the superstition of the Turks (who with no lesse impietie obserue and maintaine the wicked rites of Eubekur, Haumer, Osman, and others, by them supposed to be the most true successeurs of their great Prophet Mahomet.) For by meanes of this vncoouth noueltie and vnexpected change, and by force of an edict concerning that matter, published by this new king, many of his Aidere slain, and his head cast amongst his fauourites.

Ismael saluted king.

He murdered eight of his yonger brethren.

A prophane priests, many of the gouernours of his friendly and subject cities (too much deuoted to their former superstition) were driuen some into exile, some clapt into prison, some had their eyes pluckt out (among whom was the Caliph of Casbin) and not a few others in sundrie sorts deprived of their liues. Yea many ladies (joyined in bloud with Ismael himselfe, and diuers others of his kinsfolks, to whom neither sex, nor age, nor innocencie could be a sufficient defence) endured sundrie torments and strange calamities: so that in Persia was neuer felt greater troubles, or a more dangerous change.

In this so great an innouation, and among these tumults, there went abroad withall a generall rumour, not in the cities of Persia onely, but in the regions of the Turks also, euen as farre as Constantinople, That Ismael with a puissant army of such as fauored this new proclaimed vanitie, was determined in person himselfe to go to Babylon, now called Bagdat, there to receiue the crowne of the empire, at the hands of him that he should find to be the successeur of their great Caliph, and in the chiefe place among their vnclane priests: as had sometime Solyman the great emperour of the Turkes, and the Persian kings of auint times. In this world of troubles, when as the feare of farther miseries increased, rather than any hope of auint quietnesse; he was when he least feared, by the helpe of the aforementioned ladie Periaconcona suddenly bereft of his life: but whether ouertaken in some of his owne amorous practises, or poisoned by his said sister; or that she (as some probably affirme) hauing secretly conspired with Calil Chan, Emir Chan, Pyrr Mahamet, Curchi Bashi (being all at that time men of great account, and as it were presidents of the kingdome) who disguised in womens apperrell and brought in by her, strangled him at such time as he had priuately withdrawne himselfe amongst his paramours, is vnknown. Howsoeuer it was, sufficeth it, that he by the helpe of the said ladie Periaconcona, was by vnnatural death taken out of this world the foure and twentieth day of Nouember, in the yeare of grace 1577; to the exceeding joy of all those nations, who by his death thought themselves now freed of many great and dangerous troubles: when he had reigned one yeare, seauen moneths, and six daies.

Ismael thus taken out of the way, the ladie began forthwith to perswade with the great Sultans (the ministers of Ismaels death) that as they had for the generall good of Persia contriued the death of the late king: so now that they would take vpon them the protection of that great kingdome, with the preservation of the maiestie and libertie thereof, vntill such time as it were knowne who should worthily succeed in that crowne, which now remained in their hands. There was at that time many of the greatest princes and Gouernours of that kingdome assembled at Casbin, there gaping after such mutations of those troublesome times, as might best serue their priuat designes. Emir Chan burning in ambitious desires, was in hope by means of a match to be made with a sister of Periaconcona (who was already greatly enclining vnto him) to be exalted to the soueraignie of all Persia. Mirize Salmas the chiefe Sultan, hoped on the other side to aduance into the estate, either Mahamet Codabanda the eldest brother of the dead king, or else Hamze the eldest sonne of the said Mahamet; and by bestowing vpon him his daughter in marriage (as afterwards he did) so to encrease the glorie of his house. Others there were, that thought they should be able to draw Abas Mirize (the middlemost sonne of Mahamet) out of Herat, and to make him king. Neither wanted the infant Tamas his aspiring friends, whose tour waited likewise for some opportunitie to settle him in the kingdome, and so by means of his greatnesse, to make himselfe greatest amongst his fellowes. A number of others there were that secretly waited vpon euerie occasion that time should present for their preferment. Howbeit in this so great varietie of thoughts, the Sultans answered the ladie with one consent, and promised her in most liberall tearmes, all the protection that their forces could afford, or their weapons procure: and yet did euerie one of them, both in action and word, clearly dissemble their feuerall imaginations, whereunto their minds were as prone and readie, as their hearts were cunning closely to conceale them.

Amurath the Turkish emperours now wakened, first at the death of the old renowned Tamas, and then at the rumour of the desire Ismael had to passe with an armie to Babylon, as also at the fresh report of the Turkish superstition newly published in Persia; and withall thoroughly instructed what harme this late king had done in Persia, what dissensions he had raised, and how hardly the prouinces of that empire had endured those calamities: began forthwith to thinke hereby a faire occasion to be ministred vnto him, to take vp armes against the Persians;

Amurath arriues vnto the citie in Persia.

Persians, and matter sufficient suggested for him to put in execution the great desire he had of some new conquest. For it is an ancient custome, which is grown to be as it were a law amongst the Othoman kings, That they may not challenge their due honours in their life time, nor their proud monuments after their death, vnlesse they attempt some great and ambitious actions and enterprises, and performe some exploit conformable to their maiestie. Amurath therefore bent vpon these great stirs in PERSIA, would not direct his mind any other way, or take any other war in hand, vntill he might first see what issue these marvellous innovations in PERSIA would bring forth: which in the person of Mahamet the succeeding king, seemed to be more pregnant than euer before, and ministred vnto Amurath new occasions of victorious and strange hopes. For as soone as Ismael was dead, the aforementioned Mirize Salmas (in dignitie chiefe man among the Sultans, though in blood and nobilitie inferior to them all) after many letters dispatched to and fro, at last assured Mahamet Codabanda, how with all quietnesse of mind and securitie of person, he might come and possesse himselfe of the kingdome. He was also aduertised by the said Salmas, of the whole conspiracie plotted against his brother to bring him to his end: and likewise made acquainted, how the fraudulent ladie (with the Sultans) had capitally conspired against himselfe; and how the fauouring Emir Chan, and Abas Mirize of HARI (her nephew and his sonne) more than became her, did little regard the due and rightfull succession of him being the eldest brother. So Mahamet bearing himselfe vpon the faith and diligence of Mirize Salmas, and desirous withall to see his eldest sonne Hami Mirize aduanced to some such foueraign dignitie, as he saw was due to the liuely hope euerie man perceiued to be in him, in regard of his vertue and prudence for manning the common-wealth, and matters of warre (wherein also he shewed himselfe vnto his father jealous and suspicious, least some other man should vsurpe vpon him, that honour and authoritie which so properly appertained vnto him) resolved in the end not to leaue the kingdome in the hands of priuat persons, nor the lightnesse of an vnconstant woman of suspected modestie, and a rebellious conspiratour against her owne blood, wherewith she had without any pittie or remorse of conscience, now twise defiled her selfe. And therefore he wrote backe againe, That he was minded to take the rightfull succession vpon him; and that for the same purpose he was putting himselfe vpon his journey: with straight charge notwithstanding, that Mirize Salmas should before his entrance within the gates of CASIN, present him with the mischieuous head of Periaconcoma; a woman (in respect of the some executed against her brother Aidere, and of the treacherous death of her other brother Ismael, and of the peruerse imaginations which she had conceiued to cause the succession to fall into other mens hands, and of the prodigall familiaritie which she had with some of the Sultans) well worthy of a thousand deaths. Secretly did Mirize Salmas put in execution whatsoever Mahamet had priuatly enjoined him, so that by his means he was presently and solemnly proclaimed king of PERSIA. And afterwards hauing gathered together many squadrons of men, wholly devoted to the blood and name of Mahamet, the same Mirize Salmas met him on the way, carrying the head of that manlike Virago Periaconcoma vpon the point of a lance, with her haire dispersed, and some other vncouth sights to the terrour of the beholders. From which nouelties (one mischiefe as it were hudling vpon the necke of another) there sprung vp diuers inward hatreds, sundrie tumultuous seditions, and much ciuile warres: this new king by the instigation of Mirize Salmas, seeking on the one side to be reuenged on the Sultans for his brothers death; and they on the other side opposing themselves with all their power against him, the state of PERSIA began to fall into great inconueniences, and of these nouelties to reape new losses. Sahmal the Georgian fled into his mountaine of Brys, fearing the wrath of this new lord: Leuent ogli likewise an other of the lords of GEORGIA, vnderstanding of the flight of Sahmal his neighbour, estranged himselfe so farre from his old loue and auntient deuotion towards the Persian kings, that he seemed now to desire some new innovation. The nations also that were neighbours to the Turkes, and the people of MEDIA ATROPATIA, now called STRVAN, disliked of this new king; and in the end it appeared, that PERSIA vnder this king through many mutations was in short time fallen into most notable miserie, and the state thereof more weakened than it had been of long time before.

Of all these things had Amurath from diuers places intelligence, but more particularly from Vitreff of VAN, a citie of ARMENIA the greater, situate vpon the lake Aetamar; who sent him most perfect information of all the stirs in PERSIA: Discoursing vnto him of the death of Is- mabel, the consultations of the Sultans, the trecheries and death of Periaconcoma; the broiles betwene the king and the Sultans, the nature of the new king (being diseased in his eyes, little esteemed of his subjects, besotted in affection towards his sonnes) the facilitie to ouerrule the chiefe Gouernours of the Georgians, and the people of STRVAN, euill affected towards the new king: and to be brieue, whatsoever had in truth succeeded in PERSIA, and might enflame the mind of the ambitious Sultan, to conuert his forces against an enemy of small counsell, and much confusion: adding thereto, that neuer was there greater opportunitie to overcome that king than now was offered; and therefore wished him, not in any case to let slip so faire an occasion, as the Othoman kings had neuer before, for the obtaining of so certaine and so glorious victories.

Amurath of long time wholly bent to marke the event of the troubles in PERSIA, now stirred vp with these aduertisements from Vitreff, settled himselfe more deeply in his former conceits to proue his forces in subduing the Persian king; the ancient enemy of the Othoman emperors, and his onely cortuall and odious competitor in the East. But no one thing did more enflame him thereunto, than to thinke, how he should haue to his enemy a king, not acquainted with deeds of armes, doting vpon his children, and weakened with the dissention of his subjects: and on the other side entering into the consideration of his owne forces, of the infinit number of his men, both horse and foot, of the meanes he had to find money, of his artillerie and engines of warre, wherein he farre surpassed the Persians; he did more and more resolute with himselfe, to take the occasion that was now offered him to begin the warre. For the compassing of which his purpose he was greatly fauoured by the present state of Christendome, at that time being wholly in league and amitie with him. So not finding any thing contrarie to his designements, he resolved at last to confere with the chiefe Bassas, which had the gouernement of his empire, Whether it were better vpon this occasion to begin the pre-pensed warre; or if they thought not this opportunitie to be so fit, then to lay it aside, and to conuert his forces and counsell against the commonwealth of Christendome. For such is the barbarous policie, whereby this empire is managed, That it is lawfull for them to breake any league, he it by neuer so many promises or solemae oathes confirmed, whensoever any enterprise is to be attempted for the aduancing thereof. So that although this warre could not be moued either against the Persians or Christians, without breach of their promised faith: yet among the manifold consultations that passed among the great Bassas, there was not any man found that made any account of that defect, but all with one accord, without further respect sought to set forward the ambitious desire of their proud lord and master. At last after long consultation and large discourses it was agreed vpon by the great Bassas Mahomet, Sinan, and Mustapha, That it would be better and lesse danger to attempt warre against the Persians, than against the Christian princes. Mustapha among the rest preferring the valour of the Latines (whereof he had made good triall especially at FAMAGOSTA) before the armies and forces of the Georgians and Persians. VV hereby it is apparent to the world, that neither the zeale of their religion, nor any iniurie received from the Persian king, but only the ambitious desire of Amurath (to subdue a kingdome, both in his owne conceit and other mens relations, euill gouerned, by an effeminate and sottish king, and through ciuile dissention brought into great danger) was the first prouocation of making this warre.

Vpon this resolution there arose new consultations touching the manner thereof, and vpon what coast they should begin their journey, for the more honourable successe thereof. Which point Amurath greatly vrged, protesting before his chiefe counsellours, That he would not enter into that war, except he were in great hope to beare away the victorie. Some thought it most conuenient to send the armie to BABYLON, and from thence to SYRAS, called in old time PERSOPOLIS, the chiefe citie of the countrey of PERSIA: others there were that gaue aduise, That the armie should be directly sent to TAVRIS; there to erect strong fortresses, and to take possession of all the countrey round about it: and there wanted not some (as it is reported) that thought it better to send two seuerall armies for both the forenamed places; and so by bringing the enemy into a straight, to enforce him to yeeld to whatsoever should be of him required. But Amurath durst not repose such confidence in his forces, as to thinke, that with his batrels decuded and so weakened, he should be able to conquer that enemy, who had alwayes most valiantly fought against the monstrous and puissant armies of his aunceltours. And therefore firmly resolved with himselfe, to send one onely armie, and so with his vnited forces to seeke the ouerthrow of the enemy. And so preferring the strong hope he had conceived to conquer the country of SIRVAN, and the chiefe cities of MEDIA the great, before the difficultie of making warre vpon the coast of SYRIA, reposing also great hope in the notable help that was promised him by the Tartars called Præcopenes, he confirmed the great Bassaes his counsellours in the same opinion: and withall discovered vnto them a matter, which to all of them, but especially to Siman, seemed most strange; namely, that he was determined not to goe himselfe in person with his army, but to send one of his worthiest captaines in his stead. The causes why he so did, were many, but especially, for that he was troubled with the falling sicknesse, and feared greatly (and that not without good cause) least his sonne Mahomet (being much fauoured of the people) might peradventure in his absence be vntimely aduanced to the empire; beside the dangers that he suspected at the hands of the Christian potentates: and withall persuaded it to be vnto himselfe a great honour to performe those things by his seruants, which had in those countries bene vnto him attempted by his most noble predecessours in their owne persons.

While they were thus consulting about this expedition, and the great Bassaes, Siman, Musapha, and others, made meanes to be sent as the soueraine ministers of their lords designement; he dispatched away sundrie postes and light horsemen with order to the Bassaes and Gouernors of VAN, BABILON, and ERZIRUM, in the frontiers of his dominions; That they should by often inrodes spoyle the townes and castles of the Persians, and by all meanes to doe them what harme they could: Which they were not slacke to put in execution; and especially Vñref (or rather Hufreue) Bassa of VAN: who with often incursions did much mischeefe, as well in the countries tributarie, as subject to the Persian king. A forcible preparation for greater troubles to ensue.

Vñref Bassa began the war in Persia.

Now in these great preparations for the Persian warre (which for many yeares after notably exercised the greatest part of the Turks forces, to the great quiet of the Christian commonweale) Stephen Bathor the late Vayvod of TRANSYLVANIA, but now by the commendation of Amurath become king of POLONIA, in the beginning of his reigne by his embassador the great lord Iohn of SYENNA, entered into a strong league and confederation with the great Turkish Sultan Amurath at CONSTANTINOPIE. Which for that it sheweth in what tearmes that famous kingdom then and yet standeth with the Turkes great empire, and withall containeth matter well worth the Christian consideration, it shall not be impertinent to our purpose (omitting the long and glorious stile of that barbarous Monarch, seruing to no other end but to shew the greatness of his power) plainly to set it downe as it was on his part at the same time by him confirmed.

The League betwixt the most puissant and mightie Princes, Sultan Amurath the Turkish emperor, and Stephen king of POLONIA, agreed vpon and concluded at CONSTANTINOPIE, in the yeare of our Sauour Christ Iesu 1577, and of the Prophet Mahomet 985.

At whose instance we haue giuen these our letters confirming the said league of peace and confederation: wherein we commaund, that none of our Counsellors, Beglerbegs, Sanzacks, Generals of our armies, Captaines or seruants, shall doe, or on my behalfe presume to doe any hurt vnto the kingdomes, countries, cities, castles, townes, islands, or whatsoeuer else to the kingdom of POLONIA belonging. And that whatsoeuer shall be taken and carried away after the confirmation of this league, shall be againe freely and without any thing paying, deliuered and restored.

In which sort also my merchants shall be dealt withall, if any of them shall chance to die in the kingdom of POLONIA.

If any wrong be done within the limits of mine empire, vnto any belonging vnto the kingdom of POLONIA, after the date of these letters confirming the league; the doer of the wrong shall by my commaundement be sought out, and being found shall be punished, and the wrong done, without any delay or contradiction, forthwith recompensed. And the like iustice to be also on the behalfe of the king of POLONIA administered.

If any debtor shall depart out of mine empire into the Polonian territories, where soeuer he shall chance to be found by his creditor, he shall be brought to the iudge of that place to be examined, and whatsoeuer it shall be proued him of right to owe, the iudge of that place shall according to the equitie of the cause make the creditor to be satisfied.

E But if the debtor cannot himselfe personally be found, no other man shall by reason of another mans debt be taken, detained, or molested: neither shall the innocent be troubled for the guiltie, in either or both our kingdomes.

In brieft, vpon whatsoeuer conditions and capitulations the league of peace and confederation was in the time of my father, my grandfather, or great grandfather of famous memorie, made with the kings of POLONIA, vpon the same conditions and capitulations be it now made also.

Whatsoeuer hurt hath hitherto been done to either part by reason of the disagreement of the Gouernors and captaines, shall all be on both parties neglected and forgotten.

Also after the date of these letters confirming the league and confederation, whereas the king of Roumania shall in time pay certaine summe of money used to be paid vnto the Tartars; the Tartar Chan and his sonne Murzeleby their princes, shall restore the same againe, and not to dare to suffer his armies by any meanes to hurt the Polonian territories. So that on the part of the Tartars and their armies no harme shall be done vnto the kingdom of POLONIA, neither on the part of the Polonians to the territories of the Tartars. And if any harme shall be done in the king of POLONIA his territories, it shall by my commaundement be againe restored. And so likewise on the part of the Palatine of MOLDAVIA, or the inhabitants of the kingdome of MOLDAVIA, no harme shall be done vnto the countries subiect vnto the king of POLONIA: but if any be done and certainly knowne, to be by my commaundement againe recompeced.

On the part also of the king of POLONIA and his subiects, whatsoeuer harme shall be done vnto the territorie or subiects of the Moldavian Palatine, or Tartars; the harme so done to be recompeced, and the doers thereof punished.

Also that all such fugitives as hauing done any notorious felonies or other villanies in MOLDAVIA, and so are fled into POLONIA, shall at my request, or at the request of the Palatine of MOLDAVIA, be restored, and in no case denied.

That all the Polonian captiues within my dominions, yet professing the Christian religion, may by the king of POLONIA his subiects be redeemed, not paying any more for them than their lords and masters paid: euerie such master of the slaue taking his oath that he cost him so much. But such captiues as haue received the Turkish faith, to be forthwith set at libertie: and so the Turkes slaues in the kingdome of POLONIA to be likewise manumised.

That our embassadours on both sides (so long as we are in league and amitie) may freely come and go, and not be staied in any place; and being willing to meet together, may at their pleasure so doe. And being entred into the confines of either part, to be forthwith by some good and faithfull guide appointed vnto them, conducted vnto the place they are to go vnto. And this to be on both sides kept.

No man to dare to hurt, or slay any Merchant, hauing paid his thirtieth part, or lawfull custome.

If any of our subiects shall haue any suit with any of the king of POLONIA his subiects; the indiges shall without delay be bound to administer iustice. All theenes and robbers shall be diligently sought out; and being found, to be seuerely punished: and the goods taken away, without impeachment to be restored vnto the right owners, their heires, or to the king.

The Sanzacks of SILISTRIA and BOLOGRAVE, the Customers and water-bayliffs shall not suffer any man but merchants and such as are sent in our seruise, to passe ouer the riuer Nyetter; who passing ouer, if they shall bring with them any slaue or bondman out of POLONIA, he shall be sent backe againe. The shepheards, if they will transport their sheepe into the iurisdiction of the king of POLONIA, shall not so doe without the leane of the Polonian Gouernours; before whom they shall also number their sheepe: of whom if any shall be lost, the Gouernours shall cause them to be sought for, and to be restored vnto the shepheards, as also to pay for their hey.

The Zauzj, Ianizaries, or Posts, shall not dare in time of peace or war to take any horses from the Polonian merchants, or other the kings subiects comming into our kingdome.

The Palatines of MOLDAVIA, in whatsoeuer condition they haue been towards the former kings of POLONIA, they shall now also still so be hereafter. The thirtieths and customes of both parts, shall continue in their old manner, and not be increased. The Polonian kings subiects and merchants, as well Armenians as of any other nation, whensoever they shall enter into MOLDAVIA, or any other part of our empire, shall not trauell by vncertaine and unknowne, but by the common and high waies: wherein if they shall suffer any losse or harme, either in their goods or persons, the doers of such wrongs shall be sought for, and seuerely punished. Which merchants shall be suffered without any molestation quietly to come and go, hauing paid their thirtieths: and no merchant to be troubled for anothers debt.

If any the Polonian kings merchants or subiects, be willing for readie money to redeeme and carrie away any slaues taken out of the Polonian kingdome, and yet professing the Christian religion; the indiges shall in no case withstand them, neither presume to take them from them; or againe to redeeme them. But if any of such slaues haue received the Turkish religion, they shall not be againe demanded by the king of POLONIA.

Such slaues as haue not received the Turkish religion, if after a certaine space they shall be set at libertie by their masters, and in the letters testimoniall of their libertie, it shall be declared that they haue received the Turkish religion; yet shall they not by the iudges be therefore detained.

In the citie of BVRYSK, the Polonian merchants hauing paid their usuall thirtieths, shall not be farther pressed with any other vnsuall payment.

My will is also, that the territories at this present in the possession of the king of POLONIA hereafter to be by him taken from the Muscouite or any other the Christian princes; to be comprised within this league, and so to be royally by him possessed.

A And for the confirmation of the articles and conditions in these our letters of confederation contained, I sweare by the power of the most mightie God, and of his most holy prophet, and by the most cleane and pure spirits of all the prophets; that for all the daies of my life, and so long as nothing shall on the behalfe of the king of POLONIA be done contrarie to the peace and league, nothing shall also on my part be done contrarie vnto the same. Witnesse the Almighty, the vpright iudge and decerner of mens actions. From CONSTANTINOPLE the yeare of the holy prophet Mahomet 985, the 14 of the moneth Cziemast Eumel, and of Christ 1577.

This league betwixt these two mightie princes Amurath and king Stephen, thus concluded, and after the death of Stephen by Sigismund the third (which now reigneth) renewed; as it hath been euer since vnto the Polonian kingdome for the time commodious, so hath it as with an Adamantine band so bound that most famous kingdome, as that in the hardest distresses of the Christian common-weale, and most in deed concerning it selfe, it hath afforded no more helpe than hath the members farther off, which is (I rue to say it) none at all. As in these late and present warres betwixt the Christian emperour and the two last Turkish Sultans, is too plainly to be seene: wherein had it in due time giuen but such reasonable helpes as it might well haue spared, much no doubt might haue been done for the repressing of the common enemy, and the recouerie of the greatest part of that is lost of HUNGARIE: But this bound, standeth as a dead member, seruing to no vfe more than to the more speedie destruction of it selfe, together with the rest of the sicke bodie. For what assurance it can haue in this long (I must needs say) but euill assured peace, is well to be seene in that in the great consultation of this great Sultan Amurath with his Bassaes after the Persian warre, for the inuading of Chistendome; the Polonians for all this league so solemnly constrained, were nothing the more regarded, but laied in the same balance with the rest, and preferred onely by the Prouidence that all gouerneth: which leading the Turke against the Christian emperour their neighbour, hath giuen them that peace they were otherwise hardly to haue looked for. Vnto whom for all that, hauing to his endlesse praise maintained a long and most chargeable warre, they haue not lent any great helpe or friendly hand; yet lying themselves still in the Lyons mouth, and like enough to be the next (God grant I betherein deceiued) that is to be of him deuoured.

But leauing these the heauie conceits of a melancholy mind, and ominous forbodings of that D I will not, to returne againe toward PERSIA, Amurath his greatest care. Amongst many the ambitious competitous for the manning of these Turkish so great desseigns, was the great Bassa Mustapha (euen he, who in the reigne of the late emperour Selymus conquered CYPRVS, carrying thence together with his victorie perpetuall infamie, for his faithlesse and cruell dealing with Bragadine the worthie and renowned Gouernour of FAMAQUSTA) appointed Generall of the Turkes armie into PERSIA: and authoritie giuen him, to prouide whatsoeuer hee should thinke needfull for so great a warre. And commaundement giuen vnto the Bassaes, and other commaunders of the greatest part of the Turkish empire Eastward, that they should themselves with their fouldiors of all sorts, bound by their perpetuall annuities to go to the warre, in the beginning of the Spring this yeare 1578, repaire to ERZIRUM, a citie of CAPADOCIA bordering vpon ARMENIA, there to attend the commaund of their new Generall. Who hauing his dispatch from CONSTANTINOPLE, and for fashion sake conducted by most of the court ouer the strait to SCYTARIA, and from thence passing through the countries of AMASIA and SIVAS, in the vertie beginning of Sommer arrived at ERZIRUM; and there staied vntill such time as his people, victuals, artillerie, and other his necessarie prouision was come thither. From whence he departed for SIRVAN, hauing first taken a diligent surueigh of his whole armie, mustering the fouldiors of euerie nation by themselves: namely, of the Mesopotamians twelue thousand, of the Assyrians and Babylonians fourteene thousand, of the Sytians two thousand, of them of the lesser ASIA (now comprehended vnder the name of NATOLIA) ten thousand, of the Iewes and Philistims one thousand, and of the Cilicians foure thousand. After whom followed the fouldiors of GRECIA, the glorie and hope of all the campe, valiant men to the number of ten thousand: and after them the familiar and faithfull guard of the Generall, ten thousand Ianizaries of CONSTANTINOPLE with harquebusiers on their shoulders, and scimitars by their sides: of the citie also of ERZIRUM, and the iurisdiction thereof, appeared foure thousand vnder the ensigne of Beyran Bassa their Generall. All these were stipendiaries to the Turkish emperour: vnto whom whom other voluntarie aduenturers joyned themselves, in number not inferiour to the rest, but better furnished, and of greater courage. So that in this generall survey of the armie were found about an hundred and ten thousand men, most part horsemen: yet was there not any stirred out of ARABIA, EGYPT, AFRICA, or HUNGARIE, or other places alongst the sea coasts: neither were the provinces from whence these souldiours were drawne, left destitute or vnfurnished of their ordinarie garrisons. Besides this multitude of men, Mustapha brought with him five hundred small pieces of artillerie, with many loads of money for his souldiours pay, with further order for the taking vp of more at ALEPPO, and other places, if his occasions should so require. He caused also great quantitie of corne to be transported by the Great Sea called in ancient time Pontus Euxinus, to TRAPEZONDE, so to be conueyed to ERZIRUM, being but foure dayes journey distant thence. To be short, hauing taken order for all things he thought necessarie for the warre, he in seemely array departed from ERZIRUM, and in eight dayes arrived at the ruins of CHARS, and in the fruitful country thereabout rested himselfe: but was there surprised with such a violent tempest of wind and raine, as rent in sunder his tents and did great harme, by meanes whereof many fell sicke and were constrained to forsake the armie.

Hauing stayed three dayes at CHARS, the bounder of the Turkish and Persian empires, he departed thence with his armie, and that euening lodged vnder the mountaines of CHILDER, supposed to be part of the hills PARIARDO: where hearing the Persians to be in armes, he thought it best for the securitie of his armie, so to pitch his tents as that he might well discover the comming of the enemy, and not to be assaulted at vnawares. And therefore planting himselfe in the plaine, he gaue order that Beyran, Bassa of ERZIRUM, should take possession of a certaine hill on the right hand; and Deruis the Bassa of CARABMIT should keepe another hill that stood on the left hand; and with them Osman Bassa, Mahamet Bassa, Mustassade Bassa, aduenturers, with many others as well stipendarie as voluntarie men, should likewise pitch their tents vpon the same hills, in such sort, as that they making as it were two wings to the campe, might discover the comming of euery man, and yet he himselfe being shadowed with the two hills, might lie vnperceiued of any.

Mahamet the new king of PERSIA, as yet scarcely settled in his kingdome, stirred vp by the fame of these motions, resolved in himselfe to stand vpon the defence of his state, and for a time to dissemble the conceiued hatred which he bare to some of the Sultans of PERSIA, and princes of GEORGIA, and to make some apparent shew that he was reconciled to them; for that without them he could not promise vnto himselfe any forme of an armie, or defence: wherein (notwithstanding all the troubled state of his kingdome) he wrought so cunningly, that almost all the great men of account tooke vpon them the protection of his state and kingdome. And so Tocomac a Sultan, the Chan and Gouvernour of REIVAN, a famous man; well knowne vnto the Turkes, and of great reputation amongst the Persians, was chosen Generall of this expedition; with charge, That gathering together the greatest number of men he could out of ATROPATIA, out of MEDIA the greater, and other places neere vnto the Turkes, he should by all meanes possible stop their passage into GEORGIA and MEDIA ATROPATIA. And thereupon precepts were sent out into all parts of the kingdome, That all the Chans, Sultans, and souldiours whatsoeuer should come readie prest to attend vpon their new Generall. Many obedient to the kings proclamation came, but many there were that would not stirre a foot, for their obstinacie in the broiles begun, and for the suspicion they had of vnlooked for mischeetes: at whose disobedience the king much grieued; but now there was no remedie but to make the best of the matter, and for the safeguard of his honour to make the best resistance they could. So with those few which for the loue of their prince and countrey were met together in those parts; being in number not aboue twentie thousand, Tocomac was dispatched about his businesse, if happily he might with these small forces oppresse the enemy in some straight or troublesome passage, where the great multitude should rather setue to the confusion of themselves than to the helpe of one another. These twentie thousand were all horsemen, armed with scimitar and bow, with some harquebuses among, and furnished with vety fine and well tempered armour; but aboue all, courageous they were and resolute, and well the more for the valour and prowesse of their Generall. So provided of all things necessarie, they set forward, and keeping the way of TAVRIS and GENG, they came to the turning of CHARS, where they were aduertised that the enemies armie was alreadye passed.

They were now come within a dayes journey of CHILDER, when they sent quicke and faithfull scouts to bring them certaine newes of the condition and number of the Turkes armie; who came thither euen at the very time that Mustapha was encamping his armie betwene the two hills, whereupon the two Bassas Beyran and Deruis with their people had alreadye pitched their tents. These scouts discovering the Turkish hoast aloft, perswaded themselves that there was not any other battell than those which they saw vpon the hills, whereof with all speed they could they returned newes to Tocomac, who at ease had followed those his scouts as fast off. Tocomac thus misinformed by his scouts of the number of his enemies, held on his way boldly, with purpose to assault them: and hauing discovered their tents vpon the hills, was thoroughly confirmed in the opinion he had before conceiued of the number of his enemies and the scouts relation, and with so much the more confidence set forward to assault them. But Beyran and Deruis, who quickly from the hills perceiued the Persians comming in the plaine, although they knew them to be men of great courage, yet reposing an assured confidence in their Generals battell, with all speed mounted vpon their horses and ran to meet them. So in the aforesaid plaine vnder CHILDER, within one houre after noone was joyned a most bloodie battell, wherein at last were slaine seuen of the Turkes Sanzackes, with a very great number of souldiours, without any apparent losse at all among the Persians; who fighting close together in great heat, and all bebloudied, vrged their happie and fortunat victorie.

But Mustapha who perceiued all that had passed, and stayed waiting till the fight was at the hottest, and the medley at the thickest, that so the flight of the enemies might breed their greater disorder: and now seeing that his people could no longer endure the furie of the enemies rage (euen as if it had lightened and thundered, and as though the earth had shaken) with such cries and exclamations as the Turkes vse in their assaults, for the more terror of the enemies, exciting his armie, ran as it were headlong vpon his aduersaries, and so renewed a most terrible battell. The Persians with wonderfull courage endured this vnexpected and dreadfull assault, and with incredible signes of valour, in that little time of daylight that was left (for the night began now to approach) continued their manifold slaughters, and at last being fauoured by the darknesse of the night, withdrew themselves with as little losse as possibly they might. Neither durst Mustapha any longer pursue them, but was glad by night to returne to his campe. Of the successe of this battell the Persians certified their king: as also of the greatnesse of the Turkish armie, with their further purpose for the annoying thereof. And by the Turkes also were presented to Mustapha (who had alreadye sent away postes with newes to Amurath) five thousand heads, which by their colour, countenance, and beards, bewraied themselves to be Persians, and three thousand Persians aliue. Of this victorie Mustapha greatly rejoyced, and to make it seeme the greater, seeking by all meanes to conceale his owne losses, and to raise a greater terror by the same thereof among his enemies) caused the heads of those three thousand that were brought before him aliue to be presently cut from their shoulders, and gaue order, that of those heads there should be framed a bulwarke in those fields for a most horrible and vncouth spectacle.

The same day that Mustapha employed himselfe about this barbarous and cruell work, there came vnto him certaine messengers from Manucchiar, the younger sonne of the Georgian widow Dedesmit (a great prince in that countrey) who told him, That with his good fauour and leaue Manucchiar their lord and maister was comming to salute him, and to offer himselfe vnto him as his obedient and deuoted seruant. At which newes Mustapha redoubling his joy, gaue commandement, That all the Bassas and captaines of the armie with all solemne pompe, with trumpets, drums, peales of ordinance, and all other signes of munificall and joyfull entertainment should goe forth to meet the said Manucchiar, and to accompanie him to his presence. Which they did accordingly, and so encountering him with all signes of honour, conducted him to the great pavillion of Mustapha, who there caused him to be againe saluted with like triumph. Manucchiar dismounted from his horse, and against his will beholding the strange and vncouth pile of heads, all pale and filthy to behold, and indeed imagining what the matter meant: yet notwithstanding, before all other things hauing done his due reuerence to the great Bassa, and according to his degree placed himselfe next to his side, after he had presented him with such gifts as his countrey yeelded, he gaue him to vnderstand, That for the honour and estimation which he bare to the Turkish valour, he was alwayes deuoted to the house of the Othomans; and as he had oftentimes desired to spend his goods and life in their seruice, so at this present time, moued by his auncient desire, allured by the strange fame of this victorious and wonderfull armie, and stirred vp by a particular phantasie, to learne the painefull and hard precepts of the art militarie, vnder such a Generall, commaunder of other commaunders; he offered him all deuotion and seruite, more than euer he had done to any heretofore, and himselfe hauing nothing in the world more deere vnto him, consecrated his owne life to his commaundements; desiring that the same might be employed in the conflicts of warre vnder his banners, among warriours and souldiers of fame and renowne: and therefore besought him to accept of him in the name of Amurath, whose obedient vassall he vowed himselfe to remaine for euer.

The answer of Mustapha.

Graciously did Mustapha receiue all this discourse from Manuchiar, and hauing stiewed him againe the pile of heads, together with his battels, armour and prouision of war, told him, That as all these forces are the gift of God, who alwayes fauours the righteous counsels of the Othoman emperours, in such sort, that they Lord it ouer all the world, euen to the astonishment of all that liue in the world at this day: so had he for his particular chofen the better part, in comming now to yeeld himselfe, and to submit his obedience to his lord, although it had beene better if he had done it before. And as concerning the desire he had to be his companion and fellow in these warlike affaires, he did very friendly accept of his comming, and promised him all good entertainment and assured safetie. And so in exchange of the presents which he brought him, he apparelled him in cloth of gold, honoured him with a battle axe and targuer, wrought with gold and amell, and neuer permitted him to go from his pavillion without a traine of his slaues following him.

and tempest.

This Georgian prince thus solemnly entertained, the Generall gaue order through his camp, I That they should the next morning remoue from those mountaines: and now euerie man was putting himselfe in readinesse, when as there rose a most terrible tempest of wind and raine, mixt with thunder and lightening; which continued with such violence by the space of foure dayes together, as if the heauens had beene dissolued into waters. Whereby it came to passe, that out of the dead carcases and heads before mentioned, issued a most horrible stinke: so that thereby, and by the foulnesse of the weather, with the other annoyances alwaies attending vpon so great a campe, the whole armie was exceedingly troubled, and diuers diseases arose among the Turks. But at the last the weather breaking vp, Mustapha rose with his campe, and set forward toward Teflis: and being not able by reason of the foulnesse of the way to passe any further, that day stayed in the plaines, where the lake Chielder Giol standeth, and there refreshed his sickle K and wounded souldiers: remouing thence, the next day about noone he came to the castle of Archichelec, sometime a castle of the Georgians, but taken from them by Solyman in his warres against Tamur, and euer since holden by the Turks. Here Mustapha surueyed his armie, and by diligent account taken, found himselfe to want fortie thousand of his souldiers: whereof some were slaine in the battell, some were dead of sicknesse, and many wearie of so long and perillous a journey were by night stolne out of the campe and returned to take their ease at home. From thence the armie remoued, and lodged at night neere the marish, called of the Turks Pervana Giol, or lake of slaues, and the next day came to Triala: where at this day are to be seene the ruines of a great citie, and of many churches; whereof some are yet repaired and maintained by deuout Christians, the reliques of those happie and religious forces, that with so great and faithfull zeale passed the seas and mountaines through those barbarous nations into the holy land, men worthie of eternall praise. The next day the Turkes ascended the high and craggie mountaine that standeth vpon Teflis: from the top whereof descending the day following, they seized vpon a castle of the Georgians, called by the Turks Givroi Chala. Departing thence, and lodging in certaine plaines, the next day they came neere to the riuer that runneth by Teflis. But in these foure dayes march from Archichelec, where Mustapha tooke view of his armie, many of the Turks, who in seeking for victuals for themselves and their horses, had stragled from the armie, were cut off by the Georgian captaines; who with a number of their owne country souldiers secretly followed the Turkes armie, and well acquainted with all the waies of the country, lay in ambush vpon such places as the victuallers were to passe through, and so suddenly setting vpon them, spoyled them at once both of their goods and liues.

Mustapha comming to Teflis, found that castle empty, for that Daut Chan lord thereof, hearing of the comming of the Turkes, forsooke the same, and betooke himselfe to the fields: prouiding better for himselfe in so doing, than by staying still in the castle, to haue been taken pri- soner.

A soner. This castle for the conuenient situation thereof Mustapha caused to be repaired and fortified, and planted therein an hundred pieces of artillerie; and appointed Mahamet Bassa Generall Gouvernour of that place, with a garrison of six thousand souldiers: which done, he departed for Sirvan. At which very time those of Soria which had brought a thousand loads of rent corne to the campe from Leppo, being themselves in number a thousand persons, with five hundred others of Omps (in ancient time called Hvs, the citie of the patient Iob) and other places of Soria, men neither of dutie bound, nor of themselves willing to follow the campe, returned homewards towards their owne country: but vpon the way they were set vpon by Alessandro, Ginsuf, and Dauid (three of the Georgian lords) and all slaine, except some few, who by the swiftnesse of their horses escaped with Nassardin their captaine.

B Now after that Mustapha had passed the descent of the steepe mountaines of Teflis, the next day he encamped in certaine low plaines: where the embassadours of Alessandro summoned the Great, sonne of Leuent a Georgian prince, came vnto him and told him, That their lord was readie, if it so pleased him to come vnto him to doe him reuerence, and by word of mouth to promise him that deuotion he had alwayes in mind borne to the Othoman emperours. With a glad heart and cheerefull countenance did Mustapha receiue these embassadours: and presently sent them backe to will their lord to come, and to tell him, That his friendship should be vnto him most deare and acceptable. And after their departure tooke order with all the commanders of his armie to receiue him with all the signes of joy that might be; which at his comming was accordingly by them performed. Who after he had presented vnto the Generall the rich gifts he C had brought with him, he offered his obedience to the Bassa with most liuely speeches he could possibly deuise, calling Amurath his lord: seeming to take it in euill part, that he passed not through his territorie, where he should (as he said) haue had plentie of all things for the releefe of his armie; yet hoping, that in his returne from Sirvan, he would take it in his way, where as he should find him most readie to bestow all that he had in the seruice of his lord: telling him moreouer, That although he could not for many vrgent respects goe with him into Sirvan, yet he would alwayes accompanie him in mind, and continually pray vnto the Creator of all things for his prosperitie and most happie successe. Courteously did Mustapha receiue both his presents and submission, and in exchange thereof bestowed vpon him certain gifts after the Turkish manner, and in magnificall tearmes gaue him answer, promising him in his returne to passe D through his country: and so dismissed the Christian duke with like honour, wherewith he was entertained at his comming.

Mustapha holding on his journey toward Sirvan, through moorish and troublesome wayes, in twelve dayes after he departed from Teflis came into the confines of Sirvan, neere to the riuer of Canac, and there rested on this side the riuer one day. At which time they of the citie of Schir bordering vpon the Siruanians and Georgians, foure dayes iourney from Svmachia, came to offer themselves to Mustapha, as subjects to the Turkes. Of whose submission the Generall graciously accepted, promising to them his assured protection.

The Turkes armie ouerwearyed with the continuall trauell of twelue dayes march, but yet farre more afflicted with hunger, not finding in those parts so much as one wild beast to assuage E their greedie desire of meat, sought by all meanes euerie man for himselfe to get something, especially when they vnderstood their Generall would passe the riuer into a country vnto them all vnknowne, where they were altogether vnertain what to find for their releefe. So whilst they were enquiring among themselves, who were able to conduct them to some such place as where they might supplie their wants, behold certaine Persians were taken; who being straightly examined on that point, after much resistance at last told them, That not far off, after they had passed certaine marshes, where Canac dischargeth it selfe into Araxis, they should find many fields full of Rysse and corne in the blade, and a little further certain fat heards of cattell, sufficient to relieue the whole armie. Of this newes was the Generall certified: who although he greatly doubted the subtilties of his enemies; yet to gratifie his souldiers, and to make them more willing to fol- F low him into Sirvan, he licensed euerie man that had a desire thereunto to goe and prouide themselves of victuals; and so suffered all that would to goe freely. Whereupon there went of themselves, and were sent by their captaines about ten thousand seruile persons, with cammels, horses, and mules, to fetch away this prouision of corne and cattell: but the euent answered not to their desires. For Tocomac with the other Persian captaines, and the rest of the souldiers that were were escaped from the ouerthrow giuen them in the plaines of CHILDER, hauing gathered together the remainder of the armie, and recouered such places as they thought safe and fitly for them, carefully attended the marching and passing of the Turkish armie. And being certainly enformed by them of RIVAN and GEORGIA what way they kept, and that of necessity they must arrive at the banks of Canac; they began to deuise how they might in some measure be reuenged of their former losse, and empeach their enemies entrance into SIRVAN. But wanting rather strength than courage to assaile the whole armie, they thought it best to lay in ambush in some fit place, vntill some part of the Turkish armie (allured with the prey of the corne and cattell) should for the reliefe of their common necessities descend into those fields. And the rather to draw them on, sent out diuers men, who as if they had gone about their owne business, and by chance at vnawares had lighted vpon the Turkes campe, reuealed vnto them as a great secret, what a good prey was hard by them. And so withdrawing themselves out of sight priuily, awaited the coming of the Turks: when as within the space of three daies it so fell out, that the aforesaid ten thousand forragers arrived at the wished place; where they had no sooner begun to charge themselves with the prey, but they were surprised by the Persians, and all slaine, sauing a few who by hastie flight saved themselves. The noise of this hoar skirmish being heard into the Turkish hoast, caused Mustapha to imagine that the matter was fallen out euen as in deed it was: and therefore rising with his whole armie, hasted with all possible speed to haue encouraged the poore people, who were now all slaine. And albeit he came not in so good time as to yeeld them reliefe, yet came he verie fitly to reuenge their death vpon the Persians, slaying too long to load themselves with the spoile of their enemies.

The place from whence the Turks were to haue had the aforesaid bootie, was almost in manner of an island, enclosed with the riuers of Araxis and Canac: whereinto Mustapha entered with his whole power, Deruis Bassa leading the one wing as did Beyran Bassa the other, and himselfe coming on in the middle with the maine battell. The Persians seeing Mustapha with all his forces hastening towards them, and withall remembering the late ouerthrow by them received in the plaines of CHILDER; began to bethinke themselves, how much better it had bene for them to haue contented themselves with the late slaughter of the forragers, and with speed to haue got them away out of that strait, than by staying longer to be enclosed with the multitude of their enemies, as that they could now no way escape without most manifest perill. In this perplexitie, discoursing among themselves whether it were better for them to flie, or with so great disadvantage to joyne battell, and so rather to die with honour than to liue with reproach: at last they resolved to referre themselves to the farther seruice of their prince and countrey; deeming it rather a point of wisdom than of dishonour, Not to aduenture vnto most desperat and assured death, so many worthie men as might in future time stand their countrey in great stead: yet did they not see how by flight well to escape, for that they were in such sort straitened within their expectation was by the Turkes already possessed. In these difficulties euery man began to betake himselfe to his owne priuat conceit and fortune. Tocmac with Emir Chan, and other the great commanders of the armie were the first that turned their backs, and by the helpe of their courageous horses, got ouer the riuer of Canac: whose example moued many others to attempt the like, though not with like fortune; for that their horses being not of such courage, and out of breath, lay many of them drowned in the riuer. Where with others being amazed, as perceiving inescapable death in flying present before their eyes, and reposing all their hope euen in despair, ran as it were headlong in a rage and furie vpon their enemies, and in fighting shewed unspeakable valour: but what was one against an hundred? for there they were also all slaine, though worthie of immortall fame. Thus was the Persian armie quite discomfited in this demy island, being first stained with the blood of the enemy, and afterward with the slaughter of the neighbour and proper inhabitant: and so became the perpetuall sepulcher of a most courageous and warlike people. The Turkes in this last conflict, lost not above three thousand men, beside the slaughter of the ten thousand forragers: although Tocmac to make his losse to seeme the more tollerable, made report to the king, of a greater slaughter made. The Persian capitaines full of sorrow for this vnexpected ouerthrow, with the licence of their Generall departed, euery man to his severall gouernment: as Emanguli Chan to GENOX, Serap Chan to NASIMAN, Tocmac himselfe to RIVAN; and all the rest to other cities, to the gouernment: whereof they were before fore by the king appointed, and so remained expecting his farther pleasure from CASIM.

Mustapha was now come to the riuer of Canac, which he was to passe ouer into SIRVAN, and therefore made straight proclamation through his whole armie, That euery man should be in readinesse against the next day to passe the riuer. At which proclamation all his people suddenly arose in a tumult, and with injurious tearmes euen to his face reproued his folly and inhumanitie, propounding vnto himselfe danger, and an vniuersall confusion vnto the whole armie: and therefore praised him to surcease from proceeding any farther, vnlesse he were minded to cast them all away. But his resolute mind was not by their threats or entreaties to be removed, neither gaue he them other answer than this: That so had Amurath commaunded: and that if all the rest should shew themselves unwilling to obey their Soueraigne, hee himselfe would not nor could not, but would be the first man to attempt and performe that, which they all so abhorred and reproued. Valiant souldiours (he said) were discovered and knowne; not in idleness and ease, but in great paines taking, and difficult enterprises: who neuer ought to be afraid to change this momentarie life for euermore honour, or to shun death, if the seruice of their prince so required. And for mine owne part (said he) I most earnestly request you, that after I haue attempted the passage of the riuer, if any thing happen vnto me otherwise than well, yet carrie my dead bodie to the other side of the riuer: to the end, that if I cannot whilst I yet liue execute the commaundement of my soueraigne, I may yet at least performe the same when I am but a speechlesse and liuelesse carcas: for as much as the desire of my lords is not in any sort to be frustrated, for making too great account of mine owne life.

The resolute answer of Mustapha to his tumultuous souldiours.

Diuers and sundrie murmurings and whisperings followed vpon this speech of the Generall, who notwithstanding the next morning did first of all wade ouer the deepe and swift riuer himselfe: after whom presently followed the Bassas with all their slaues, by whose example the rest also were induced at last to doe the like, and so continued vntill the darknesse of the night interrupted their passage; by which occasion more than halfe the armie could not then get ouer. In this passage, being with great tumult and disorder attempted, it came to passe that about eight thousand persons carried away with the violence of the riuer, were miserably drowned, with the great outcrie of all the hoast. The like happened also to many mules, camels, and sumpter horses, vpon whose backs diuers persons being mounted, in hope to haue passed drie ouer the riuer, were likewise headlong ouerwhelmed therein. With great complaints and blasphemous curings was the whole night spent, by them that were yet on this side the riuer; whose feares were not a little increased, by the example of their vnfortunate fellowes before drowned. And like enough it was, some pestilent sedition to haue ensued thereupon, had there not a shallow foord by great chance been discovered, which gaue safe passage to those that were left. For in the passage which the people made that followed Mustapha, the grauell of the bottom of the riuer being raised and removed by the heauie hooues of the cattell, was driuen downe the riuer to a place, where by great good hap there was also a foord: and there gathered together in an heape, had in such sort raised the depth of the channell, that it made as it were a shelve for their commodious passage, so that the remnant of the armie, carriages, and artilerie passing ouer the same, there was not so much as one man that perished. So hauing with much difficultie at last got ouer the riuer of Canac, they rested themselves that day and the next, and there staid vntill the whole armie was mustered, and againe put in order. Remouing thence, the day following they encamped in certaine barren Champaines, where was neither corne nor cattell: neither could they perceiue or learne, that in those quarters were any villages at all. By means whereof the hunger of their beasts increasing, they were enforced to giue their horses and mules, leaues, and stalkes of verie drie and withered reeds, and such other like things of little or no sustenance at all: and the men themselves were faine to satisfie their hunger with those vttermost reliques, which they were faine to picke out of such poore victuals, as now by corruption were become loathsome to mans nature: and that which worse was, they saw no end of these miseries they were so entolled into. Notwithstanding there was now no looking backe, but needs on they must, and followed into. Notwithstanding there was now no looking backe, but needs on they must, and followed into. Notwithstanding there was now no looking backe, but needs on they must, and followed into. Notwithstanding there was now no looking backe, but needs on they must, and followed into.

Famine in the Turke hoast.

did euerie man satisfie his appetite, and forgot in part the forepassed calamities. Through this fruitfull and pleasant country Mustapha leading his armie, at last arriued at Erbes, the chief citie in that coast of Sirvan as you trauell from Georgia.

This citie of Erbes was forsaken of a number of her inhabitants, as soone as it was knowne that the Turkes were come to Canac; who all followed their Gouernour Samir Chan: who with Ares Chan Gouernour of Svmachia, and other the Gouernours of Sechi and other places of Sirvan, forsooke the cities, and altogether withdrew themselves into the mountains, as places of more suretie, attending the euent of these so great motions. So that as the Turkes entred the citie vndisturbed, so were they with the prey they found therein, nothing enriched: for that in this common danger, euerie man had carried away with him the best things he had. Here staid Mustapha two and twentie daies, during which time he erected a fortresse in the said citie: whereupon he placed two hundred small pieces of artilerie, and for the keeping thereof appointed Caitas Bassa, with a garrison of fiewthousand souldiours. In the meane time also he commaunded Osman Bassa (one of the voluntarie captaines) with ten thousand men to possesse Svmachia, sometime the Metropolitall citie of that prouince, with the title of Visier and Gouernour Generall of Sirvan. Giuing him farther in charge, that in any case he should cleare the passage to Darrent, and giue present aduersements to the Tartarians of his arriual there: whom he supposed by that time to be come into those quarters, for that they had before so faithfully promised to Amurath. Osman coming to Svmachia, presently seized vpon the citie, and was friendly entertained of those that remained there: whom he likewise courteously entreated, without doing or suffering any outrage to be done vpon them. Of which his courteous vantage they of Darrent vnderstanding, sent presently to offer their citie vnto him, beseeching him to receiue them into his protection, and to defend them from the Persians: vnder whom, although they had long liued in subiection, yet differed they from them in the ceremonies of their Mahometane superstition, wherein they better agreed with the Turkes.

Mustapha returneth out of Sirvan.

Mustapha hauing thus brought the country of Sirvan into the Turkish subiection, and finished his fortresse at Erbes, and put all things in such order as he thought best: importuned by the Ianizaries and the people of Gracia, and somewhat enforced by the season of the yeare, which was now faire spent; departed from Erbes, and turned his course homeward toward the country of Alexander surnamed the Great, as he had promised in his late passage into Sirvan. And hauing trauelled a long journey, he sent before him certaine engines and pioneers to make a bridge ouer Canac, so without danger to passe ouer his armie. Hauing passed the riuer, he gaue notice to Sahamall (one of the lords of Georgia) of his arriual, who presently came and yielded himselfe as vassall to the Turkes: and being entertained of the Bassa with great pompe, and rewarded after the Turkish manner, tooke his leaue, and so returned into his mountaines of Brvs.

Mustapha setting againe forward, and traueilling by night because he would not lose the opportunitie of the faire weather; by the error of his guides lost his way, and so fell into rough and difficult passages, whereby he was enforced to stay and wait for day light: which arising, did manifest vnto them, that they were now entred into the countries of his friend Alexander. And therefore he gaue forthwith proclamation through all his armie, That no man vpon paine of death should be so hardie as to molest or disquiet any of the subjects of Alexander, but to haue good respect vnto them, and to entreat them with all courtesie. The day following he still trauelled on in the same country, when there arriued from Zaghen certaine embassadours of Alexanders, with great abundance of cattell, corne, fruits, and other reliefe sent for a present to the Generall, with a solemne excuse, that he came not himselfe, because the infirmities of his bodie would not suffer him. Wherewithall Mustapha rested satisfied, and leaving the citie of Zaghen on the right hand, caused the messengers of Alexander to guide him the way to Teflis: which they so directly did, that within the space of three daies they conducted him thither with his armie, without the feeling of any annoiance; from whence they returned, being well rewarded for their paines by the Generall. Whom now come to Teflis, found the garrison he had there left for the keeping thereof, so hardly pinched with famine, that they were glad to eat cats, dogs, sheepskins, and such like vnwonted food: for neither durst they for feare of the enemy go out of the castle to provide for themselves; neither if they had so done had it any thing auailed, such was the carefulnesse of the enemy in keeping of his things: but now by the coming

A ming of the Generall they were relieved with meat, money, and plentie of all things: Hauing staid there two daies, he put himselfe againe vpon his way, and with fire and sword destroyed whatsoever came in his way in the Champaignes subject to the said citie: onely the sepulchers of Simons progenitors (lord of that country) were left vntouched by the Turkes furie. The next day they trauelled ouer rough and ragged mountains, full of a thousand difficulties, which were the more encreased by wonderfull great snowes that were fallen: by reason whereof, many souldiours, horses, camels, and mules perished. In which distresse the armie continued two daies; during which time the souldiours were fallen into such a disorder, that forgetting the feare of the enemies country, wherein they were, euerie man without regard tooke vp his seuerall lodging apart, some here, some there, where they might find either some thicke bush or some small cottage, or some quiet valley to shelter themselves in from the wind, the snow, and the stormes. Of which disorder certaine Georgian lords vnderstanding by the scouts which from time to time waited vpon the Turkes armie, joynded themselves together, and in the night secretly approached vnto it, expecting the opportunitie of performing some notable exploit: and hauing obserued, that Hosaine Bey had withdrawne himselfe with his regiment from the rest of the army vnder certaine mountaines, to defend himselfe from the storme and wind; they took the occasion presented, and so assailing him, slew his slaues and all his squadrons; tooke a great bootie of many loads of money and apparell; lead away with them all his horses, and whatsoever else they could find, and scarce gaue him leasure to saue himselfe, by flying into the tents of Beyran Bassa. The next morning the Turkes remoued, and in the euening came to a castle called Chivrchala, where they staid a whole day to make prouision of victuall: which was attempted by sending abroad many of their slaues into the fields, conducted by them of the castle; who were all miserably cut in pieces by the Georgians. From this place the Turkes armie departed in great hunger, ouer diuers rough places of the Georgians, where they were faine oftentimes to rest themselves: and at last came to the confines of Dedesmit, of her called the widowes country. In the entrance whereof, they must needs passe through a narrow strait, betwene certaine mountaines, where the riuer Araxis windeth it selfe with a thousand turnings in the low vallies: a dangerous place, and so narrow, that no more but one man alone could at once passe through it. Betwene this strait and a verie thicke and hilly wood, they lodged vpon the banke of the said riuer: and from thence they remoued the next morning, and trauelled ouer verie steep D mountaines and rough forrests, ouer yfe and snow more harder than marble, and ouer other hanging rocks, in such miserable sort, that many camels, mules, and horses, tumbling downe headlong into the riuer, there miserably perished. Through these ruinous crags and diuers other miseries, they marched all the next day, and after that another day also, as miserable to the armie as the former. And so at last being sore afflicted with hunger, spoiled of the enemy, tormented with the hard season of the yeare, and situation of the place, they arriued in the territories that lay vnder ALTVRCHALA, or Golden castle, the princely widowes pallace, where they had all manner of reliefe, for all the miseries they had endured since their departure from Chivrchala, by the space of six daies: which if it had been a faire common trauelled way, might haue been performed in one onely daies journey.

The misery of the Turke armie in passing the straits of Georgia.

E The widow, with Alexander her eldest sonne, came downe from her castle, and went vnto the pavillion of Mustapha; offering him diuers presents, and promising vnto him all faithfull obedience. Whom Mustapha courteously receiued, declaring vnto her, what honourable entertainment he had giuen to Manuchiar her yonger sonne there present, who had been with him in all the expedition into Sirvan. And for the present, dissembling the priue displeasure he bare against Alexander (whom he thought to haue been one of them that spoiled the Sorians in their returne from the campe) he embraced him courteously, and praised her to be content to leaue him also there with him: giuing her farther to vnderstand, that he would send both her sons to CONSTANTINOPLE to Amurath, with letters of credence for their yielded obedience, for their fauour shewed to his armie, in giuing it so secure passage, and so many helpes: and lastly, that for their good deserts, they might be of the said great Sultan both honourably entertained and rewarded. The aged ladie, although her mind was herewithall sore troubled, yet outwardly in her countenance shewed her selfe pleased; and seemed courteously to yeeld, what she was of necessitie constrained to grant: as well for that he was already possessed of one of her sonnes, as also for that both her selfe and her whole state were now in his power, and as it were at his deuotion. And therefore leauing both her sonnes behind her, she returned her selfe heauie to her castle.

In this place Mustapha hauing refreshed his armie two daies, departed thence toward Chars, and after many dayes trauell at last arriued at Erzurum, to the great reioycing of the whole armie, which was there presently discharged by the Generall, without any mustering at all, & leaue giuen for euery man to returne into his countrey.

Mustapha setting himselfe in Erzurum, dispatched postes with letters of plentifull aduertisements to his great lord and master, of all things that had passed: not forgetting to magnifie his owne exploits aboue measure. He certified him of the battels he had had with the Persians; the obedience he had receiued of the Georgians and Siruanians; the mutinie of his owne souldiours, the forresse he had built at Eres; the garrisons left in that citie with Caiss Bassa; and in Symachia with Osman Bassa: and in breefe, whatsoeuer els had passed; and whatsoeuer he had taken from the enemye. Neither did he faile to propound vnto Amurath, what he thought conuenient to be attempted the next year, for the strengthening of those places he had already conquered; and for preparing the way for new enterprises. And principally he put him in mind of a fortification to be made at Chars, a place very fit for any passage into Georgia or Armenia, by situation fruitfull and commodious both for men and cattell. And withall he sent vnto him the widdowes two sonnes, Alexander and Manuchiar, the Georgian princes, certifying him of their submission, and that he had receiued in their countrey all good entertainment and friendship: and withall declaring his opinion, That Manuchiar was the meetest man for gouernment than his brother Alexander, and the readier to doe him seruice. Greatly did Amurath commend the valour and diligence of Mustapha, and highly pleased himselfe with this conceit, That of these beginnings might grow mightie conquests; to the enlargement of his empire, and that by this meanes he should be able to surpass the glorie of his predecessours. And the more his ambitious thoughts were occupied about these wars, the lesse he troubled himselfe with thinking how to annoy Europe with his forces.

It was not long after the departure of Mustapha from Eres, but that the Tartarians hauing left the fennes of Mabotis, and the vnmountable shores of the Blacke sea, and hauing passed ouer the rockes vpon Chorchis, and surueyed the frozen crags of the mountaine Caucasus, were now arriued vpon the confines of Sirvan, and there attended the commaundement of the Turkes. These Tartarians being of them that are called Pracopenles, to the number of thirtie thousand, conducted by their lord and capitaine Abdilcherai, a young man of great valour and fame, and of a comely personage; were come according to the faithfull promise of Tatar Chan, with a full resolution to attempt whatsoeuer should be commaunded them in the name of Amurath. Now Osman Bassa vnderstanding of their approach, according to the charge before giuen him by Mustapha the Generall, enuited them to enter into Sirvan, and by encreasing of the Turkes forces to further these beginnings of Amurath his glorie, and these his conquests (or more truly to say, these magnificall & famous tearms of victorie.) All which was most diligently put in execution by Abdilcherai: who hauing entred the yron gates where Dербант standeth (which by the Turkes at this day is called Demir Capi, and signifieth the gates of yron) and so from thence passing into the countrey of Sirvan, there stayed; and thereof gaue aduertisement to Osman, as was by him appointed. Ares Chan late gouernour of Symachia, who for feare of the great armie of the Turkes had abandoned the citie the cheefe place of his charge, and betaken himselfe to the safegard of the mountaines, hearing of the departure of the Turkish Generall, resolved with the other Gouernours of Eres and Secht (who following his example, had in like manner fled) now to returne againe to their forsaken countrey, and to make proofe if he could by any meanes take reuenge of the iniurie done vnto him by the Turkes. So passing vnder Symachia, and hauing put to the sword certaine of Osman stragling victuallers that were gone out of the citie, he encamped with all his people a little from Symachia, and by good fortune surprised certaine messengers sent from Abdilcherai the Tartar, to certifie Osman Bassa of his arriuall, and to know his pleasure what he should put in execution. These Tartarians brought before Ares, after much torture disclosed the letters they carried: which the Persian capitaine read, and considering the great number of the Tartarians that were come (for the letters made mention of thirtie thousand) he resolved not to stay any longer in those quarters, but presently raised his campe, and retired towards Canac, meaning from thence to certifie the king of these nouelties, and vpon the

A bankes of the said riuer to attend the kings answer. The Tartarian captain comming to Symachia, was appointed by the Bassa to passe ouer the riuer of Canac into Ganag, the countrey of Emanguli Chan, with the spoyle thereof to enrich himselfe, and by all meanes to make his arriuall vnto the Persians most terrible. With this charge the Barbarian departed, thirsting now for nothing more than for the blood and spoyle of the enemye: and with posting iournies came to Canac, where Ares Chan was yet encamped: whom he vpon the sudden most furiously assailed, and like a deuouring flame discomfited all his host. And taking him aliue, sent him to Symachia to Osman, who forthwith caused him to be hanged by the necke out of a lodging in the same Starehouse where he had not long before sat as Gouernour. The Tartarian after that, swimming ouer the riuer, and courting a little aboue Ganag, found Emanguli Chan with his wife, and all his familie, and a great part of the nobilitie of Ganag in a valley hunting the wild Bore; and assailing him, put him to flight, tooke from him his wife, all the ladies, and many slaues, and slew many of the rest that were come thither to see the sport: and after that rode on to Ganag, which he tooke, and yielded it wholly to the furie and lust of his barbarous souldiours, who left no manner of inhumane crueltie vnattempted, in satisfying their immoderat and barbarous affections. And so being loaded with the spoyles, and wearie with the slaughter of their enemies, they returned merrily toward Sirvan: and passing againe ouer Canac, came to the hither side of Eres into certaine low champaigns, enuironed about with hills, and there hauing pitched their tents, without any feare settled themselves to sleepe, and to rest their wearie bodies.

In the meane time, and long before these actions, were newes come to the Persian Court of all the Turkes proceedings: whereupon the Persians hauing gathered new forces, had dispatched Emir Hamze Mirze his eldest sonne with twelue thousand souldiours to passe into Sirvan, to see what hurt the enemye had done; and to attempt the reuenge of the forepassed iniuries; but about all things to punish the villanie of them of Secht, and the other cities of Sirvan, that not induced with any necessitie, had so voluntarily yielded themselves to follow the obedience and religion of the Turkes. The Persian prince departing from Casbin, accompanied with his mother Begum, who would needs follow her beloued sonne, was on his way towards Sirvan, vnder the guiding and gouernment of Mirze Salmas, cheefe of the Sultans; and had now left behind them the countreies of Ardovil and Caracach, when he was certified by the aduertisements come from Ares Chan, of the arriuall of Abdilcherai, with his great number of Tartarians; and was thereby at the first stricken into a great quandarie, and almost out of comfort: yet prickt forward with an honourable desire of glorie and reuenge, he prosecuted his intended enterprise for Sirvan, and hastening his iourney, came to Eres long before the king his father thought he could haue so done. This his notable celeritie serued him to great purpose, for that Caiss Bassa was boldly gone out of the forresse, and went spoyling the countrey, carrying away with him whatsoeuer he met withall, and committing such insolencies as hungrie souldiours beyond all honestie vse to doe in strange and fruitfull countreies. But when he was in the midst of these spoyles, and least feared the enemye, he was suddenly assailed by the prince; and hauing no meanes to escape his furie in this extremitie, after a fierce and bloudie battell (wherein the Turkes although in number few, yet shewed many effects of valor) he was there slaine with all his souldiours, leauing the forresse, the spoyles, and the countrey committed to his custodie, free to the pleasure of the victor: which the Persian prince hauing once againe gotten into his possession, tooke away the two hundred pieces of artillerie that were left in the fort by Mustapha, and presently sent them to Casbin to his father.

The prince encouraged with so happie a beginning, leauing his mother at Eres, followed on his iourney toward Symachia, but by the way descending the hills, he discovered where the Tartarians lay encamped. VV hereupon he stood in great doubt, whether to aduventure vpon so mightie an enemye, or to content himselfe with the victorie he had already gotten, and so to returne into Persia: to returne he thought it too great a shame, and chose rather to aduventure himselfe to most manifest perill. And therefore descending the hill, and drawing nigh the enemye, he perceived that the armie was all laid downe to rest, and that their horses were some couched, some standing, but all vnadled: whereupon without any stay setting spurs to his horse, he pricked forward with all his host, and most terribly assailed the Tartarians, now buried in their spoyles and sleepe; & hauing slaine their first and second watch, although with some losse, among the tumultuarie souldiours he made an vniuersall confusion and slaughter, putting some to flight, killing others, and taking diuers of them captiues. Among whom was their Generall Abditcherai, who was taken aliue, and sent to the king in CASBIN. After these victories the Persian prince scoured to SVMACHIA, and compassed the citie round about, wherein the Turkish Bassa Osman sat as Gouverneur, to the reproch of PERSIA: and there encamping himselfe; sent word to Osman, That if he would yeeld himselfe, he would let him depart with life and goods: otherwise, if he would obstinately hold it out, and not yeeld the citie, which he so vnjustly possessed; he should be constrained to surrender it by force, and his life withall. Osman who as then knew nothing of the Tartarians ouerthrow, but still hoped of their returne, thought it best to entertaine the prince with faire words: vntill their coming, and therefore gaue him courteous answere, that he was very readie to yeeld vnto the citie: but withall entreated him, that he would stay but for three dayes, and graunt him time to put all things in readinesse, that so he might freely depart, as it had pleased him in courtesie to offer. The prince glad of such an answere, supposing it to haue proceeded of a sincere meaning, expected of the Turke the performance thereof. But Osman meaning nothing lesse; than to commit himselfe to the faith of his enemy, and seeing that the Tartarians, whom he looked for, appeared not, he resolved to saue himselfe by secret flight; doubting, as he had good reason, that if he should longer stay, to be betrayed by the inhabitants of the citie themselves: and therefore somewhat before the assigned tearme of the three dayes appointed for the surrendering of the citie; he by the helpe of a darke night, and the couert of the high and rough crags, with great silence withdrew himselfe out of SVMACHIA, carrying away with him all his substance, and so in safetie arrived at DERBENT. The next morning the inhabitants of SVMACHIA opened the gates of the citie to the prince: who seeing their infidelitie, first by giuing of entertainment to Osman, and now by helping him to escape, without giuing him any knowledge thereof, did put in execution the effect of his wrath and indignation, which euen in CASBIN he had conceived in his mind against them; and with great crueltie did punish the miserable and vnfortunat citizens, laying their houses euen with the ground, raising both the old and new wals of that citie, of late so desired a receit for the Turkes. But when he was to depart thence, he stood in doubt, Whether to goe onto DERBENT, or to returne to PERSIA: the strength of that citie, the approach of Winter, and the long journey he was to take homeward, perswaded him to lay aside the enterprise for DERBENT, whereupon he resolved to returne to CASBIN: yet first to make his returne by them of ERES and SACHI, and vpon them as vpon rebels to inflict well deserved punishment. So making his present repaire thither, spared neither sex nor age, nor any condition of persons, but vpon them all poured forth his furious indignation, without exception. Which done, he with his aforesaid mother Begum, and his armie, though somewhat deminished, yet victorious and triumphant, returned to CASBIN.

Yong Abditcherai the Tartarian was kept safe in the kings pallace at CASBIN, but with such easie imprisonment as was agreeable to his calling: which was day by day so enlarged, as that he seemed not to liue as a prisoner, but rather as a companion of those of the Court, and as it were in apparent libertie. By which occasion hauing insinuated himselfe into the loue of Begum the kings wife, he spent his time in courtting of her, and she againe in entertaining of him in all secret and couert manner. Yet these their mutuall affections and interchangeable fauours passed not so secretly, but that in the Court and all ouer the citie it was a ripe report, That the shamelesse ladie, prodigall of her honour, had participated both her bed and her selfe with the Tartarian prisoner. Howbeit neither the king nor the prince knew any thing of it. But the king perceiuing the yong gentleman to be generally commended, valiant, courteous, and of a comely feature, and withall nobly borne (for he gaue it out that he was the brother of Tatar Chan) perswaded himselfe, that it would stand with the great good of his state, of a captiue to make him his sonne in law, by giuing him his daughter in marriage: whereby he was in good hope there might grow such an amitie and vnion betweene the Tartarian Præcopenes and himselfe, as that they would from thenceforth not onely refuse to fauour Amurath in those warres, but also become enemies vnto him, and in the fauour of PERSIA turne their armes and affections against him. Which his deepe and considerat purpose so displeased the Sultans of CASBIN, that they sought by all meanes they could possibly deuise to auert the king from that so strange a policie: but all in vaine, for the king being fully resolved, and now vpon the point to make a conclusion of the marriage; the Sultans entering into the pallace with their followers, and finding there the vnfor-

Amurath Tartarian, ran him through the bodie, and cutting off his priuie members, flapped them vpon his mouth after a most barbarous and filthie manner. It is reported, that the queene was then also murdered by them: certaine it is, that the poore ladie neuer after that day saw the light of the Sunne: but whether it was put in execution by the appointment of the king her husband, or that the Sultans did it for the publicke interest, is not certainly knowne. Vpon these murders sprung vp many troubles, and much ciuile dissention, threatening the vtter confusion of the Persian kingdom, to the singular benefit of Amurath. All which tumultuous disorders the king by brideling his owne affections, and the motions of his sonne Emir Hamze Miri, well appeased, procuring at last a perfect vnitie, as then most necessarie for the defence of his kingdom.

Osman Bassa being in DERBENT (the onely place of refuge now left for the Turkes in SIRVAN) ceased not with all carefulnesse to deuise what he possibly could, for the assuring of that countrey (of late woon, and now againe almost lost) vnder the gouernment of Amurath. For the better establishing whereof, together with his owne safetie, he thought it good to enter into friendship with old Sahamal the Georgian, lord of the mountaine of BVS. With this man did Osman practise many tokens of good will, and he againe interchangeably towards Osman: whereupon there arose great friendship betweene them, at leastwise in outward appearance: whereunto in short time there was added a straight knot of alliance: for that Osman took to wife a daughter of the said Sahamals, the greatest signe of his sincere loue towards him. Neuerthelesse shortly after Osman vpon some reasonable conjectures began to suspect (as indeed the truth was) that Sahamal for all the faire shew of friendship he made towards him, might for all that receiue some secret order from the Persian king, to betray him, and to free the citie from the Turkes, and so to reduce all that prouince vnto the auncient deuotion: in which jealous suspicion he was fully confirmed by the speeches of his wife, the daughter of Sahamal; who rauished with the honour, valour, and riches of her husband, could not conceale any thing that she knew deuised against him, but frankly told him, That her father being secretly reconciled to the Persian king, held friendship with him, and that letters went betweene them of great matters, and particularly of the affaires of SIRVAN. Hereupon the Bassa perswaded himselfe, that all the friendship of Sahamal was but deepe dissimulation, and the marriage of his daughter nothing but a meane to procure his death. Neuerthelesse he made shew vnto his wife, as if he had made no such reckoning of it as indeed he did, but kept it in store to his owne safetie and the destruction of Sahamal, whom for all that he still entertained with all honour and kindnesse due vnto a most louing father in law. But to preuent the malicious purpose of Sahamal, hauing enuied him according to the custome to a certaine solenne feast, he acquainted certain companies of his most trustie and valiant souldiors with his determination, enioyning them, that as soone as Sahamal was entered into his Court, euen in the very dismounting from his horse they should all fall vpon him, cut off his head, and put all his retinue to the sword. Which his cruell command was by him accordingly at Sahamals coming put in execution, he in lighting from his horse being slaine, and all his followers murdered, when forthwith were sent forth by Osman two thousand horsemen to spoyle and sacke all the countrey of the said Georgian lord, to the great maruell and astonishment both of faire and neere. The Persian king hearing of these newes, tooke the matter grieuously, as foreseeing that the recouerie of that countrey and prouince of SIRVAN would proue a matter of great difficultie, and fearing greatly that it would still remaine (as indeed it doth) in the possession of the Turkes. This was the end of the Turkes attempts against the Persians in SIRVAN this yeare 1578, wherein they lost aboue seuentie thousand men, deuoured partly with the sword, and partly with famine, and the other miseries of warre. And so Winter coming on very sharply, euery man withdrew himselfe from the field, wholly attending the keeping of that they had already gotten, vntill the coming on of the next Spring.

Amurath aduertised by letters from Mustapha of all that had happened in the late expedition against the Persians, vpon these prosperous successes (which the Bassa had for the aduancing of his owne credit described to be farre greater than indeed they were) began to cast many deuices in his head touching such matters as were to be attempted the next yeare. And first he thought it necessarie to send his forces againe into SIRVAN, to recouer such places as were first conquered by Mustapha, but afterward againe subdued by the Persian, so to establish his gouernment in that countrey. But vpon better consideration he ceased further to thinke of that matter, for the great hope he had conceiued of the aid that was promised him by Tatar Chan, who had faithfully assured both him and Osman, that he would overrun that province anew, and do great matters in furtherance of the Turkes designs: all which for all that fell out to be but windie words: yet in respect of this hope he layed SIRVAN aside, and committed the defence thereof to the false promises of the Tartarian, and the valour of Osman. And pleasing his ambitious desires with more haughtie thoughts, he began to deuise with himselfe, for sending his armie directly to TAVRIS, there to erect a fortresse; which being strongly fortified and furnished with a garison of most valiant souldiors, should neuer be againe subdued by all the power of PERSIA; and by this meanes to keepe in subjection all those great countries betwene TAVRIS and ERZIRUM. Which his conceit being of great weight and importance, was much increased by the persuation of others, very inward with him; euery man being almost of opinion, That it was an easie matter for so great an host in few dayes to performe that seruice, and to pierce not onely into TAVRIS, but further to passe whether soeuer he would desire. Yet after he had more deeply considered of an enterprise of so great importance, and with more indifferent judgement compared his owne forces with his enemies, he began to find many difficulties and dangers, which in the heat of his ambitious desires he at the first saw not: For beside the length and tediousnesse of the journey, he doubted that in sending his armie for TAVRIS, it might be on the one side assailed by the Georgians (of whose obedience he had as yet no great assurance) and on the other side by the Persians, and so brought into great danger; which he was alwayes to feare, whensoever he should haue occasion to send new supplies vnto the fortresse by him intended at TAVRIS. Whereupon laying aside all his former conceits, as too eage and perillous, he resolutely concluded with himselfe, first to make sure his owne borders, and afterwards by little and little to enter into the enemies countrey, still fortifying in conuenient places as he went, and so surely, although but slowly, to triumph ouer his enemies; rather than by thrusting his armie headlong vpon vncertaineties into places strongly fenced both by nature and the power of most mightie enemies, to be enforced with shame to abandon the enterprise so hastily begun.

*Mustapha care-

Of this his resolution he aduertised Mustapha by writing, giving him in charge, against the next Spring to provide all such things as should be necessarie for the building of certaine forts vpon the way that leadeth from ERZIRUM into GEORGIA: that hauing made those ways safe, and brought the people vnder his obedience, he might afterwards attempt greater matters. Whereupon Mustapha presently directed forth precepts to the cities of ALEPPO, of DAMASCO, CARAEMIT, and other places of SORIA and MESOPOTAMIA, for the taking vp of cunning workemen, of pioners, and such like, to the number of twentie thousand: and likewise wrot to all the countries, out of which he had raised his armie the last yeare, That all their souldiors (yea and in greater number also) should be in readinesse against the next Spring, to returne to the wars. The rumor whereof he caused to be spread euen as far as EGIPT. He commaunded also the taxes and tenths of those countries to be collected, and further vsed the chambers of ALEPPO, and other places, for such masses of mony as he thought necessarie for these purposes.

*Alexander con-

In this while the two Georgian brethren, Alexander and Manucchiar, sent (as we haue before said) by Mustapha to Amurath at CONSTANTINOPLE, in doubtfull hope, expecting the end for which they were sent vnto the Court, were both examined, and exhorted to embrace the Mahometane religion: whereunto Manucchiar easily yeelded. Whereas on the other side Alexander his elder brother could by no allurements or meanes bee induced to consent to so infamous and damnable a change of his religion; although he knew he should therefore be deprived of his state: but protesting his obedience at all times to Amurath, and his loue to his brother, requested onely, That he might but as a priuat man goe and liue in his countrey, there to be buried amongst his auncestours. Which his request the Turkish emperor referred to the discretion of Manucchiar, to doe therein as he saw good: who consented thereunto. Hereupon Manucchiar was circumcised, and the name of Mustaffa giuen him, with the title of the Bassa and Gouvernour of ALTYNCHALA, and of all his mothers and brothers countries: and being thus created a Turke, had his brother Alexander a Christian committed vnto him, and so both returned into their owne countries.

saweth vpon him

Now in the Persian court at CASBIN, were many consultations had for the repressing of the inuasions of the Turkes. And among others carefull of those matters, Emanguli Chan Gouvernour of GENGE, doubting to loose his honourable government, by reason of the late lacke of his citie, and spoile of his countrey by the Tartarian; by those plots that were daily in continuing for

A the sending of men into SIRVAN, to impeach the designments of Osman Bassa, and (if it were possible) to driue him out of DERBENT; tooke occasion to offer vnto the king, vpon paine of his head to defend SIRVAN, and not to suffer Osman the Turke to attempt any new fortifications or further conquests in that prouince. Of which his offer the king accepted, and thereupon the government of GENGE, and guarding of the countrey of SIRVAN against the forces of Osman, was frankly committed vnto him. And commandement giuen to the Gouvernours of TAVRIS, RIVAN, and NASSIVAN, and to diuers other capitaines that were needest, to be readie at all times with their power to assise Emanguli Chan, if it should fortune either the Tartarians, or Turkes, with any great power to enter into SIRVAN: which order so taken, was thought sufficient for the securitie of that prouince.

B But how to protect the Georgian countrey, was thought to be a matter of greater importance, euery man being almost of opinion, That some great power of the Turkes should be sent thither, for the more assurance of the conquest thereof already begun; and for the succour of the fortresse at TBFLIS, which must needs otherwise fall againe into the hands of the Georgians. This matter so troubled the Persian king, as that he seemed to haue bent his whole counsels and thoughts thereupon: when Simon a Georgian, a famous capitaine (sometime prisoner with Ismael the late king, at CAHACA, and by the familiaritie he had with him, seduced from the Christian faith; for defence whereof he had in the time of king Tamas chosen to liue deprived of his libertie and state) thinking it now a fit time to obtaine at the kings hand such helpe as he had long desired, for the recouerie of his dominion vsurped by David, otherwise called Dant Chan his yonger brother (who for the obtaining thereof of king Tamas, had voluntarily renounced his Christian religion) offered now vnto the king his faithfull seruice, for the defence of that part of the Georgian countrey, wherein TBFLIS stood (being in right, part of his owne inheritance) against the Turkes: reprouing by way of disgrace, his yonger brother of cowardise, and promising the performance of great matters in himselfe, both for the defence of that cuill defended countrey, and further annoying of the enemy. With great contentment did the Persian king consent to the request of Simon, and named him Chan of all that kingdome, which he possessed before whilest he was a Christian: and sent with him Aliculi Chan into GEORGIA, with five thousand horsemen and certaine pieces of attillerie taken at ERBS, when Caitas Bassa was slaine. Simon afterwards comming to GEORGIA, was ioyfully receiued of his countreymen, and there pressed about three thousand souldiors of his own and of his neighbours; excusing himselfe that he was become a Persian, not because he preferred the Mahometane superstition before the Christian religion, but only so to be deliuered from his long imprisonment, & by that means to maintaine his estate. And in this order were the affaires of GEORGIA assured, and strengthened in best manner that might then be.

Simon with Aliculi Chan sent for the defence of Georgia.

Now began the Spring to approach, and euery man prepared himselfe to the discontinued trauels of the wars begun: and now were met together at ERZIRUM, out of all the wonted prouinces, all the Turkes forces, with all things necessarie for the intended warre. With this armie in all things equall with the first, Mustapha set forward, and in twelue daies came to CHARS, not perceiving in his souldiors any signe of discontentment at all. And for as much as here they were to stay, and to fortifie both with wals and ditches that ruinated citie, and that with as great speed as was possible; there was no remedie, but that beside the pioners & engineers that were brought for that purpose, many of the Spaoglani, yea and of the Tanizaries also must be set to worke. Whereupon they all suddenly in a tumult, began with bitter protestations to tell the Generall, That their stipends wherewith it pleased the Sultan to fauour them, were not bestowed vpon them to employ their forces and vertues in such seruile workes; but onely with their swords and other weapons to exercise that force and hardinesse for which they were esteemed worthe of that honour. Whereunto the Generall answered in most haughtie termes; and not yeelding one jot to their incuillitie, but vsing all meanes of authoritie and terror, brought them to worke so much as he desired. So that within the space of twentie three daies, the towers and wals were erected, the ditches digged, the attillerie orderly planted vpon the wals, and the water brought round about it. Many inconueniences happened in the armie while they were busie in this worke; and namely vpon the 25 day of August, when they had almost euen finished the whole building, the souldiors endured a most sudden cold, by reason of the snow that then fell in great

CHARS thus fortified, the Generall resolved to send succours into GEORGIA TO TEF LIS; G without which it was most certaine, that that fortress would be yielded to the Georgians: but in what sort to relieue it, he remained doubtfull. To send part of his armie with some valiant capitaine, seemed dangerous: and to go himselfe with all his forces, would sound (as he thought) to his discredit with his great lord and master; whom he had already made beleue, that he had subdued all the Georgians, and brought all that prouince to his obedience and deuotion. In this ambiguity, the desire he had to preferue his credit with Amurath prevailed: and so he made choice of Hassan Bassa of DAMASCO, sonne to Mahamet principall Visier of the court, a gallant gentleman and of great valour, to whom he deliuered betweene eightene and twentie thousand souldiours; joining vnto him one Resuan capitaine of certaine aduenturers, that voluntarily offered themselves to follow the forces of Hassan; assigning vnto him likewise fortie thousand ducats, and many loads of meale, rife, and barley, with other things necessarie both for diet and war, and so sent him away for TEF LIS.

Hassan with this charge set forward, fully resolved to put these succours into TEF LIS, or to lose all: and at length came to the famous strait of T O M A N I S, where the ouergrowne woods on the one side, with the deepe vallies and craggie rocks on the other, would astonish a right constant beholder. When vpon the sudden, the Persians and the Georgians (vnder the conduct of Aliculi Chan and Simon) at vnawares set vpon the Turkes, and joynd battell with them. For these two valiant captaines remaining for the most part in the borders of TEF LIS and T O M A N I S with eight thousand souldiours, waiting for some opportunitie to annoy either them of the fort of TEF LIS, or else such as should come to their succours; vnderstanding by their espials of the comming of Hassan with this aid, had scattered themselves all alongst the said strait, in hope there to assaile the Turkes; and holpen by the aduantage of the place, to driue them headlong into the deepe valley, and at once to bereaue them both of their goods and life. But Hassan carefull of nothing more than how to auoid that danger, chose rather to make his journey through the thicke woods, and so as he might to escape the ambush that the enemy might lay for him vpon that straight passage. And so entring with his armie into the wood, which he was to haue left vpon his left hand, to discover what might be plotted against him, he was hardly charged by the enemy, and constrained to fight with a thousand windings and turnings in and out, through a thousand crooked paths and doubtfull cranks, in a most confused medley, with great slaughter of his men: who not accustomed to this kind of fight, nor acquainted with the situation of the place, were in the skirmish driuen so farre, that downe they fell, and being not able to recouer themselves, were presently slaine. And thus with much adoe, he at length passed the strait of T O M A N I S. Hassan deeming himselfe much disgraced by suffering his enemies in number so farre inferiour, to haue done him so much harme, and so to haue escaped his hands: and farther, considering that in such places, sleights and stratagems more auaille than open forces; burning with desire of reuenge, would needs stay neere vnto those straights, as if it had been to refresh his wearied armie; but in deed to trie if the Persians would aduenture againe to trouble him, or no: and appointed Resuan Bassa with certaine bands of the souldiours of G R E C E, and of his owne aduenturers, to lie in ambush within the coverts of the strait, attentiuely to euerie stirre of the enemy. Two daies the Turkes armie lay thus diuided, and were now resolved the third day to remoue thence towards TEF LIS: when as the Persian captaines, Aliculi Chan and Simon, vainly imagining that this stay of the Turkes was for feare of the Persians, foolishly returned, and gaue a fresh onser vpon the flanke of Hassan's squadrons. VVho forthwith raising all his souldiours, and giuing a signe to Resuan, with all speed compassed in his enemies, and straightning them on both sides, tooke some of them aliuie, cut in pieces other some, and put the rest all to flight. Among others that were taken aliuie, was Aliculi Chan the Persian capitaine, who ouer rashly charging vpon the face of Hassan, fell into his hands. The next day following (being the eleuenth day after Hassan's departure from CHARS) he joyfully arrived at TEF LIS, where he found among the poore besieged Turkes, many miseries; whereof some were already dead, and some yet sicke: for they were so plagued with famine, that they not onely deuoured their horses, but euen the verie skins of the same horses, of sheepe and of dogs, and in such most miserable wants had passed the time: whom Hassan at his arrival comforted with gifts and good words, exhorting them to persist constant in the seruice of their king, whose honour (as he said) was neuer more than there to be respected. And for as much as the souldiours of the fort did with one voice request

Hassan

Hassan to appoint them a new Gouvernour, because they did all mislike Mahamet Bassa, who the last yeare was left by the Generall in that fort: Hassan remoued the said Mahamet, and put Amiet Bassa in his place: and so after he had filled vp the places of the dead souldiours with a new supply, and set all things in good order, he tooke his leaue, recommending the charge and custodie of that fortress to their trust and valour. Hassan returning from TEF LIS, and being without any trouble come to the strait of T O M A N I S, was aduertised by his scouts, that it was so strongly possessed by the enemy, and so shut vp with artillerie, as that it was not to be passed through: for Simon thinking (as in deed it fell out) that Hassan would returne that way, had so belaid that strait, as that the Turkes could not without most assured losse passe the same: which thing much troubled the Bassa, and filled his head with many conceits, how he might make his journey some other way, and decline the danger prepared for him. Thus perplexed, and altogether doubtfull what to doe, or which way to turne himselfe: Aliculi Chan the Persian (who to purchase his libertie could haue beene contented to haue done any thing) offered Hassan to shew him a short and safe cut, whereby he might without danger passe with his armie out of that troublesome countrey; yet couenanting before, that he should promise him to set him at libertie for his so good seruice: Which his request the Bassa did not sticke in large manner to promise, although he afterwards to his great dishonour performed not the same: so bending his journey on the right hand, he was guided by Aliculi through strange and vnknown waies out of those woods and dangers, not meeting so much as with any one of his enemies. But when the Persian duke well hoping for his libertie put the Turke in mind of his promise, he with deepe and fained sighs protested, That he was right sorie that he could not performe what he had promised to doe for him: for as much as it lay not in his power to set any man at libertie, that was taken in battell by the souldiours of his great lord and soueraigne: yet gaue him his faith, that so farre as his intreaties and fauours with the Generall Mustapha could preuaile, he would vse all the most earnest meanes he could to procure his libertie and returne to his owne countrey.

Simon the Georgian perceiuing that the Turkes were remoued, imagined forthwith, that they had taken this new way. But being afterward certified by his faithfull spies, that it was so indeed, he ran all headlong and as it were desperat to meet with this so happie an army. And all enflamed with rage for this great fortune of the Turkes, he fell vpon the taile of the Turkish host: which with vnmeasurable furie he wholly destroyed, leading away with him all the people, all the horses, and all the treasure of Mahomet Bassa, which he brought from TEF LIS, and all the treasure of Hassan Bassa likewise. As for Aliculi Chan, whom Simon most greedily fought for, he was sent away in the front of the armie, and so not to bee rescued. Hassan holding on his way came to CHARS in the space of eight dayes after his departure from TEF LIS, and there presented vnto Mustapha the Generall the Persian capitaine Aliculi, recounting vnto him the dangers he had endured, and whatsoever else had happened in that expedition. Aliculi the vnfortunat Persian was by the commaundement of Mustapha carried to ERZIRUM, and there in the castle committed to prison. Not long after Mustapha returned himselfe also to the said citie of ERZIRUM, with his armie fore weakened and discontented, which was there presently by him discharged.

About the same time that these things were in doing, Amurath to make a safer and more easie passage for his forces into GEORGIA, sent Fluzales his Admirall with a great fleet into the Euxine sea to M E N G R E L I A, called in auncient time C H O L C H I S, who entering the famous riuer of Phasis (now Fassa) there fortified, and layed such a beginning, that it is now one of the Turkes proud Beglerbegships, although those fortifications shortly after the departure of the Admirall, were for the present againe by the Mengrelians demolished. And this was the end of the stirres of this yeare 1579.

Of all these successes Mustapha afterwards sent aduertisements to the Court to Amurath, recounting vnto him the fortifying of CHARS, the deserts of Hassan, as well for the succouring of TEF LIS, as for the taking of Aliculi the Persian. And because the said Generall had the yeare before perswaded Amurath, That the country of GEORGIA and the people thereof were brought vnder his obedience, to the end he should not maruell at so many losses and so many battels, and thereby doubt of some false informations, he declared vnto him, That all these troubles were not raised by the naturall and homebred Georgians, but by two certaine captaines Aliculi and Simon sent out of P E R S I A, who had made all these stirres: of which one of them now remained with him in prison, for him to determine of at his pleasure. With great delight did the Turkish emperor

Amurath the third,

your read all that Mustapha had written, and by two of his gentlemen whither sent to Hasan a battle ax all guilt, and set full of stones, a targuer of gold and pearly, and a rich garment of cloth of gold, in reward of his good service for which hee greatly commended him; and withall gaue order, That Miculi should be kept where he was in the castle of ERZIRUM, in diligent and safe custodie.

These inuasions of the Turkes much troubled the Persian king in his court at CASBIN, considering that now they had both throughly acquainted themselves with all the passages into GEORGIA (in the difficultie and roughnesse whereof consisted the chiefe defence of that province) as also that diuers of the Georgian princes were more than inclining vnto the Turkes service: so that he could not but justly feare, that his enemies would in time begin to pierce into the noble cities of MEDIA the Greater, yea and peraduenture euē vnto TAVRIS before any of the rest: which his care of forreine inuasion was doubled with domestical feares. Mirize Salmas his chiefe Visier, and vpon whom he most rested, still filling his head with a jealous suspicion, That Abas Mirize his sonne (made Gouverneur of HERI by Tamas his grandfather) was about (in these troubles with the Turke) to proclaime himselfe king of PERSIA, to the great nominie of his father, and prejudice of Emir Hamze his eldest brother, the worthie and vndoubted heire of that great kingdome. This Mirize Salmas (according to his longing desire) had married a daughter of his to the said Emir Hamze with the consent of the king his father: but yet not content with that great honour, ceased not continually with ambitious deuises, to seeke out meanes how to bring to passe that the Persian estate might wholly remaine to his sonne in law, vndeuided and entire from the participation of his brethren: and therefore little regarding the perils that might happen from the Turkes, and blinded with the desire of his owne greatnesse, he went about to turne the king (being a man very credulous and inconsiderate) against Abas Mirize; either to take him and commit him to prison, or at least to bereaue him of all authoritie and commaund. And the better to persuaade the king thereunto, he discoursed vnto him how little Abas Mirize his sonne had respected him in diuers occasions; and that in these late wars, he had not so much as sent forth one man against the Turkes, but had forbidden such as were of his jurisdiction of HERI to come to CASBIN, at such time as they were summoned both by letters and commaundement to haue passed with Emir Hamze into SIRVAN; by reason whereof not one of them would stirre a foot, answering, That they were enjoined so to doe by Abas Mirize their lord: who had not onely caused himselfe to be called king of HERI, but had giuen it out, that he meant to claime the succession in the whole kingdome. These complaints much prevailed with the king, both in respect of the loue he bare to Emir Hamze his eldest sonne, and also of the credit he gaue to his Visier: especially being accompanied with the craftie packing of the said Visier; who as he was verie cunning in such practises of himselfe, so did he make them much more effectuell with the effeminate king by the meanes of diuers great ladies, and other deuises that were to him verie familiar and vsuall. Insomuch, that the king carried away with light beleefe, did continually bethinke himselfe how to find opportunitie to repress the boldnesse of his disobedient son: not forgetting for all that to make such preparation against the Turkes, as should be sufficient to stay their passage to TAVRIS, if they had any purpose so to doe. But leauing the Persian king to his troubled cogitations for a while, let vs againe returne vnto the Turkes General, the great Bassa Mustapha.

Constantinople.*

He now lying at ERZIRUM (after many troubles abroad) was surprisid and almost overwhelmed with vnexpected quarrels at home, many grieuous complaints being made of him to Amurath, whereby he was induced afterwards to take from him his Generallship, and to call him to the court to giue account of his actions. Which seemed not to be done without cause, he hauing before raised a great discontentment in the mind of Amurath, by sending such a strong power to the succours of TREBIZ, whereby he conjectured, that the affaires of GEORGIA, were not in such securitie as Mustapha had already enformed him they were; and also generally offended the minds of the souldiers of his armie, who all in an vpror affected him of improuidence and prodigalitie, for that now this second yeare he had with so much ado gathered together such a number of souldiers, to the trouble of the whole empire, and infinit charge of their lord, & yet performed nothing worthy the glorie of Amurath, or answerable to so great a charge. Which complaints, although they were of some moment, yet would the Turkish emperour for the great fauors he bare vnto him his antient tutor, neuer haue construed them so hardly against him,

as for the same to haue been induced to haue depriued him of his place, if the inueterat enuie of Sinan Bassa had not miniftred strength and force to these hard accusations, and set (as it were) an edge vpon Amurath to doe what he afterwards did.

But forasmuch as the course of time and processe of the present historie, bringeth now forth these two mightie champions of the Turkes together, the enuious competitor the one of the others honours; who liuing many yeares together, haue left the woofull remembrance of their greatnesse and valour vnto the world, but especially vnto the afflicted state of Christendome, the large wounds by them made, as it were, yet bleeding: stay with me a while, and without griefe if thou canst behold the liuely counterfeits of two so great enemies (who both liued within these few yeares, and the latter of them died but the other day) as they are by the skillfull hand of the cunning workman most perfectly described, and thus to be seene.

Or with sterner looks for to extoll the deeds by thee erst done:
For why the Transylvanian prince will take revenge of thee,
And swelling in thy greatest pride, enforce thee for to flee.

R. Knolls.

This Sinan was a most ancient enemy to Mustapha, and in all things thought himselfe his match: For if Mustapha had subdued CYPRVS, so had he conquered TRIPOLIS, GYLITTA, with the kingdome of TUNES in AFRICK: and if Mustapha were a man of great courage, and reuerend for his yeares, Sinan would be his equall both in the one and the other: yea and did not

A not sticke to thinke himselfe his better too, for that in the enterprise of GIAMEN in ARABIA, he performed such an exploit as Mustapha neither durst nor yet knew how to put in execution, so carrying away the glorie of that famous conquest: for which euer after there was betwene them a continuall heart burning, one of them enuying at the others glorie, and both in word and deed, as occasions fell out, in all things opposing themselves one against the other. At last happens this opportunitie for Sinan: who taking the occasion of the complaints of so many against Mustapha, caused a great number of them to frame their supplications to Amurath (which he for his part did in most malignant manner enforce and exaggerate against his old aduersarie) accusing him that this second yeare he had most manifestly shewed himselfe to haue gone vnto the warres not as a worthie Generall desirous of noble and honourable enterprises, but as a man that would make marchandise of blood, and of his souldiours payes; employing the most liberall prouision of corne and money not as rewards of well deserving men, nor to the erecting of such fabrickes as were needfull, and might haue bene built therewithall, but onely to his own proper gaine; so to enrich himselfe with his peoples losses, to the great shame of his lord, and consuming of the publicke treasure: adding hereunto, that if the things done by Mustapha were well searched, it would be found, that he had neglected many good opportunities, attempted many things in vaine, and not done any good either to the emperour or his souldiours, but onely to himselfe: whom rather than they would follow againe, as their Generall, all his people in an vprore shewed themselves readie, and willing to aduenture themselves in any other farre greater labour than by their lord and fouertaigne should be commaunded them.

C These and such like complaints, with the hard opinion already conceived against him by Amurath, were the occasion why he resolved to put him from his place. Beside that, he thought it a thing dangerous to his state, to suffer one and the selfsame Generall any long time to command ouer so great armies, deeming it not so much for his honour still to employ one man, as to shew that he had varietie and choice of subjects, worthe of so great a charge. And therefore being desirous to find out the truth of that was reported to him concerning Mustapha, he sent the cheefe of his gentlemen porters with fifteene others to bring him to the Court, with his Chancellor and Treasurer, to shew the accounts of such monies as he had receiued, and to giue vp an account of their whole office. Vnto this messenger had Amurath deliuered three diuers letters, which he should warily shew as occasion serued; one of them was so written of purpose, that Mustapha in the receiuing thereof might by the same messengers be strangled: in the second was the emperours warrant for the doing of that was to them commanded: and in the third was contained, that Mustapha should forthwith send his chauncellor and treasurer to the Court by those messengers. Mustapha in the meane time by diuers meanes, but especially by the guilt of his owne conscience, venting the displeasure of the emperour towards him, and suspecting (as the truth was) his life to be by those messengers sought after, at such time as the captaine porter came to his campe, found many delays to put him off, and would not in any case be spoken withall. But when the messenger would endure no longer delay, he was at length admitted to his presence, hauing a circle appointed for him, out of which he and his companions might not stirre or approach neerer vnto him, the Bassaes guard standing in armes round about him. The messenger perceiuing the Bassaes warinesse, wisely plucked forth the third letters, concerning the sending of his Chancellor and Treasurer to the Court. Then began the craftie old Bassa to find many excuses to haue delayed the matter: but being hardly pressed by the messenger, and seeing no other remedie, he with much difficultie deliuered them both, couenanting before with the messenger to haue both their liues spared: who comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, were forthwith clapt fast into the tower called IADICVLA, as there to haue bene seuerely examined of all the doings of the Bassa. But Mustapha after long delay comming at length to CONSTANTINOPLE the ninth of Aprill in the Spring following, and vsing the mightie and potent mediation of diuers great ladies and other his gracious friends in Court, preuailed so much in that corrupt government, as that he was againe at length receiued into the fauour of Amurath, without any further proceeding against him, his chauncellor, or treasurer, who by his meanes were afterwards also enlarged and set at libertie: yet was he neuer after admitted to those honours, which he persuaded himselfe were of right due vnto him, for his good and faithfull seruice of long time done to the Othoman emperours.

In this time that Mustapha was Generall at ERZIRVM, Muhamet the Visier Bassa was treacherously cherously slaine at CONSTANTINOPLE: after whom shortly after died also Achmet Bassa, who succeeded in his place: so that the said soueraigne dignitie, in honour next vnto the Turkish emperour, was by rightfull succession due to Mustapha the next Bassa; but that hee was not thought worthie of it by him that might and of right ought to haue graffied him therewith, as shall be a little hereafter declared, when we haue briefly set downe the sudden and strange death of the said Muhamet the Visier, worthie in all histories to be registred, as a mirror for all such as administer justice in so great place, to looke vpon.

The strange
great Visier Bassa Muhamet.

This Bassa, a man of as great fame as euer was any that had gouernment in the Orthoman empire, in the time that he all commaunded, had for some light causes depriued a certaine souldior of CONSTANTINOPLE of his yearely pension, which with many labours and dangers he had gotten to maintaine himselfe, which pension the Bassa bestowed vpon another souldior, so that the other poore soule remained in miserie, altogether vnprovided for. Vnto which miserable estate seeing himselfe now brought, and not guiltie to himselfe of any fault worthie so great punishment, he determined with himselfe to reuenge the iniurie with the blood of that great Bassa, and to bereaue him of life that had bereft him of liuing: which because he could not by any fit means put in execution (by reason of the guard of slaues that keepe the person of the Visier, so that no man can come neere him that holdeth that high place) except he could by some meanes acquaint himselfe in the Visiers house, and so insinuate himselfe into his acquaintance, he resolved to take vpon him the rude habit of those religious which the Turkes call Deruissars, and after their manner to present himselfe euery morning before the Visier to aske his almes: and so hee did, counterfeiting withall a certaine kind of follic and lightnesse of mind, as doe those Deruissars, to make the people beleue, that they contemne all worldly things; as men rauished onely with heauenly cogitations, which yet was by some that knew him thought to haue happened in him, through the greefe he had conceiued for the losse of his stipend. Muhamet not onely the first time, but also at all other times that this counterfeit hypocrite came before him, caused him to be comforted with his almes, and as it were with a kind of priuat stipend, enjoyed him euery morning to come vnto him into the Diuano, and there together with others appointed for the same purpose, to say his deuout prayers, and in singing praises to their wicked Prophet, to entreat God for his saluation: for it is a custome of all the noblemen, that at ordinarie houres of prayers all their priests assemble themselves in the Diuano, which is made readie for them, and there all together the infidell wretches doe with their vncleane mouthes mumble vp their superstitious prayers or rather most abhominable blasphemies. By this meanes did this dissembling companion so insinuate himselfe into the Visiers acquaintance, that the counterfeit foole went in and out of the Diuano at his pleasure, no man gaine saying either his going in or coming out, but dayly sat in the presence of the Visier, and so hauing said his prayers, and taken his almes, with all reuerence quietly departed. At last when the craftie hypocrite thought that the time was come wherein he might most fitly execute his purpose, hauing vtterly resolved with himselfe to die, so that he might satisfie the desire he had of reuenge, so long couertly fostered in his heart; hauing conueyed a very sharpe dagger secretly into one of his sleeces, he went according to his custome, to require his almes, with an assured resolution (when he had said his prayers, and reached out his hands to receiue his wonted almes) speedily to charge vpon the Visier, and with the dagger to strike him to the heart. According to the accustomed manner was the counterfeit hypocrite (for who would euer haue suspected so long and so traitorous a designement) admitted into the Diuano, where Muhamet the Visier sat in his house, to giue publike audience, and after the vsuall manner, before any of the suters that attended for answeres and dispatch of their businesse suspected any such deceit, he was admitted neere vnto the Visier, and sitting right against him, according to his old wont poured out those vaine deuotions which those hypocritical Barbarians vse to mumble vp in their prayers: which being finished, whilst the Visier simply reacheth vnto him his wonted almes, the traitorous villaine in receiuing it suddenly drew out his dagger, and once or twice stabbed it into the Visiers breast, out of which so deadly wounds gushed out his blood and life together. VVhereupon the standers by astonied with the strangenesse of the fact, ran in, but loe the old hoarie Visier lay all soyled in his owne blood, deadly pale, and breathing forth his last gaspe. The mischieuous murderer they presently laied hands vpon, and bound him fast: but the rumour of the strange fact did by and by sicke vnto the emperours eares: who suspecting that some of the other great Bassas desiring to mount into that high dignitie,

A had prouoked the traitor to doe this detestable act, would needs vnderstand of the traitorous murderer, VVhat occasion had moued him so treacherously to kill his Visier. VVho resolutely answered him, That he did it to deliuer the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE from the tyrannie of him, by whom he was vnderferedly depriued of his pension: But when he could get no other answer of him, he deliuered him into the hands of the slaues of the dead Visier, who with most exquisite torments put him to death.

Muhamet thus dead, after him succeeded Achmetes the next Bassa, who (as is before said) shortly after died also; so that it was now Mustapha his course to succeed in that chiefe roome, for that he was the third in the order of the Bassas. But when he had vsed all the meanes that he possibly could, to haue obtained that so honourable a place by order due vnto him; yet could he not find so much grace in the sight of Amurath his great lord, as to haue it granted him vnder seale, although in effect he made him sit as Visier, and all matters of state were brought vnto him as chiefe Visier: but in his stead the seale was sent to Sinan Bassa, who was now made Generall for the Persian wars. VVhich disgrace not a little discontented Mustapha, fearing least some other strange accident should in short time light vpon him.

After that Mustapha was thus displaced from his Generalship, Amurath nominated Sinan Bassa to be Generall in his stead for this expedition against the Persians, and for the preservation of CHARS and TIFLIS; giuing him soueraigne authoritie to commaund, and to set in order all such preparations as he should thinke necessarie for such enterprises as he should thinke good to attempt in his first yeare: who although by reason of his great fauour he grew haughtie and glorious, yet did he not forefellow to discourtse throughly with himselfe vpon all his designsments: and namely, beside the succouring of TIFLIS, he determined to build a fort at TOMANIS, to assure the passage thither from CHARS; and withall to attempt all the meanes he could to induce the Persian king to send embassadours for peace, with such conditions as should be acceptable to Amurath. VVith these and such like discourses did he busie himselfe whilst he was yet making preparation to set forwards towards ERZIRUM.

Of all these changes and alterations was the Persian king aduertised, as also that this new Turkish Generall Sinan was carefull, how this long warre might by some meanes be appeased and a good peace concluded. Vpon which occasion, and by the persuation of Lementogli the Georgian, and of Mirice Salmas his Visier, he was induced to send embassadours to CONSTANTINOPLE, to demand peace of Amurath. Vpon which resolution he dispatched Maxut Chan, (of some called Maxudes) his embassador, with direction that he should go to Sinan, and of him to receiue guides to conduct him to CONSTANTINOPLE with letters to Amurath, and as much as lay in him to labour for the pacifying of all these troubles: and in any case to conclude vpon it, so that he would be content with CHARS and TIFLIS. VVith these instructions the embassador departed, and at length arriued at CHARS, and so came to ERZIRUM, and was from thence conducted towards AMASTA. But when he came to SIVAS, he found Sinan the Generall there encamped, gathering together his armie for the execution of his designsments: for Sinan vpon the arrivall of Mustapha, departing from CONSTANTINOPLE the five and twentieth day of Aprill, was now come so farre on his way. Of the coming of this embassadour, the Turks receiued great joy, and newes thereof was in post sent by Cicala Bassa to the court. The Persian embassadour enformed Sinan of all that he had to treat with Amurath on the behalfe of king Mahamet; and laboured earnestly to persuaide him, of the equitie of the cause, and of his request: declaring vnto him, that for as much as both the nations were conjoynd vnder the law of Mahomet their common prophet (though there seemed some small difference not worth those troubles) it were a verie inconuenient thing for them to contend among themselves, and to seeke the ouerthrow or vtter destruction of one another: and that therefore he was in good hope to obtaine of Amurath this desired peace, if he had no other cause wherewith he found himselfe agrieved, as in truth he had not. VVherefore he besought the Generall, that he would with safe conuoy conduct him to Amurath, to the end that if it were possible these bloudie wars might take end; at the verie report whereof the rest of the world rejoiced, and stood attentiuely waiting to see what would be the issue thereof.

This embassadour, Sinan entertained after the best manner the rudenesse of his nature would afford: and thinking that the verie fame of his valour, had wrought in the minds of his enemies this resolution to come to demand peace, granted vnto the embassadour a sure conuoy to conduct duct him to CONSTANTINOPLE; and wrote to Amurath in his letters, all that he thought was fit to be demanded, representing vnto him what great and important matters (he hoped) might now be obtained. But before he dismissed the said embassadour, he aduised him not to go to Amurath, without resolution to offer vnto him some great good conditions, and to yeeld vnto him all that countrey which he by force of armes had before conquered: for he knew the mind of Amurath verie well, that hee was resolu'd in himselfe, not to yeeld so much as one hand breadth of that ground which he had woon with the sword. Which motion of the proud Bassa so troubled the embassadour, that fearing he should not be able to conclude any thing, he stood in doubt whether to proceed on his journey to CONSTANTINOPLE, or to returne back againe into PERSIA: but considering better what belonged to his duetie in so waighie a businesse, and hoping to receiue more reasonable conditions from the mouth of Amurath himselfe; he gaue large words to Sinan, and so with a safe conuoy departed from SIVAS, and by long journeyes came to SCYTARI, and so passing ouer that little strait, the fourth of August arrived at CONSTANTINOPLE.

The preparation of the Persian king against the Turkes.

The Persian king in the meane time, stirred vp with the report of the Turkes preparations; to cause it to be noised, that he likewise intended some important matters, commaunded all the Chans and Gouvernours of his kingdom, to meet together with all their forces at TAVRIS, where he himselfe with the prince Emir Hamze his sonne met them. And after many consultations there had for the repressing of the Turkish inuasion (for as yet it was not certainly knowne what Sinan meant to attempt) he resolu'd to send souldiours into GEORGIA towards TRBES, whither of necessitie succours must be sent by the Turkes to them of the fort: and withall, determind also to go himselfe with all his armie from TAVRIS to CARACACH, a place verie commodious and neere to guard both TAVRIS and SIRVAN, being situat euen in the midst betwene the one and the other; and there to expect the remouing of Sinan, whose ambitious nature the king knowing, doubted that he to surmount Mustapha, would attempt some great enterprise, yea peradventure to run euen vpon TAVRIS. But when it came to the point that hee should send some of his captaines into GEORGIA, he made choise of such as had best experience of those countries, and were neere vnto them: with whom he sent Tocomac also, and the rest whose seruice he had before vsed against the Turkes; commaunding them to joinetheir forces with Simon the Georgian, and by all meanes possible to annoy the enemy: whom if they should perceiue to bend for TAVRIS, they should not faile to follow him; to the end they might joine together with him, and so encounter the enemies armie. All those captaines were resolute men, and led with them ten thousand souldiours; which being joyned with them of GEORGIA, amounted to the number of thirtene thousand: who arriuing at GENOB, gaue knowledge to Simon of their comming, and that in his behalfe they were readie to doe great matters.

Now was the Persian embassadour with all due honour receiued at CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was honourably entertained by the great Bassas of the court, but especially by Mustapha, who within two daies after suddenly died; of a surfeit taken of eating too much of muske Melons, and immoderat drinking of Zerbet (a kind of pleasant drinke which the Turkes vse, made of water and sugar): but most men thought him to haue poisoned himselfe, as fearing the former indignation of Amurath to be againe enflamed by the new complaints of the Persian embassadour against him, for that he in the time of his Generallship had dishonourably suppressed certaine embassages sent from the Persian king; which he now fearing to be called in question for, the former stormes as yet scarce well appeased, made himselfe now away. After his death it was commonly reported, that if he had longer liued he should haue been vndoubtedly strangled: which to preuent, he became the worthie executioner of himselfe, that had most vnjustly caused others to be most shamefully murthered. Which was the more like to be true, and the rather beleueed, for that the infinit wealth he had of long time scraped together, was immediatly after his death taken into the kings treasures, some small portion thereof being left vnto his nephews: a most certaine token of Amuraths indignation against him. The Persian embassadour hauing audience the seauenth of August, with many liuely reasons and much eloquence, perswaded the Turkish emperor to desist from the warre begun, as contrarie to the will and pleasure of their common Prophet Mahomet: as also to the peace, which was so royally, and with so many capitulations, not long before concluded betwene Tamas and Solyman his grandfather; and was not to haue been broken and warres raised, but vpon some great quarrell or iniurie done; which the Persians

A Persians had not at any time offered, but had alwaies wished vnto him all happinesse; as they had manifestly declared, by sending vnto him an embassage to that purpose by Sultan Tocomac: whereby he might plainly perceiue, the good mind and zeale the Persian king had for the maintenance of the peace. And although in the short raigne of Ismael, there was some rumour raised that he meant to go vnto BABELONIA, and some such like newes: yet that was but a youthfull part; and an effect of that heat which is commonly proper to such as being kept long in straight prison, cannot vse their libertie with moderation, and had therefore receiued due punishment for it, by sudden and v unexpected death. But as for the king that now is, he did above all others embrace amitie with his majestie; and therefore did most earnestly desire, that it would please him to temper his anger conceived, which had incensed him to take vp armes against a king so much his friend, being of the same religion, and better affected towards him than all the rest of the nations in the world.

This embassadour the Turkish emperor dismissed without any resolution at all; but onely gaue order, that whatsoeuer he had to say touching this peace, he should communicate it with his Visier. Many were the discourtesies that happened; for that the Turke required all those cities and countries, which till that time he had conquered with the sword, or (as their proud manner of phrase is) whereon his Generals horse had trod, to be yeilded again vnto him; and the embassadour on the other side, had no warrant from his king to yeeld any more than that part of GEORGIA which is on this side the river of Araxis. Whereupon the said embassadour began to feare, lest he should be suspected for a spie, and so be quill intreated: wherewithall he did find himselfe too manifestly charged by the hard speech that the Visier vsed towards him. Being thus doubtfull whereupon to resolute, perceiuing himselfe strained to the grant of these demaunds, and receiuing also some threatnings withall, he determined with himselfe to enlarge his speeches with the Visier in diuers and fundie particularities, and to giue him good hope, that he should be able to perswade with his king, the yeelding vp of so much as Amurath had and did demand. Hereupon was Maxut Chan the embassadour in friendly manner and without any outrage sent from CONSTANTINOPLE to CHARS; and commission giuen to Sinan (then at CHARS) that without delay, and with all fidelitie, he should cause the embassadour to be conducted to VAN, and from thence into PERSIA; wheresoever he did desire: all which was faithfully performed.

But to returne againe to Sinan the Generall, who from SIVAS had sent the said embassadour to CONSTANTINOPLE (as is before declared): and being departed thence, arriued at ERZIVAN, where he tooke a turney of his armie, and other prouision necessarie for this expedition; and so from thence was now come to CHARS; from whence he dispatched the Persian embassadour, much discontented that no other conclusion for peace could be wrought.

Maxut Chan at last arriuing at the Persian Court, reported vnto the king all that had happened in this his embassage: the summe whereof was, That Amurath would not condescend to any condition of peace, vnlesse the whole countrey of SIRVAN might be yeilded vnto him, for that he had once (as he said) conquered the same. Neither did the same embassadour forbear to tell the king, the suspicion Amurath had conceived of him, to haue been a spie rather than an embassadour; and of the large promises he was faine to make to the Turke, to auoid the manifest danger of imprisonment or death: all which for all that, now lay in his majesties power to performe or not. The king for the present remained well satisfied with that Maxut had done, and in reward of his great trauell and expences, gaue him the charge of the chamber at TAVRIS, naming him the chamberlaine of that rich and great citie. Of which new office (though verie honourable and of great importance) he tooke small pleasure, for that one Emir Chan his auntient enemy was chiefe Gouvernour of that citie, from whom he feared some dangerous treacherie: wherefore he appointed his depute for the execution of the office, and withdrew himselfe from TAVRIS to CASSANGICH, a place of his owne, there to passe away the time vntill it should please the king otherwise to dispose of him. But Emir Chan, who still nourished in his mind the auntient hatred he had conceived against him, tooke this as a most fit occasion to bring him into disgrace with the king: certifying him, That Maxut not contented with the great preferment it had pleased him to bestow vpon him, had in contempt of his rewards abandoned TAVRIS, and substituted in his place a most base person to represent the kings majestie and to mannage his treasure: and that he absented himselfe farre from that citie and the court there, hauing withdrawne himselfe into the confines of TYRKIE, no doubt for some mischievous intent, either to yeeld himselfe vnto them, or els to haue intelligence with them, and was like ynough to be guiltie to himselfe of the great errour he had already committed, by offering STRVANTO the Turkish king; and making promise of so large conditions, whereby he had obtained such a sure and safe conuoy to conduct him; when as he had before discovered himselfe to be a fauourer of the Turks, and a traitor to his owne king: and that therefore it were good to make triall of his inclination, and so peradventure to decline some great mischeefe, tending to the danger of the Persian state. This malicious accusation slyly contriued, so wrought in the mind of the suspicious king, that he commaunded Emir Chan secretly to apprehend Maxur, and to bring him to the Court, and (if he could not by other meanes) then by torture to wrest from him the truth of all these matters. Glad was Emir to haue his enemie thus put into his hands, and thought it long, vntill he had brought this shame vpon Maxur: who hauing already heard some iuckling thereof, resolved with himselfe to doe any thing, rather than to fall into the power of his hatefull enemie. And therefore at such time as fifteene tall fellows were for that purpose sent vnto him from Emir Chan, who in the kings name summoned him to the Court, he without making any shew that he took the matter otherwise than well, entertained them courteously, and made them great chere: but when he perceiued them to be overcome with sleepe, which crept vpon them by reason of the excesse wherewith they had ouercharged themselves, he caused them to be straightly bound, and with long cords hanged them downe into a deepe well, and there shut them vp secretly covered. Then gathering together the most precious things he had in his house, and setting his wiues, his children, his brethern, and nephewes on horsebacke, fled with all his familie in the euening, and the next day arrived at SALMAS, and was there friendly welcommed by Cicala Bassa, and from thence conveyed to VAN, where he was also courteously welcommed by Cicala Bassa, and honourably accompanied, sent to Sinan the Generall, who very glad of his coming, sent him with all diligence to CONSTANTINOPLE to Amurath. And this was in effect the end of the first enterparlance of peace betwixt the Persians and the Turkes.

flung vnto the Turkes.*

Sinan remained at CHARS eight dayes, and there againe surueyed his armie and prouision; and afterwards set forward towards TOMANIS, with resolution there to build a fort. But being come thither, he could by no meanes put that his designement in execution, by reason of the immoderate raine, which continually by the space of eight dayes fell in such abundance, as that neither did the Sunne appeare, or the skie cleare. Beside that, Sinan greatly feared lest the enemie taking the opportunitie of this raine, of the straight, and of the building, should assault his armie, and finding it in euill plight and out of order, greatly endamage it: Wherefore casting off his former determination for fortifying at TOMANIS, he remooued thence, to carrie succours to TEFIS. But as soone as he was risen with his armie, and past the strait, Tal-Ogli capitaine of the Ianizaries of DAMASCO, and Homar Sanzack of SAFFRO, hauing receiued secret intelligence that hard by a little out of the way, was good store both of corrie and cattell, resolved with themselves to goe thither to fetch in that bootie: and so with two thousand souldiours greedie of prey they set forward. Now Sinan the Georgian and the Persians, following the Turkes armie afare off, had deuised his souldiours into all such places as where there was either corrie, or water, or any such thing as might allure the Turkes to scatter themselves from the campe: and perceiuing these hungrie Turkes carelessly to run headlong to lay hold on this desired bootie, he suddenly fell vpon them, and cut them in pieces, being disordered, so that of those two thousand escaped but Tal-Ogli the capitaine of the Ianizaries onely, Homar the Sanzacke, and all the rest being left dead vpon the ground.

Sinan holding on his way, in two dayes came to TEFIS, where presently he called a counsell of all the cheefe men of his armie, taking order, That euery man vpon his oath should depose the truth touching the greatnesse of TEFIS: which he did onely in reproch of Mustapha the great Bassa, who most vtually had enforced Amurath, That it was as great and populous as DAMASCO; whereas in truth it was not in any respect to be compared vnto that so famous a citie. After that he deuised the treasure and succours he had brought amongst the souldiours of the fortresse, chearing them vp with good words and promises of great matters. And because the souldiours there in garrison complained greatly against the Bassa their capitaine, he caused a bill of complaint to be framed against him, and finding him guiltie that he had conuerted the souldiours pay to his owne vse, he condemned him to the restitution thereof, and so immediately discharging him of his office, placed in his roome Giusuf Bey, a lord of GEORGIA, who for the ancient enemie betweene him and Sinan, had yeelded himselfe to the Turkes, and was of them so welcommed, that Sinan trusted him with the custodie of that fort, which with so many dangers had bene maintained and defended till that day.

All things thus set in order at TEFIS, Sinan with his armie departed thence, and hauing Sinan departed againe passed the strait of TOMANIS, there came vnto him Mustaffa Bassa, afterwards gouernour of ALERPO, declaring vnto him, That not farre off was great store of corrie and cattell, and no bodie but only a few Georgians to keepe the same; and therefore wished him to send forth some few of them, whereof though it had bene much more, his armie then stood in great need. Sinan was well affected vnto this Mustaffa; and therefore the easilier endued by him to send for the aforesaid bootie: but moued with the fresh remembrance of that which had happened to Tal-Ogli and Homar, he gaue order, That to fetch in this corrie and cattell there should goe out ten thousand horsemen and their seruants, among whom was also the same Mustaffa as their Generall. Now stood Tosomac, Simon, and the other Persian captaines in secret ambush, waiting when any of the Turkes should come to fetch in this bootie. Whereupon the aforesaid souldiours being now come, as they desired, and hauing almost charged all their mules and horses with that which best pleased them to make choice of: the hidden Persians all on a sudden issued out of their lurking places among them, and with great slaughter put them to flight, and with such furie pursued the victorie, that they slew of them seuen thousand, carried away many prisoners alieue, and the mules and horses laden with the stolne bootie. Mustaffa was the first that fled, and the first that brought the vnhappie news of that ouerthrow to Sinan: which was forthwith confirmed by the report of such as had by speedie flight escaped the furie of the enemie. Whereupon Sinan dispatched away the Bassa of CARAMANIA with a great power, charging him wherefoeuer he should find the enemie, to set vpon him; and presently rising himselfe with his whole campe, followed the said Bassa. But all too late, for the Persians after the aforesaid victory without staying had withdrawne themselves into their strong places, knowne onely to such as were well acquainted with the difficult passages of GEORGIA: and hauing there disposed of their prey, were now returning to await some fresh occasion of new slaughter. But when they detected the whole armie of the Turkes vpon the rising of a certaine hill, they were afraid to meet them, yea and stood in some doubt also, lest Sinan should descend from the hill, and so assault them: for which cause they retired themselves againe into the strength of the mountaines: yet not with such speed, but that the Turkes ouertooke some few of them, and slew about fiftie or threescore of them, whose heads in signe of triumph they carried a good part of their way vpon the points of their speares: and tooke prisoners about threescore and ten more.

At last Sinan with all his armie hauing passed these dangerous places of GEORGIA, arrived at TRALEA, where it was told him, That the Persian king in person himselfe being already departed from TAVRIS, with an exceeding great army was coming to bid him battell. At which news he caused proclamation to be presently made through all his armie, That euery man should put himselfe in readinesse for the voyage to TAVRIS, whether he himselfe meant to go to meet with the king his enemie. In the meane time (as is reported) he dispatched certaine posts to the Persian king, then at CARACACH, to entreat him to send another embassadour to Amurath for peace, thinking by that meanes (as some doe conjecture) to remoue the king from the resolution of coming to assaile him, if he had any such meaning. After this proclamation made, he descended into the open and large plains of CHILDA, where presently he mustered his whole armie, and gaue it out, That before he would set forward toward TAVRIS, he would make triall of the readinesse and nimblenesse of his souldiours, in such sort, as if they should presently ioyne battell with the enemie: which without further delay he put in execution the next morning, formally raising his whole armie in order of battell; and then sending out some few others, to shew themselves vpon the top of certaine hills, as if they had been enemies that came to seize vpon his armie; he caused all his attillerie to be discharged, and commanded euery man to skirmish and bestirre himselfe, altogether after the same manner as if the enemie had bene there present before them: where the thundering of the great and small shot, the thicke stormes of arrowes, with the brightnesse of the armour and weapons, yeelding forth lightenings as if it had bene fierie beames, and the noise of drums and trumpets and other instruments of warre, with the signes of blew and yellow flying in the wind, made such a medley of all things, as if it had been the tumult of a very battell indeed. In the end he caused the retreat to be sounded: and then setting setting all his armie in order againe, made the like shew the second time, and so the third time also: which was indeed performed with the great scorn and derision of his souldiors, who deemed it rather childrens play, than any commendation to the proud Bassa. These counterfeits shewes of warre thus finished, yet did he not set forward toward TAVRIS, as he had given it out, but layred eight dayes in those plaines of CHILDER. At which time there arrived out of PERSIA one Aider the Aga, as an embassadour from the king, who was by Sinan with great joy entertained. Divers were the things by this embassadour propounded, such as had Maxim Chan before: but the conclusion of all was, that the Persian king would be content voluntarily to relinquish CHARS and TEBLIS, and so remaine (as he did before) in amitie with Amurath, and so desired Sinan to conclude a peace with his master if it might be: as for himselfe, this message done, he was presently to returne into PERSIA. For this peace Sinan promised to deale with Amurath, so that the Persian king would send another embassadour to CONSTANTINOPLE. Upon which conclusion the said Aider returned into PERSIA, and at TAVRIS declared to his king what he had seene, what promises he had receiued of Sinan, and withall exhorted him to send a new embassadour vnto the Turkish Court. After this, when the publike rumour of the comming of the Persian king, was found to be false, Sinan in stead of going to TAVRIS returned to CHARS, where he idelly stayed a whole month with the generall inarcelling and murmuring of all his armie, astonished to see themselves (to the great charges of their king and the disturbance of his whole kingdome) brought forth not for any honourable conquest, but as it were only of purpose to make a vaine shew of warre.

to ERZIRUM, and

At last he departed from CHARS, for that now Winter was come on; and the frosts and snows did his armie great harme: and so comming to ERZIRUM, there presently dismissed every man to goe and winter in his owne countrey, but remained still himselfe in the same citie: from whence he by speedie posts diligently enformed Amurath of the succours he had left at TEBLIS, of the losses he had receiued from the enemy, of all that which was by Mustapha misreported, of the comming of the Persian embassadour to him, of the promise made vnto him touching a new embassadour; and to be short, of all his whole actions. Besides all this, he aduertised Amurath, That the enterprise of PERSIA was a very hard, long, and difficult matter, and such a one as needed another manner of preparation than had bene as yet appointed for it: and that if he desired to subdue PERSIA, it were then very necessarie that he should speake with him at large, and discourse vpon many particularities, which could not so well without exceeding tediousnesse be declared by writing. After that he sent other messengers also to sollicite Amurath for his returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, continually telling him, That it was not possible for him to signifie by writing, what he purposed to report to him by word of mouth, for the better accomplishing of the enterprise begun. Nothing in the world did Sinan abhorre more than this warre, hauing his mind altogether bent against the affaires of the Christians in EUROPE, and therefore sought by all meanes possible for the diuerting of those warres from the East into some other quarters. At last he wrought so much, he entreated so much, he writ so many letters, and sollicitated the matter so earnestly, that Amurath was perswaded to send for him to CONSTANTINOPLE, as soone as euer he was certified of the arriual of the new embassadour from PERSIA, of whom Sinan had before aduertised him: for he was resolu'd either to grow to a peace with the said embassadour, if he came with honourable conditions; or if he came not, or that after his comming they could not agree vpon the peace, then to put in execution those his conceits, wherof he must needs in particular talke with Sinan by word of mouth. At length the promised embassadour called Ebraim Chan, a man of great eloquence, and highly honoured in PERSIA, came to Sinan; whereof Sinan gaue present intelligence to Amurath, beseeching him againe to permit him to come to CONSTANTINOPLE: which his request Amurath then graunted. Whereupon Sinan forthwith returned to the Court, where he attended the vniuersall government of the whole empire. At his first comming to the presence of Amurath (wherein hee discoursed not with him of any thing, but of the comming of the Persian embassadour) the conditions were set downe which they were to require for the reducing of the capitulations of this peace to a good end. After which agreement the embassadour (being now come, and most magnificently receiued in CONSTANTINOPLE) had audience: at which time he with much glorious speech laboured to perswade Amurath, That his king had a most ardent desire to be reconciled vnto him, and to joyne his forces with his against the enemies of the Mahometane religion, and that for that purpose

A purpose he was now especially come thither: which his good purpose, if it were answered with like zeale on his part, there would thereof ensue the greatest vnitie and friendship that euer was betwene any Mahometane princes. Whereunto Amurath gaue him no other answer, but that he should thereof talke with his Visier, and with him enreat of all matters concerning the peace: and so he was by Amurath entertained and dismissed, both at one time.

Now had Amurath called to CONSTANTINOPLE his eldest sonne Mahomet (who afterward succeeded him in the empire) being then about sixteen yeares old, to circumsise him according to the custome of the Turkes; following therein the inueterat law of the Hebrewes. Vnto which solemnitie, many Christian princes were solemnly inuited; who accordingly sent thither their embassadours with great gifts and presents, in token of peace and confederacie, namely, Rudolphus the emperour, Henrie the third the French king, Stephen king of POLONIA: the State of VENICE, the king of PERSIA, the Moore kings of MAROCCO and FES, the princes of MOLDAVIA, VALACHIA, and others. With all triumph and joy was the circumcision of this young prince solemnised, by the space of fortie daies & fortie nights, in the great market place of CONSTANTINOPLE, where all the embassadours aforesaid had their scaffolds prepared and furnished according to their degrees and states, and receiued such entertainment as might be shewed at such a kind of barbarous spectacle: Only the Persian embassadour, who had also his scaffold seuerall to himselfe, but not regarded as the rest, rejoyced not at these feasts and triumphs: for among fundrie other wrongs and scornes done by the commaundement of Amurath vnto the Persian nation (as by hanging vp of certaine counterfeits pictures of Persians made of laths and sticks, and then burning them, and in many scornfull sorts abusing them) the Turkes, for the great displeasure he had conceiued for the harme done to Osman Bassa and the Turkes in SIRVAN much about that time, and for the disdain he had taken against Ebraim Chan (as one not condescending to the conditions of peace which he expected, nor yielding to any more than the other embassadour had done before, seemed to haue come as a spie to marke the Turkish affaires, or to mocke Amurath, rather than to put in execution any good matter to pacifie the minds of the two mightie princes) commaunded the standing before appointed for him, in disgrace of him to be cast downe, and himselfe with all his followers to be shut vp as close prisoners in the house of Mahamet Bassa at CONSTANTINOPLE: where he was so straightly kept, that though an hundred of his followers there died of the plague, which shortly after began D to wax hoat in the citie, yet could he not obtaine so much fauour as to be removed to some other place, but there was enforced to tarry it out, vntill that afterward order was taken, he should be carried thence as prisoner to ERZIRUM. To end these solemnities, Mahomet the young prince was circumsised, not publicly, but in his fathers chamber, by Mechmet one of the inferiour Bassas, sometime the emperour Solymans barber.

Now whilst Sinan as great Visier sat commaunding in CONSTANTINOPLE, the garrisons in CHARS and TEBLIS (kept in by the enemy, and hauing receiued none other reliefe than a little which Sinan before his departure from ERZIRUM had by good hap caused to be secretly conuaid vnto them) were thought to be driuen to great wants. Which thing Sinan right well knew, and fearing least those two places which had with so much adoe bene both gained and maintained, should for want of new succours fall againe into the hand of the enemy: hee both boldly and freely counsell'd Amurath, to send a new garrison to VAN for the safetie of the countrey thereabouts; and then vnder the conduct of some valiant captaine, to send succours to TEBLIS. Vpon which point Amurath asked Sinan his opinion, and willed him to bethinke himselfe of some fit man. Hereupon Sinan propounded diuers vnto him, but none of them pleased him; for why, he was before resolu'd, in despite of Sinan and of his counsell, to bestow this charge vpon Mahamet Bassa, nephew to Mustapha the late Bassa, and for his sake hated of Sinan. This Bassa Mahamet he sent to ERZIRUM, with the title of the Bassa of that province; honouring him withall with the name of Generall of the armie for TEBLIS. And presently gaue commaundement to Hassan the Bassa of CARABIT, to Mustapha sometime called Manvethiar the Georgian, to all the Sanzacks, the Curdi, and the souldiors of ERZIRUM, that they should resort to the stander of Mahamet their Generall, and so to follow him to TEBLIS. Whereupon there assembled together out of all the said places about fise and twentie thousand souldiors, with all things necessarie for the reliefe of the distressed garrison in TEBLIS. Commandement was also giuen to the Bassas of ALEPPO and MARAS, to repaire to VAN with all their souldiors, souldiors, and there to abide till Winter: which they accordingly did, not molested nor troubled by any enemy.

In the end of August Mahamet Bassa departed from Erzurum, with the Bassa of Carabmit and all his armie, carrying with him money, corne, and all other things needfull for the reliefe of Teflis: and in eight daies came to Chars, and from thence to Archelech, not troubled by any. At Archelech he found Mustapha (otherwise called Manuchiar the Georgian) with all his souldiors, whom the Generall most joyfully entertained and honoured with gifts: and withall admonished him to continue in his obedience to Amurath, and to conduct him with his armie the shortest and safest way to Teflis: for that some were of opinion, that it were best to go by Tomanis, and some other by the way of Mustapha his countrey: wherein Mustapha did readily resolve him, that the easiest and shortest way lay through his owne countrey, being also in his opinion the safest. This counsell of Mustapha pleased Mahamet greatly, so that he made choise of him to be the guide of his armie, reposing himself wholly vpon his good direction: and so departed thence towards Teflis, passing through Altynchala, and Carachala, both belonging to the said Georgian, abounding with all things necessarie for the sustenance of man, neither were they euer disturbed by any enemy. Having passed Mustapha his countrey, they came to a friendly castle called Gori, from whence they discovered in certaine fields a great armie of the Georgians, mingled with Persians, but apparelled after the manner of Georgia: these were those captaines of Parsia, sent from the Persian king (as in other yeares before) to aid the Georgians; who secretly conioyned with Simon Chan the Georgian, had changed their apparell, because the treatie of peace should not be disturbed, and their king accounted vnjust of his word; who vnder the colour of a treatie of peace, whiles Amurath attended nothing else but to succour and defend his conquered countries, without purpose to annoy any other places, went about to procure the destruction of the Turkes. These then as soone as they saw the Turkish armie, and perceived that they also themselves were by them defied, sent Heralds vnto them with haughtie words of defiance, and to offer them battell. With great griefe of mind did the Bassa receive this proud defiance; but hauing no other purpose but onely to bring his succours safe to Teflis, he dismissed the Heralds, and studied by all meanes he could to shun battell. That euening he was fauoured in his purpose by the great and continuall raine which then fell, and serued for a reasonable excuse of his delay: but the next day prouing faire, and the Sunne shining bright, both the armies marched in sight the one of the other all day, vntill about foure houres and an halfe before night; at what time the Turkes arrived neere to a riuer that separated the one armie from the other. There the Bassa fell in consultation with Mustapha, whether they should passe over the riuer before night, or stay on that side they were vntill the next morning. In which case Mustapha aduised him to stay, as fearing least the enemy should set vpon the armie disordered in passing the riuer, and so annoy them. Notwithstanding the Generall disliked this aduise of Mustapha, hauing taken a strong conceit, euen vpon the first discouerie of the enemy, that there was some intelligence and compact betwene Mustapha and the Persians, and that to that end he had maliciously persuaded him to come that way, and not by the way of Tomanis: & therefore the Bassa thinking, that if there were any such plot laied between Mustapha and the enemy, to set it in some confusion, would not in any case follow the counsell of the suspected Georgian, to stay that night; but commanded, that with the greatest speed that might be, all his souldiors with their treasure & corne should passe ouer the riuer; to the end that before night he might on the other side of the riuer encampe his armie in some good place, to the some aid and derision of his enemies. Mahamet his lieutenant, a bold yong man and an hardie, was the first that ventured ouer, and after him the carriages of money and of corne, and then the whole armie, with such speed, that some of the confused multitude were drowned in the passage, being rather troden downe with the horses and camels, than brought to their deaths either by the depth of the channell or swiftnesse of the riuer.

As soone as the Georgians perceived that the Turkes had passed the riuer, without any staying vntill they might settle themselves in any good order, they in great hast and furie ran vpon them, and presently assailed them whiles they were yet all in confusion and out of order: by reason whereof, the Turkes, although they turned their faces vpon their enemies, and made some good resistance, yet in short time you might haue scene the banks of the riuer in many places stained with the Turkish blood, and many carcases of the Turkes here and there scattered, without any apparant

Mahamet Bassa refused battell offered by the Georgians and Persians.

A apparant losse among the Georgians and Persians. Amongst them that fell in this slaughter, were a number of Sanzackes, of the Curdi, and Mesopotamians; which the rest perceiuing, and by the ouerthrow of their owne conjecturing the losse of others, turned their backs and fled: the like did the remnant of the Mesopotamians, and after them at last the whole armie: whom the Georgians pressed so fore in their flight, that many of the Turkes seeing no other way to escape, cast themselves into the riuer, and so (though hardly) escaped with their liues. Great was the shame, great was the confusion, but greatest was the losse they recciued; for that in the heat of the battell the kings money and corne was taken by the Georgians and Persians, euer man sauing onely so much for himselfe as he could secretly hide vpon his owne bodie, or conuie by the meanes of some trustie slaue, which by the helpe of their swift horses was preferred rather by fortune than by valour.

The Turkes thus discomfited and spoyled of their reliefe, the next morning gathered themselves together againe, one with another cursing the heauens, their king, and their aduerser fortune: some of them also threatening the Georgian renegade Mustapha, as though all this mischief had happened through his treacherie and secret intelligence with the enemy. Notwithstanding, when they found that they had still remaining so much money and other casements as might suffice to comfort the afflicted minds of the souldiors, besieged in the fort, they resolved to hold on their way towards Teflis, and in their journey used such speed, that the day following they arrived there in the euening. But when they of the fort saw their friends, whom they had so long expected, arrived in such bad sort, and so euill furnished, they were astonished, and wonderfully grieved at this common losse, and all in a confusion protested to Mahamet, That they would abandon the place, if they had not forthwith necessarie prouision made for them. But the Generall after he had with large promises mitigated their first furies and insolencies, presently in the morning caused a Diuano or counsell to be called in the castle, where hauing gathered together all the cheefe men in his armie, he spake vnto them in this manner:

For as much as it hath pleased God, that so great and important an occasion of victorie, which was offered vnto vs for the honour and glorie of euery one of vs, is now fallen out so unfortunately, that it hath not only not ministered vnto vs any matter of triumphing ouer our enemies, as we should haue done, but rather hath made them (I know not how) to carrie away from vs both the triumph, and also our armour, our horses, our slaues, and our spoiles; yea and (the remembrance whereof doth most grievously trouble and afflict me) our Sultans money, and our publicke munition and forces solemnly delivered to our conduct, is now become a bootie and prey vnto them; that the honour which might haue made euery one of vs famous among noble and valourous souldiors, is now fallen from our foreheads, and to our great detriment doth adorne the heads of strangers, or rather of our enemies; and that notwithstanding all this, we are now come to those courageous souldiors, which with their great valour haue defended this fort, euen in the midst of their enemies weapons and trecheries; and to whom we should yeeld that aid and reliefe, which the vertue of euery one of their minds doth deserue, and which king Amurath had put into our hands to bring hither vnto them: there is now no remedie, but to resolve vpon some good meanes, that we fall not wholly into the utter disgrace of our lord and king and that is, To maintaine these souldiors in the custodie and defence of this fort: and though it be with all our owne wants and all our owne dishonors, to comfort these that haue so long time looked for vs, and so well deserved all manner of reliefe. We cannot excuse our selues, that our enemies were better than we either in number or instruments of warre, for both in the one and the other we were farre beyond them; neither yet can we say, that they set vpon vs by night, or at vnawares: for when we saw their number, their weapons, their horses, and finally their approach, and their manner of assault, yet wee would needs passe ouer the riuer, and ioyne battell with them: which we now know hath fallen out very lamentable to vs, because we were more readie to take our flight than to endure the fight, and to use our feet than to occupie our hands. And therefore it is very requisite, as well to satisfy the rigor of iustice, as to performe the dutie of souldiors, that we suffer not our lord and king to loose his money, which he trusted into our hands, and which we haue lost, not by greater strength, nor by any trecherous stratageme of our enemies, but by our owne too too important feare, and too base a regard of our liues, before which it was the dutie of euery one of vs, to haue preferred the care of honour. For if by fighting and courageous sustaining the assaults of our enemies, though they had bene stronger and better armed than we, this misfortune had happened vnto vs, and that we could in any sort haue represented the the king and the world an honourable and bloudie battell, we should not now have had any need to seeke G meanes how to repay this losse, and to restore the thing that violently was taken from us by such as were more mightie than our selues, and these honourable souldiors also should more easily haue dis-gested with us this lamentable calamitie. But we haue lost that money, and in very deed haue as it were willingly bestowed it vpon the Georgians and Persians to redeme our liues and to saue us from their furie, are bound to repay it, or els for euer hereafter to be challenged as lawfull debtors to the king for it. And therefore my good friends and companions, if you will take a good course, let every one of us, without any further consultation put his hand into his priuat purse (if he haue not foolishly cast that also into the hands of the rauensome enemy) and with our owne money let us succour the ne-cessitie of these men, and haue regard to the honour of our king. So shall wee make our sight lesse blame worthie, we shall iustifie our actions more honestly (and that which is of greatest importance) H we shall the better pacifie the wrath of Amurath, which he might most iustly conceiue against us. I my selfe before you all am most readie to disburse fower thousand ducats towards it: if it shall please you all to follow me accordingly, we shall deliuer these souldiors from their great necessitie, and acquite our selues from the intricat bonds of most troublesome displeasures.

 vpon God himselfe, another denied to disburse any thing; another determined priuily to steale away, and some said one thing, and some another; but in the end euery man was induced to follow the example of Mahomet: and thereupon haue made a purse according to euery mans I abilitie, there was collected thirte thousand ducats among them. And presently after, word was sent to Leuent Oglie at ZAGHEN, to send thither graine, muttons, and other necessarie provisions that they might the better continue the defence of the fort.

Two dayes onely stayed Mahomet in TEF LIS, and haue changed such souldiors as desired to be dismissed, and also appointed Homar Bassa Gouvernour of TEF LIS in stead of Ghusuf, that there gouerned before, he departed. But before his departure consultation was had, Whether they should keepe the way of TOMANIS, or the way they came through the countrey of Mustassa the Georgian: and in the end they resolved to keepe the way of TOMANIS, and therupon order was taken, that they should all passe the riuer. The Curdi were the first that went ouer, and had already pitched their tents vpon the further side of the water; when the Generall K began to reuoke his former order, and sent them word, That they should returne, because he was now determined to goe backe the same way he came. At which message all the Sanzackes were in a rage, and in plaine tearmes sent him answere, That these mutabilities befecmed not them, being men accustomed to warie, but to be rather childrens play than manly resolution, and that for their parts they were not minded to change their journey, but would goe on the same way they had begun: and so forwards they went (say the Generall what he could) and by the way of TO-MANIS arrived at CHARS long before Mahomet, who was much grieved at this their so great disobedience: but seeing no other remedie, he with the Bassa of CARAMEIT, and Mustassa the Georgian, put themselves on their journey euen by the same way they came to TEF LIS. At last Mahomet arrived at ALVNCHALA, the cheefe citie of Mustassa the Georgian, and burning L with the desire of reuenge of those losses which he thought himselfe to haue received by the tre-cherie of Mustassa; or (as some thought) seeking by this meanes to make Amurath beleue, that in truth all the forepassed mischeefes had happened not through their cowardise, but through the trecherous and malicious deuices of the Georgian, and so to make their received losses seeme more pardonable; he deuised with himselfe, how to find out such a plot, as that Mustassa might vpon the sudden be taken away, as guiltie of so foule a treason: and that he had deuised was in this sort. To call a counsell into his owne pauillion, as if he had received some commaundement from the Court, and haue caused Mustassa to come into that roome, whiles the said counterfeit commaundement should be in reading, to cause his lieutenant with those cheefe of his band that stood about him, to fall vpon him, and presently to cut off his head. This pretended counsell was M accordingly called, wherein sat the Bassa himselfe, and with him the Bassa of CARAMEIT, certaine Sanzackes subject to the iurisdiction of ERZIRVM, the Capigi Bassa or cheefe gentleman vsier, and the Generals lieutenant; with whom he had vpon their solempne oathes for secrecie communicated his intended deceit. The Georgian Mustassa was also called accordingly: who both

A both because he was beloued of more than one, and had also vsed all diligent circumspection, but especially haue heard in the armie some priuie whisperings of such a matter, knew full well of all that was deuised against him, and therefore prouided also for his owne defence. But as touching his going to the counsell, he thought he might not denie so to doe, least by his absence he might seeme guiltie of the fault whereof he was (peraduenture not without cause) suspected; and thereby to leaue his cities for a prey to their enemies, now in the heart of his countrey. And therefore resolving to goe, he deuised how so to doe with most safetie; and so, as if need should be, he might be able to turne the mischiefe intended against him vpon the head of the Generall himselfe. And therefore haue chosen out fiftie of his most faithfull and resolute souldiors, he commaunded them to follow him to the counsell appointed in the Generals pauillion: and be-B ing come thither, to stay there readie and attentue at his first and one onely call, suddenly and forcibly to rush into the pauillion with their weapons, & rather than any wrong should be done vnto him, to shew their valour against the Turkes, without exception of any person whatsoeuer.
 These men by nature enemies vnto the Turkes, vnderstanding well his meaning, seded themselves vpon the execution: and taking vnto them some other allo of their faithfull and trustie friends, followed him euen to the pauillion of Mahomet: where Mustassa entring into the place of counsell, desired of the Generall to know what his pleasure was; who presently caused the counterfeit commaundement to be read, wherein Mustassa gaue an attentue care. But when the other Bassaes and Sanzackes began to sit downe (contrarie to the manner of the Turkes, who whenso-euer any commaundement of the emperours is in reading, vs. alwayes to stand vp, and not to sit C down vntill it be full read) the Georgian tooke his leaue, promising to be euer readie to performe not onely that order of the kings, but also whatsoeuer els he should commaund. And so being about to depart, the Capigi Bassa (or great vsier) of Mahomet came vnto him, and plucking him by the sleue, would haue forced him to sit downe. Then Mustassa ctying out aloud, drew his sword, wherewith he stricke Mahomet's lieutenant, that was right against him, and with his left hand haueing caught the roll from his pate, with his right hand suddenly (to the great astonishment of all that were present) at one onely blow parted his head, his necke, and his breast in twaine, euen to his very stomacke: so that he died. (a strange spectacle to behold) being thus cut in sunder, with his clef head and two shoulders hanging downe vpon their severall sides. After this first, he redoubled his second stroke, aiming at the head of the Bassa of CARAMEIT: but it D being defended with the wythen rolls of the turbant, it slipped downe by his eare; yet so, that with a peece of the said turbant it carried his eare quite away, with a little also of the flesh of his cheek: and all enraged, eagerly assailed Mahomet Bassa the Generall (who now all in confusion was risen vp in the tumult) and wounded him with fise mortall wounds; which were yet afterwards by cunning hand healed, when they had brought him euen to death's doore. At the crie of this Georgian all his people rushed in together: vpon whose confused tumult, and the feare that Mustassa through his furie had stricke into the Turkes, the campe was presently raised: and euery man with all speed departing thence, put himselfe on his way towards CHARS, whether also were brought the two wounded Bassaes and the rest that were ill handled and greatly feared with these sudden and vncouth stirres.

Mustassa now by reuenging himselfe of the trecherie intended against him by Mahomet the Generall.

E Of all this treacherie intended against him, Mustassa sent present information to the Turkish emperour, finding himselfe greatly grieved at the false suspicion that Mahomet had wrongfully conceiued against him, to his great dishonour and wrought so cunningly, that Amurath in token of his good liking and contentment sent him both cloth of gold and a battleaxe all gilt.
 Mahomet on the other side entermedling here and there with all the art that possibly he could deuise, all hatefull and injurious tearmes, sent large aduertisements of all the misfortunes that had happened, and aggravated to the king both the trecheries of Mustassa, and also the slender se-curitie of those wayes and countreys.

As soone as Amurath vnderstood the calamities of his souldiors, the losse of his money, the great dishonour of his people, and the apparant danger wherein the fort of TEF LIS stood, when F it was like to be abandoned: all inflamed with rage and anger, he called vnto him the Bassaes of his court (among whom sat as chiefe the prowd and haughtie Sinan) and rated them all exceedingly, reproving their lewd counsell, and recounting the losses that he had from time to time received, as if they had happened through their defaults, and especially Sinan, as the principall occasion of all these mischiefs: Who like an improuident foole (as he said) would needs reli-

quith the charge of his armie, and like a king sit idle at CONSTANTINOPLE, standing (as it were) at some publike triumph to behold and heare the miseries and misfortunes of others: having before in the time that Mustapha was General, most vainly boasted, with the like power that he had to fetch the Persian king out of CASBIN, and to deliuer him in bonds to Amurath, but had in deed performed nothing worth the remembrance. Sinan could doe no lesse but make answer to the wrathfull king, yet not with such mildnesse and modestie as in such a case hee should peraduenture haue done, but in prowd and peremptorie manner, without any reuerence or regard, told him plainly: That as the last yeare a little before his returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, succours had been conuied to TRAPLIS without any losse or trouble (as in truth they were) euen so had they been this yeare also, if he had put his aduise in execution as much as hee despised and contemned it: for he did then giue him to vnderstand, that Mahamet Bassa could not be a fit man for so great a charge, and that it was necessarie to haue chosen in his roome some other capitaine of valour and discretion; but seeing he would needs make choise of the same vnfit man, he was not now to blame any other for this error, but onely himselfe. As for his comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, it was a thing long before thought most needfull, not onely for his aduise how the matter of peace might be brought to some good passe; but also because if that treatie came not to the desired issue, then he had to talke with him how he might compasse the ouerthrow of his enemy: which thing as yet he had no fit time to declare vnto him, but was now readie to reueale it, if it were so his pleasure. Wonderfully was Amurath grieved with this sullen answere, when he considered that a slaue of his owne, should so arrogantly and manifestly reprove him of folly and improvidence. Notwithstanding, being desirous to know of him what that secret and important matter was, which he had to reueale vnto him for the easie compassing of his commenced enterprise, he dissembled his discontentment conceiued against him, and commaunded him to discloase those his deuises which he had to vtter. Sinan in briebe, of all his aduises, propounded these two things: first his counsell was, not to proceed in this warre as they had hitherto done, by seeking with forts and fortresses to hold and keepe the enemies countreies; for that their treasures were not able to yeeld such store of money, as was sufficient for the maintenance of so many and so great garrisons: contrarie to the opinion of Mustapha (of late dead) who with great pertinacie had perswaded that dangerous, chargeable, and difficult manner of warre. His second aduise was, that the true meanes to bring this warre to wished end, consisted especially in the resolution of Amurath himselfe; who if he would go in person himselfe, and against so mightie a king oppose the person of a king, then might he most assuredly promise vnto himselfe all speedie and honourable victorie: for that at the onely name of his comming, the Persians would easily come to any agreement; or if not, he might then proceed in his wars, and so obtaine most glorious conquests. This his aduise so little pleased the effeminate king, that in stead of the great opinion he before held of him, he now conceiued an enuious affection against him: and a further suspicion (fostred by the great ladies of the court, especially Amuraths mother) That Sinan had thus counselled the king himselfe to go in person, not for any good could come thereof, but onely that so he might find meanes for the prince his sonne to make himselfe king, and to driue out his father. Which suspicion was in such sort nourished in the mind of Amurath, especially being assured of the great affection which the prince carried towards Sinan, and he likewise towards him, that he resolved to rid him out of his sight; and so depriving him of all charge, presently banished him the court, and out of CONSTANTINOPLE to DEMOTICA (a cite of THRACE) from whence afterwards he by most humble supplication obtained to be remoued to MARMARA, a little beyond SELYMBRIA. And into his place of Viceroyship was preferred Sinan Bassa (who had married Amurath his sister) an Hungarian borne, a goodly personage, and of honorable iudgement: but aboue all men a seller of iustice and preferments, and yet a great friend to the peace with the Christian princes, which Sinan had alwaies most wickedly maligned.

The Persian captaines in the meane time, with their spoiles and diuers of their enemies ensignes, were with great joy receiued at home in PERSIA: but when the discord that fell out betwene Mahamet Bassa and Mustapha the Georgian was also reported, the former joy was redoubled; euerie man being of opinion, that these discords might bee great impediments vnto the Turkes further attempts into PERSIA, which it was feared they would the next yeare attempt, to the great danger of NASSIVAN and TAVRIS. Vpon which occasions, the Persian king perceiuing that he could not haue a fitter opportunitie to employ himselfe against against Abas Miri his sonne (then with him it disgrace) determined with himselfe, to leaue the matters on this side of his kingdome in their present state, and to march toward HERRI: whereunto he was earnestly solicited by his elder sonne Emir Hamze Miri, but especially by Miri Salmas his Visier. Vpon which resolution, committing the defence of REIVAN, NASSIVAN, and that side of his kingdome, to Emir Chan Gouvernour of TAVRIS; he set forward himselfe with his army towards CASBIN, and so marching through diuers prouinces, arrived at length at SASVAR, being on that side the chiefe of all the cities subject to the iurisdiction of HERRI: which cite he tooke by force, and without delay caused the Gouvernour thereof to be beheaded, although he alleadged a thousand excuses for himselfe, and objected a thousand accusations moe against the seditious Visier. The king after this departing thence, and having also put to death certaine captaines and Sultans, that were accused by the Visier to be confederats in the rebellion of his sonne, he arrived at last at the desired cite of HERRI: Verie strong is this cite; by situation compassed about with a good wall, and watered with deep channels of running springs, conuied into it by Tamerlane their founder, or restorer: besides that, there was in it many valiant captaines, enemies to Miri Salmas, readie to lay downe their liues in defence of themselves and of Abas their lord; so that the winning thereof, could not but proue both long and difficult. As soone as the king approached the cite, he felt in himselfe many troubled passions arising of griefe and pietie, it grieved him to thinke that hee should beget so gracelesse a sonne, who in stead of maintaining his state and honour, should seeke his ruine and destruction: it grieved him also to remember the blood of his subjects, before spilt vpon so strange an occasion; and scarcely durst he enter into the cogitation, thenceforward to shed any more of the blood of his people. Neuerthelesse, being still more and more solicited by his Visier, he attempted to vnderstand the mind of his sonne, and (if it might be possible) to get him into his hands. But while the king traueilling with these thoughts lay with his armie before HERRI, Abas Miri in the meane time, writ diuers letters to his father and to his brother, wherein he besought them, That they would make knowne vnto him the occasion of this their stirre: For if desire of rule had moued them to seeke the deprivation of him, being their sonne and brother, from the honour hee lawfully possessed, and which his father himselfe had procured for him of his grandfather Tamas; they ought to abandon that imagination, for that he was alwaies readie to spend his wealth and his blood together with his estate in their seruice, and acknowledged his father to be his good father and king: But if they were not induced hereunto for this cause, but by a desire to reuenge some trespass that he had committed to the prejudice of the crowne of PERSIA, or his fathers honour; he was most readie to submit himselfe to any amends, and with all reason to yeeld vnto them the kingdome, yea the whole world, and euen his owne life, the rather to satisfie their minds with a more full contentation. With twife and thrife reading ouer, were these affectionate letters considered and digested: and at last both the father and the brother perceiuing in them such liberalitie of words, and overcome with pitie, or if not with pitie yet with great admiration and contentment, they determined to put the matter in practise, and moderating their desire of reuenge, to attempt the reducing of the yong mans mind to some good passe. Whereupon they wrote backe vnto him, That no greedie desire to vsurpe his gouernment, had induced them to make so great a voyage, to trouble so much people, and to shed such abundance of blood; but onely his disobedience and presumption, in that he had caused himselfe to be called the king of PERSIA; and had not sent so much as one capitaine to aid them in the late warres against the Turkes. Glad was Abas the yong prince, when he vnderstood the accusations that were laied against him, hoping to make it manifest before all men, how the king and his brother were misinformed in these particularities: and therefore incontinently did write backe vnto them, That if they would faithfully promise him, honourably, and without any outrage to receiue his embassadours, he would send vnto them such euident matter, and so cleare information touching those his accusations, as that they should not onely clearely perceiue that there was neuer any such kind of thought in him, but also that he had alwaies desired & laboured the contrarie: and would moreover open vnto them such matter, as in respect of other men, and not of himselfe, might cause their comming to proue profitable and commodious to all the kingdome of PERSIA. Which his request they both solemnly promised faithfully to performe, being verie desirous to vnderstand what those strange nouelties should be. Whereupon Abas Miri sent vnto them two of his chiefe counsellors, men of great account and reuerence both for their yeares and wisdom, dome, with full instructions: Who after many speeches in the end swearing (according to their custome) by the Creator that spread out the ayre, that founded the earth upon the deepes, that adorned the heauen with stars, that powred abroad the water, that made the fire, and briefly, of nothing brought forth all things; swearing by the head of Alh, and by the religion of their prophet Mahomet, that such peruerse thoughts neuer entred into the head of Abas Mirize: they alledged many testimonies and manifest proofes, that most loially in all due time, as well when he was aduanced to the kingdome of PERSIA, as also in his battels against the Turkes, his sonne had alwaies caused deuout prayers and supplications to be made to God for his prosperitie, neither euer desired to heare any other but happie and fortunat successe of him. They brought with them a thousand and a thousand precepts and royall letters, which the young man had caused to be written, as occasions required to the Gouvernours that were his subjects, for the gouernment of the State, wherein he neuer named himselfe king of PERSIA; but onely, Your king and Gouvernour of HERRI. They prayed the king also, to cause a diligent processe to be framed against his sonne, and if there should be found in him any signe or shadow of so wicked a suspicion, then to take from him his estate and libertie; offering themselves to remaine as hostages for him. But when all this should be done, and Abas found altogether free from these vnjust accusations, then (falling euen to the earth and kissing it) they besought him, and as it were conjured him, not to leaue the matter thus imperfect, to the prejudice of his blood, but returning to his counsellor, to take information likewise vpon what mind and consideration he had aduised the king to take vpon him this vnordely and dangerous voyage; where no doubt he should find nothing in him; but malignant, ambitious, and wicked affections; and such as euen deserued, that with his blood there should be reuenged all the blood of those which till that houre had been brought to their vnworthie and vnderferued deaths. And for as much as nothing remained, whereof the Visier had enforced the king against his sonne, but the commaundement that was given by Abas Mirize to the Gouvernours vnder him, That they should not go to the wars against the Turkes: they confessed in truth that such an order was taken, but not to that wicked and traitorous end and purpose as was reported to the king by his great counsellor, but onely in respect of an invasion justly feared in those quarters by the Tartarian Iessellbas; who by diuers inroads had already done great harme in the countrey about HERRI, and put young Abas and his counsellors in such a feare, that they durst not disfigure their cities of their guards and forces: and therefore had commaunded the said Gouvernours, not to go to warre against the Turkes, but to stay and expect further direction. And that all this was by writing signified vnto the Visier himselfe: which he of a malicious mind had concealed, onely to trie, if in these common troubles he could bring to passe, that Abas Mirize and the king might be taken away, and Emir Hamze succeed in his place; and so he himselfe remaine the Superintendent of his sonne in law, and Moderator of that most famous kingdome. Of which so treacherous a purpose they (for all that) thought Emir Hamze the young prince altogether ignorant (knowing his honourable disposition and loue towards his owne kindred) but imputed it only to the immoderat and ambitious desire of the wicked traitour Mirize Salmas.

Of these graue speeches of the embassadours, Mahamet the father (by nature credulous) began to make great construction; and deeply to consider of their so earnest and important requests, which seemed vnto him so vpright and equall, as that he could not chuse but hearken vnto the same. And therefore calling vnto him the Gouvernours, the capitaines, the judges, and treasurers of all the cities that were subject to to HERRI: he demanded of them, how and in what sort they esteemed of Abas Mirize, and in what degree of honour he desired to be esteemed of them: and of them all receiued one answere, That they held him for their lord as lieutenant to the king of CASBIN; and that he himselfe had alwaies desired to be so taken and thought of: for proofe whereof, euerie one of them brought in diuers letters, precepts, and orders, wherein hee neuer caused himselfe to be honoured with any other title, but onely, Your king of HERRI. He demanded further, whether any such warres were attempted by the Tartarian Iessellbas or no: whereof he receiued a large and solemne information, that so it was, to the great detriment of all those territories. And thus the king was thoroughly persuaded of the innocencie of his sonne; who before was noted vnto him by his Visier, to be an obstinat rebell. Vpon which occasion only, although he might justly haue put him to death, as author of so great troubles and bloodshed; yet because he would be better enformed of the truth of the accusations laid against him by

A the embassadours, he resolved to make a curious and diligent inquisition thereof: and therefore first of all, in great secrecy he examined Emir Hamze his eldest sonne, wherefore he had aduised this journey against his brother Abas, whom he had found guiltlesse of all those crimes that were objected against him: whereunto the prince answered, That he had no other certaintie of the pretended euill behaviour of his brother, but onely that which proceeded from the great credit that he alwaies gaue to his father in law Mirize Salmas, to whom as to a chiefe counsellor, his father in law, and protector of the kingdome, he had alwaies yeilded assured credence: and so discharged the whole tempests of all those mischiefes vpon the Visier. Touching whom the king made diligent inquisition, as well among those of the court as of the armie; and thereby found him guiltie of all that the embassadours of HERRI had accused him: and that being alwaies acquainted with the true occasions which restrained the Gouvernours of HERRI (subject to Abas Mirize) from going to the warre against the Turkes, he had most maliciously concealed the same, of purpose to hatch such a strange and dangerous discontentment, as had wrought the vnworthie death of many great men, and almost defiled the hands of the father with the innocent blood of his guiltlesse sonne. For which so foule a treason the false Visier was worthily condemned to die, and his wily head by the commaundement of the king stricke from his carkasse. Justly rewarded, with the same punishment which he vnjustly sought to haue conuerted vpon others; and with his owne destruction pacified the dissensions and hatreds that were risen betweene the two princes. And so the two brethren being reconciled together, and the sonne to the father; after that Abas had againe promised his wished obedience (which he afterwards most dutifully performed) king Mahamet returned with the prince towards CASBIN: where by reason of new and vnexpected motions of the Turkes, he had now bene long looked for and desired.

Amurath through the rough speeches of Siman, was more and more settled in his purpose for the continuing of the Persian warre; accounting it so much the more to his owne glorie, as it should in happie successe fall out contrary to the opinion of many: and thereupon began to be thinke himselfe whom he might chuse for his Generall, to whom he might commit so great a charge. Among the Bassaes of the court there was one Ferat, a man of ripe yeares, but yet fierce of courage, tough in opinion, in counsell as hardie as might become his age, readie for all sudden and strange adventures, but aboute all a vassall most deuoted to the king: Of this man, at last he was D resolved to make choise to haue the leading of his armie: and therefore calling him apart, declared vnto him what he had in himselfe purposed, encouraging him to take the charge vpon him, with a firme resolution to performe all things answerable to so worthie an enterprise, with the opinion he had conceiued of his valour. Verie willingly did Ferat accept of this new office, and thought himselfe (as indeed he was) highly fauoured by the king: and thereupon made him a large promise, to employ his strength, his wit, and vttermost deuoir, to put in execution whatsoever should be offered vnto him, either by occasion, or by his royall commaundement.

At first Amurath had no other purpose to employ him any further, but only to assure the passage to TEFLIS, and so into all GEORGIA; and to haue destroyed the country of Mustassa the Georgian, who had so audaciously injured the lieutenant of Amurath, and put his whole armie E in confusion; but being certainly aduertised of the troubles in PERSIA betweene the king and his sonne, he changed his purpose, and commaunded Ferat to employ all his forces to erect a fortress at REIVAN, a place belonging to Tocomac, and to assure the passage from CHARS to REIVAN; for so they should be reuenged of many harmes they had receiued by him, and lay open the way to the citie of TAVRIS, to the great glorie of Amurath. As for Mustassa the Georgian, although he had well deserved to be chastised for his rash attempt against Mahamet Bassa, being then his Generall, yet he willed Ferat to dissemble his euill opinion of him, and (if it were possible) so to worke, as to vse him as an instrument to conuay treasure and succours to TEFLIS: for by this meanes the passage, being made safe, all GEORGIA would without any mo fortresses be subdued, and then the next yeare they might attempt the enterprise for F TAVRIS.

Highly did Ferat commend the deuises of Amurath his lord, and shewed himselfe readie for any attempt. And so the time being come wherein it behooued them to set on foot their important designments, in the beginning of the yeare 1583, commaundements were sent out to all the cities of the empire, which were wont to make their appearance at these warres, That vpon fresh summons, they should be readie to returne against the Persians, and to put in execution G that should be enjoyed them by their new Generall. The same whereof flew as farre as So-RIA, IVRIE, PALESTINE, MESOPOTAMIA, BABYLONIA, to BALSARA, to SIVAS, to MARAS, to all BITHYNIA, CAPADOCIA, CILICIA, ARMENIA, yea and beyond CON-STANTINOPLE to the borders of HUNGARIE and GRECE, and in briefe to all the regions that were wont to come to this warre: all which sent their capitaines and souldiors accordingly. And so at the last Generall Ferat departing from CONSTANTINOPLE, and passing ouer to SCV-TARI by the way of AMASIA and of SIVAS, came to ERZIRUM, where he tooke a view of all his armie and prouision: and from thence in eight daies arriued at CHARS, conducted by the Persian fugitiue Maxut Chan: and from CHARS set himselfe on his way towards REIVAN. H Three daies before he came to REIVAN, of certaine ruines of an old castle which the Turkes call AGGIA CHALASI (or the Castle of strangers) he erected a new fortesse, and left in it a garrison of foure hundred souldiors, with a Sanzacke, and certaine pieces of ordinance, and then went to REIVAN. This countrey is distant from TAVRIS eight or nine daies journey; betwene which two places are situat NASSIVAN, CHIVLPAI, MARANT, and SOFIAN, all enriched with goodly gardens and pleasant greenes: but in the way are many craggie mountaines to be climed, and sundrie hard passages either for armie or trauelier.

Here then did Ferat encampe himselfe with his armie, and taking aduise of his chiefe captains where he should build the fort, they all with one consent aduised him, to seaze vpon the houses and gardens of Tocomac, and there to fortifie. Which he accordingly did, enclosing the gardens with strong wals and deepe ditches round about, whereinto he conuained water from a certaine riuier, that comming downe from the mountaines, ran into Araxis: Which worke was performed with such expedition; that within the space of fiftene daies the fortesse was finished, being in circuit seauen hundred and fiftie yards. It grieved Tocomac exceedingly thus to lose his countreie and dwelling, and so much the more, because it happened so suddenly, and as it were vnlooked for. He himselfe as soone as he vnderstood that the Turkish armie was comming to that coast, hauing withdrawne himselfe and his men of warre out of the citie hee could not keepe, sought by all meanes to be reuenged, if not altogether, yet in some part of this so great an iniurie.
And therefore he wrote vnto the king at CORAZAN, to Emir Chan at TAVRIS, to Simon in GEORGIA, he gathered souldiors out of the villages, and vfed all his possible endeouour to enable himselfe to annoy the enemies armie: But from none of these places could he receiue any helpe, K the king being so farre off in wars against his sonne, the Georgian being busied by hindering any reliefe to be brought to the besieged in TEBLIS; as for Emir Chan (who by solemne promise vnto the king before his departure to HERRI, had vnderaken the defence of that side of the kingdome against the Turkes) he either would not, or could not stirre; neither sent so much as one souldior, hauing as some supposed secret intelligence with Generall Ferat, not to disturbe him in this his worke. So Tocomac destitute of all other helpe, and not able of himselfe to doe much against so mightie an enemy; yet ceased not to lay such priuie ambushes for the Turkes as hee could, killing of them sometimes 100, sometime 150, and sometimes 200, as they fell into his danger. And to ease his stomacke against Emir Chan (who sitting still at TAVRIS as it were to behold his miserie, would not so much as shake a sword against these spoiling Turkes) he spared L not to dispatch certaine horsemen in hast to the king at CORAZAN, and by eloquent letters to amplifie the cowardise of Emir Chan; intermedling withall some causes of suspicion, that he had some intelligence with the Turkish Generall.

Ferat hauing thus built this new fort at REIVAN, as Amurath had commanded, and furnished it with artillerie, and all other things needfull for the defence thereof; appointed Sinan Bassa (the sonne of Cicala a renegat of GENVA, and by Selymus the late emperor, in the flower of his youth created Aga or capitaine of the Ianizaries) with a garriion of eight thousand souldiors to keepe the same. And so departing thence, by the way of AGIA CHALASI, in ten daies arriued with his armie at CHARS.

Ferat had not long stayed at CHARS, but strange news were brought thither, That Mustassa M the Georgian (to whom Amurath had sent thirtie thousand duckats, by two of his Capigi and two of his Chiaus, to haue by him beene conueyed to TEBLIS for the releefe of them in the fort) was reuolted from the Turkish obedience, and being now become a rebell, had left that fortesse in manifest danger to yeeld, if by some other meanes it were not relieued. Which strange nouelties

A nouelties exceedingly troubled the Generall: who to know the certaintie thereof, called before him all such as were the messengers of this misfortune: by whom he was certainly enformed, That Mustassa, the two Capigi, and the Chiaus, hauing put themselves vpon their way towards TEBLIS with the treasure, guarded with a conuoy of fife hundred of his souldiors, in the mid way had met with his cousin Simon the Georgian, by whom he was perswaded to returne againe to his antient faith and religion, which he had to the great perill of his soule so prophane abandoned, and to shake off the seruice of Amurath, which would yeeld him no other recompence than an hard and infamous captiuitie, and in the end some fraudulent and trecherous death: and that his perswasion had so preuailed with Mustassa, that he caused the two Capigi and the Chia-us to be apprehended and presently beheaded; and deuiding the treasure, with his said cousin B had with him and his other kinsmen vowed a solemne and perpetuall confederacie: and so hauing withdrawne themselves to their wonted passages, lay there in wait for such succours as should by the Turkes be brought to TEBLIS.

When Ferat vnderstood these and such other particularities, he all in a furie swore that he would not returne to ERZIRUM vntill he had put all the country of Mustassa to fire and sword:
yet first he thought it needfull to relieue TEBLIS, which would otherwise bee in danger to bee yeilded to the enemy: and for that purpose made choice of Hassan Bassa, who in the last yeate of the Generallship of Mustapha had most couragiously conueyed the like succours, and taken Aliculi Chan. Vnto him therefore did the Generall assigne fortie thousand duckats, with other prouision necessarie for that seruice, and for the more suretie appointed him fiftene thousand of C the most choice and valiant souldiors in all the armie to conduct the same. In ten dayes space Hassan Bassa went and came from TEBLIS, hauing in his journey too and fro had many skirmishes with the Georgians, wherein he lost some few men, without any other losse worth the remembrance.

After this the Generall sent one Resuan Bassa with six thousand souldiors to spoyle the countreie of Mustassa the Georgian the late renegate, but now become a rebell to the Turkes: which Resuan, without any long stay ouerran all his territorie, burnt his townes, and committed most vncouth outrages, which extended euen vnto the poore insensible trees, and carried away with him many captiue soules, with much corne and cattell, like a raging tempest destroying whatsoeuer came in his way. Now was the Generall also retired to ARDACHAN, whether came Resuan D to meet him with his foresaid bootie. But because they had now performed what they had before intended, and the approach of Winter perswaded their returne, they remoued from ARDACHAN, and by the way of OLTI retired to ERZIRUM, from whence all the souldiors were licensed to depart to their feuerall places of abode, and a memoriall sent vnto Amurath of all the actions had beene performed; and especially of the good seruice done by Hassan Bassa, who for the same was now once againe honoured by the king with cloth of gold, a batleaxe and tar-guet all gilt.

About this time one Podoloni a gentleman of POLONIA, sent by Stephen king of POLO-NIA to CONSTANTINOPLE, by the leaue of Amurath to buy certaine horses in ANATOLIA; returning homewards with foure and twentie goodly horses which he had bought, was notwithstanding the great Turks Passe, by his commaundement stayed vpon the way, all his men (in E number foure and thirtie) slaine, excepting one boy, who getting into a wood escaped, and Podoloni his head stricke off. The horses brought backe to CONSTANTINOPLE, were by the appointment of Amurath some bestowed into his owne stable, and the rest giuen among the Bassas, oftentimes pointed at with the fingers of the Turkes in derision of the Polonian king.
This Amurath commaunded to be done in reuenge of an outrage done by the Polonian Cossacks against the Turkes, whereof newes was but euen then brought to the Court.

The nine and twentieth day of Nouember of this present yeare 1583, died Hama Cadim, the widow of the late emperor Selymus the second, and mother of this Amurath, and lieth buried by her husband Selymus and his fife sonnes, strangled by their brother Amurath.

All the rest of this yeare 1583 Ferat spent at ERZIRUM, and afterwards sent out his ordinarie
F commaundements to all the accustomed cities, to summon the souldiors against the next Spring in the yeare 1584, gathering together a greater number of pioners and engineers than cuer had beene gathered in these warres heretofore: and withall gaue it out, That he would goe to NAS-SIVAN, and there doe great matters. At which report the Persians were much moued, and began to cast many things in their heads about it: but about all others the king, who vnderstanding G at CASBIN of all that had before happened at REIVAN, and of the new preparations of the Turkes, began to feare that they would this yeare passe to TAVRIS, or at least as was reported to NASSIVAN, and in those places build new fortresses, to the great danger of the Persian empire: and therefore retaining still such forces as he brought with him from HERR, and commanding as many moe as he could out of all the cities that were subject vnto him, to follow him to TAVRIS, he arrived there with his armie not long after the arrivall of Ferat Bassa at ERZIRUM.

This vnexpected comming of the Persian king with so great an armie to TAVRIS, filled the world with expectation of great matters to have beene done by him against the Turkes: in-much that Ferat the Generall, before he would proceed any further, thought it good to advertise Amurath of the matter: declaring vnto him, That his desire was to goe to NASSIVAN, and H
there to build a fortress, according to his commaundement, so to lay open the passage to TAV-RIS; but having received certain intelligence, That the Persian king was come to TAVRIS with an huge armie, and full resolution to encounter him, he thought it his dutie not to put in execution his aforesaid determination, without his expresse commaundement. Vnto whom Amurath presently wrote backe, That the matter so standing, he should not goe to NASSIVAN, but onely employ his forces to assure the passage of TOMANIS and LORI, that so the fort of TEF-LIS might the yeare following be relieved by some small band, without sending of any great armie for the conveying of succours thither. This new commaundement of his lord, Ferat kept secret to himselfe, causing the rumour of his going to NASSIVAN to be more and more encreased, of purpose to feed the opinion that the Persians had before conceived of his comming thither, and I so deluding them, with lesse danger to build the forts he had intended, for the quiting of those most dangerous passages of LORI and TOMANIS.

Vpon this resolution Ferat having gathered together his people, with all things necessarie for his purpose, removed with his armie from ERZIRUM toward CHARS, where he stayed ten dayes, to take a new survey both of his souldiours and provision. And so departing thence, set forward toward LORI, sending before him Hassan Bassa with five thousand light horsemen to scour the country euen to TOMANIS, and to learne what he possibly could of the enemies purposes, and the state of GEORGIA. Which thing Hassan dutifully performed, speedily scouring over all the woods, and disclosing all the passages from thence to LORI, and so to TOM-ANIS, without meeting with any vpon whom to assay his valour, more than certaine robbers vpon K the high way, whom he caused to be slaine (as men altogether ignorant of the Georgian and Persian affaires) and their heads to be set on the tops of their lances, and so returned againe to LORI: where having stayed one day, he met with the Generall, to whom he recounted all that had happened in that his excursion. Ferat being come to LORI, there encamped his armie. This place did sometime belong to Simon the Georgian, well strengthened with an high castle, com-passed about with very deepe ditches and a thick wall, almost a mile in circuit, but was then somewhat weakened with time: it is distant from TEF-LIS about two daies journey, of a carriers pace.
Vpon this castle Ferat seized, and having repaired the wals and strengthened the breaches, he placed therein Ali Bassa of GRECE with seven thousand souldiours for the defence thereof, L and planted vpon the wals two hundred small pieces of ordinance. And so when he had set all things there in good order, departed thence with his armie towards TOMANIS; having before commaunded Ali Bassa at some convenient time to fortifie SAITAN CHALASI, a castle about ten miles distant from LORI, and therein to place a convenient garrison of souldiors and artillerie.

Fourte dayes were they going from LORI to TOMANIS, being ordinarily but one dayes worke from the one place to the other: but now the Generall would needs so make it, to take the spoile of those rich fields, abounding with corne, cattell, and fruit, and to leaue vnto the coun-treys people a lamentable remembrance of his being there. At last being come to TOMANIS (in times past a castle of Simons, but by reason of these warres, by him then abandoned) he began to consult with the other captaines, how and where the fortress should be erected, for the assurance of that country. But after many discourses, it was at last concluded not to fortifie in that castle, as being too farre from the strait, to make that dangerous passage safe and secure; but to goe a little further, and to build a fortress vpon the very mouth of the strait. So the armie marching forward a few miles, at the very entrance of the narrow passage found the ruines of another castle, and

A and neere thereunto stayed themselves. This steepe headlong castle was so compassed round about with a thicke wood, which hindered all discouerie a farre off, that it was not conuenient to found such a castle there, from whence their ordinance could neither auail them to whom the defence thereof should be committed, neither endamage those that should come to offend it. And therefore the Generall commanded, that every man with all his endenour should lay to his hand for the cutting downe of that thicke wood, and making way through thicke and thin to lay it for an open champaigne, that was before the receptacle of a thousand dangerous treacheries. In very short space were the trees layed along on the ground, the place made lightsome and open, and a very commodious situation prepared for the foundation of a castle. The plot of the old ruined castle was compassed about with a wall of a thousand and seven hundred yards, and in the middle thereof was erected a strong keepe, sundrie lodgings and chambers builded, and two B hundred pieces of Ordinance distributed vpon the new wals. After that, the Generall sent Ref-san Bassa and the Bassa of CARAMANIA with twenty thousand of his most choise souldiours, to conuey succours to TEF-LIS: who marching closely together in the direct way, in one day arri-ued at the said fort; wherein they bestowed their supplies, and changing the Gouvernour thereof, substituted in his rounge one Bagli, being then vpon this occasion onely called a Bassa. Vvhilst Refsan yet lay thus encamped vnder TEF-LIS, Dau Chan the brother of Simon, who in the beginning of these warres, at the comming of Mustapha the Turkes Generall into GEORGIA, had sied out of TEF-LIS, came now with all his familie, offering himselfe as a subject and deuoted vassall to the Turkish emperour; whom Refsan entertained with great promises and large as-
C surances of all good successe, according to his desire.

In the meane while newes were brought to Simon, That Generall Ferat staying at the straits of TOMANIS with his armie, had sent Refsan Bassa with a farre lesse number than indeed he had, to succour TEF-LIS: Vpon which report he tooke courage to encounter Refsan, and to giue him battell. Vpon which resolution without further delay being accompanied but with four thousand Georgians, partly subjects of his owne; and partly of Manuccians, he with all speed possible went against Refsan. But whilst Simon was going thitherwards, Generall Ferat feeling the worst, had already by chance dispatched away the two Bassas of CARAMANIA and MARAS, with ten thousand souldiours, to the end that joining themselves with the souldiours of Refsan, they should at all adventures be so much the stronger. Now Simon going resolutely D on, found Refsan encamped with six thousand souldiours onely at the foot of an hill, on the back side whereof lay all the rest of his armie, and presently gaue a charge vpon him, when the souldiors behind the hill being aware of his approach, were readie all at once with their weapons to receiue him: Vvhose now perceiuing his error, repented himselfe to haue so rashly assaulted his enemies, seeing now no other remedie but to be vnto vndone. But seeing that he had now so farre engaged himselfe, as that he could not by flight but encrease his grieue and make the issue more lamentable; with those few souldiours which he had he endured the furie of the great armie of Refsan, so that on both sides there was joynd a most cruell battell: wherein the strange and vnusuall valour of those few Christians was much to be wondered at. Yet in the end the huge number of the Turkish swords and speares so preuailed vpon that small number of the Georgians, as E that they were brought to great extremitie: yea Simon himselfe having his horse slaine vnder him, fell downe headlong to the ground; and in his fall was very neere to haue beene taken prisoner, as was his lieutenant and many other his followers, had he not beene relieved by an vnex-pected and marvellous chance: for whilst the battell was euen at the greatest heat betwene them, Refsan discovered the two Bassas of CARAMANIA and MARAS, who (as is before said) were newly sent by Generall Ferat to succour him, but both by the said Refsan and also by the rest of his armie were indeed thought to be Persians; whereupon they were incontinently surprised with a sudden feare, inso much that they now became very doubtfull of the victorie, wher-of they thought themselves before assured. In this suspence and doubtfullnesse of mind the battell was also intermitted, and the victorie by the sight of those their friends disturbed: whereby F the Georgians, and especially Simon, whose state was almost desperat, tooke the opportunitie to the escape and saue themselves, leauing behind them most sure signes of their valour among the Turkes; of whom many remained there slaine, many wounded, and many filled with great maruell and vnexpected feare. Thus escaped poore Simon with the remainder of his followers into his knowne places of refuge, there to bewaile the death and captiuitie of his subjects. But Refsan

after he had discouered the Bassaes approaching towards him, to be his knowne friends and well-willers, fletted in himselfe exceedingly, that Simon had so escaped his hands: yet holding on his way to TOMANIS, he arriued there in great triumph, drawing the standers of Simon all along the ground, and causing many of the heads of the Georgians to be carried vpon his souldiours launces, to the great joy of Generall Ferat; to whom he deliuered all the prisoners taken in the battell, and wicked Daut Chan, who having in times past renounced his first faith, was become a Persian, and now againe despising the vaine superstition of the Persians, had yeelded himselfe to the vanitie of the Turkes, and made himselfe a voluntarie slaue to Amurath.

Now was the yeare so farre spent, that euery man began to feare the *W*inters approach, and therefore the Generall determined to remoue thence, and to withdraw himselfe into places of more safetie. And so hauing set all things in order in the new fort, he appointed Hassan to be the Bassa of TOMANIS, and left with him eight thousand select souldiours, chosen out of all the armie for the defence of that fort, and the countrey thereabout. Deepely had Ferat layed vp the outrage committed by Musuffa the Georgian (being now returned to his old name of Manucchiar) in taking away the kings treasure, and killing the wife Capigi and the Chiaus: and therefore he resolved with himselfe not to returne to CHARS OF ERZIRUM, vntill he had first passed into the countrey of the said Georgian, and in most cruel manner reuenged those notable injuries before receiued. In three daies he arriued at TRABALA, and there encamped. But lying there such an vnwonted dearth and scarcitie of all things rise in the armie, but especially of victuals, that euery siue bushels and an halfe of *W*heat was sold for five hundred duckars, to the vniuersall calamitie of the whole armie.

From this place the Generall was minded to goe on forwards towards the countrey of Manucchiar, but whiles he was vpon the raising of his tents, one Veis Bassa of ALBPO, came vnto him and told him, That it was not good now to spend the time in wandering about those countreys, for that there were three very great enemies confederat together, to make this enterprise very difficult, and almost impossible and desperat: one was the season of the yeare, being now full of snowes, frosts, and tempests; another was, the want and scarcitie of all things necessarie, especially of victuall; the third was, the people of GEORGIA, who by a common vniting of themselves together, and peraduenture aided by the Persians, might worke some notable mischeefe against the armie. This speech of Veis so much offended the Generall; that he most sharply rebuked him, and with bitter tearmes reproued him, telling him flatly, That he well perceived he was brought vp among mountaines and villages, and of a villaine (as he was) vpon some superfluitie of grace, or foolish importunitie, aduanced to the honour of a Bassa; and that therefore he should not haue presumed so much as to think it lawfull for him, so impudently and malapertly to come and giue him such aduertisements; whereas it had bene his dutie rather to haue held his peace, and to haue hearkened vnto the commaundements of his betters and superiors, yeelding himselfe obedient and deuoted with all his power to performe the same. With this rebuke the Generall passed on to ARCHALECH, burning and in a manner destroying the countrey before him, though indeed it was in amitie and confederacie with the Turkes. But the inhabitants of ARCHALECH vpon the comming of the Turkes had abandoned the citie, and for feare withdrawne themselves into the mountaines. In ARCHALECH Ferat encamped, & staid the space of foure daies among the rockie crags and in a barren soyle, yeelding necessarie sustenance neither for man nor beast; so that euery man there endured vnspokeable miseries: yet for the space of foure dayes the souldiours with patience endured this so great a calamitie. But in the end the fall of an huge snow being added to these extremities, did so greatly encrease their griefes, that all the Ianizaries and Spaoglans of CONSTANTINOPLE arose in a tumult, and comming before Ferat, in despightfull and contemptuous manner with very haughtie and resolute tearmes said vnto him:

And how long shall we endure this thy tedious and insolent government? Where is the due commiseration that thou oughtest to beare towards the vassales of thy Soueraigne, thou rusticall and vnreasonable captaine? Dost thou thinke happily, that we keepe our harlots as thou dost vnder thy sumptuous pavillions, all fat and in good plight, with delicate viands, whilest others live in miserie? Dost thou beleeue that we haue, as thou hast, our daintie sugars, spices, and conserues, whereby to restore vs in the common calamitie of others? And that we haue at commaund meat and precious wines, which thou minglest with thy cleare and pleasant waters, partly provided for thee by the art of the cunning doctors,

A doctors, and partly brought to thee from farre places? From this day forward it will be no longer endured, that so much people should continue in this famine, afflicted with nakednesse, and many other inconueniencies: and therefore get thy selfe vp, and returne toward ERZIRUM, otherwise we shall be enforced to doe that which will breed more displeasure vnto thee, than to any man aliue.

The Generall in a great agonie presently called a counsell, wherein it was concluded, That they should all send their strong sumpter horses to ARDACHAN, and the rest to follow him into Manucchiars countrey, whither he had appointed to go, onely to make an intode, and with the spoile and bootie of that countrey to refresh the minds of his souldiours afflicted with the miseries both past and present. This commandement of the Generall they all readily obeyed, as well because he promised them a speedie voyage, as also for that euery man desired the sacke of ARTYNCHALA, and other the territories of Manucchiar. So Ferat holding on his journey through certaine low vallies betwene the high and craggie mountaines, continually accompanied with great famine and scarcitie, at length brought his armie to CLISCA, a place belonging to Manucchiar, but as then for feare of the Turkes quite abandoned and forsaken by the inhabitants; who with their wiues and children and all the best stuffe they had, were fled into remote and safe places, vntill the furie of the enemy were ouerpassed. In the fields neere vnto this place (abounding with corne and cattell & plentie of fruit) the Generall refreshed his whole armie, and hoping that all the souldiours would like it well to stay a while in such good ease, determined with himselfe to erect a fort in that place. And with this resolution gaue commaundement to Resuan Bassa to go vp to the tower, and in the top thereof to set vp an ensigne with a proclamation and publike report, That he would in the name of Amurath there erect a fort, and fortifie it as he had the other forts before. Resuan accompanied with Amurath the Bassa of CARAMANIA, according to the commaundement of the Generall, in the top of the tower set vp an ensigne or two: which as soone as the souldiours had espied, the forenamed Ianizaries and Spaoglans, thinking themselves too much abused by their Generall, arising againe all in an vprore, replenished with furie and indignation, ran vp in a rage to take downe the ensignes that were set vp vpon the tower, and taking them in their hands, rapt the said Resuan once or twice about the pate, discharging withall a thousand injurious and despightfull words vpon him, and sharply rebuked him. And then returning to the Generall (who was now come thither himselfe to countenance the action of Resuan) with gestures full of despight, contempt, and disdain, reuiling him with many shamefull and scornfull tearmes, they protested vnto him:

That they were not come to the warres to exercise the occupation of masons and dawbers, and to be employed in such vile and dishonourable offices, but onely to mannage their weapons, and thereby to demerit their ordinarie wages, and to purchase to themselves glorie and renoume at the kings hands. And therefore if he loued his head, and would not see those armes turned against himselfe which hitherto had bene the reuengers of the enemies iniuries, he should resolve with himselfe to leaue these new buildings and these vnseasonable designments, and giuing place to the contrarie season of the yeare, to haue due care of their common desires and necessitie.

While they were yet thus expostulating the matter with him, one more bold than the rest, and more forgetfull of his dutie, did not sticke to assault the Generall, and to threaten him to wreake his furie vpon him: which in that tumult had happily bene done, had not the Bassa of CARAMANIA lent the Generall his owne horse, and so conducted him to his pavilion. Yet was he neuertheless still pursued by the tumultuous souldiours, and againe sharply accused for the stay that he made there, and for not resolving presently to remoue thence: and at last after many reproachfull speeches told expressly, That if he did not the next morning remouue out of those quarters, without all faile he should loose his life for it. For all that, Ferat disdainfully yeelded to them that should of dutie haue been readie and obedient at euery becke of his, and seeking by all means (notwithstanding all this stirre) to stay there so long time as should be sufficient to build a fort; that would so much offend Manucchiar, answered them againe.

That he made no account of their threatening him with his life, which he had alwaies offered to lay downe for any seruice of his king. But if they had no care to serue their soueraigne in this new building, ding, they might go their waies; as for himselfe, he was resolutely minded to obey his lord in whatsoever he had commaunded him, for the honour of whom, euerie one of them ought to thinke their lines werie well bestowed.

The souldiours
ouerthrow the Generalls tents, and threaten to kill him.

Vpon this answere there followed diuers railings and cursings against the king, against the Generall, and against them all; and in this confused tumult euerie man betooke himselfe to his weapons: in euerie corner was heard grumblings and whisperings, full of wrath and indignation: so that there was a great feare of some dangerous euent, but greater was the suspition of the Generalls life. And now euerie man had withdrawne himselfe to the guarding of such things as he esteemed most; when suddenly and in a trice you might haue seen the paulions of all the Bassaes and captaines fall downe flat to the ground, all the cords therof being cut in sunder by the wrath. H full souldiours: and as it were in a moment, all the muttons and other cattell which the Generall and Bassaes led with them for their ordinarie vse, were seized vpon by the same souldiours, and guarded with all diligence possible. And so farre was it off that any man durst challenge or reuenge this their insolencie, that they themselues turning afresh vpon their Generall (being now in a maze and deadly feare) began now the third time to threaten him, that if he did not forthwith remoue from those countries, and turne his iourney towards ERZIRUM, those vallies and fields should without all faile become the sepulchers of the Bassaes, and those hills retaine the eternall memorie of so bloudie a day.

With a litle liberalitie might the Generall haue done with this people whatsoever he had listed, but being loth to gratifie them with any thing, he was enforced to performe their proud and arrogant demands, and to his great shame to obey them whom with right vsage he might haue made obedient to himselfe: and therefore to auoid their despightfull threats, to his exceeding great reproach, he was glad euen as they had commanded to remoue out of those quarters. The first day he arriued at ARDACHAN, with the great trouble of all his souldiours: for whereas the journey was wont to be two waies worke ordinarily, as well in respect of the length of the way as the difficultie of the passage, the Generall would now needs haue it done in one, the rather thereby to grieue his souldiours. But of this his wilfulnesse, he receiued euen the same day the just reward; for that the chariots wherein his women rode, were conuaued away, together with the eunuchs that were their keepers: some say by the Georgians, that lay in wait for such a prey; some others say by the Ianizaries, who the more to dishonour their Generall wrought him this iniurie.

up his campe.

Great was the reproach that Ferat receiued in the armie, but farre greater at CONSTANTINOPLE, when these newes were there knowne: but there was no remedie, he must now perforce endure it, and discontented as he was, keepe on his way towards ERZIRUM. In ARDACHAN he tooke a surceigh of his armie, and there gaue his souldiours leaue to depart: himselfe afterwards arriuing at ERZIRUM, hated of all his souldiours, enuied by his captaines, derided for the losse of his women, and fallen into the disgrace of euerie man. No lesse than the rest was the Turkish emperour discontented with him also: first for that he had done nothing worth the speaking of, in reuenge of the shamefull iniurie done by Manucchiar the Georgian, and yet so mightily discontented his souldiours: and secondly, for that without any care he had suffered Aliculi Chan the Persian prisoner to escape away; about whose flight it was thought he could not chuse but haue some intelligence. For Ferat, after he was by new order from the court to diuert his journey from NASSIVAN to the straits & narrow passages of GEORGIA, being desirous to be thoroughly enformed of those dangerous waies; in this second yeare when he remoued from ERZIRUM, tooke Aliculi Chan out of prison, of purpose to vse him as his guide in those dangerous straits, and therefore carried him vnder a guard (whatsoever it was afterwards) of his most faithfull vassals, still intreating him well, and taking such order as that he wanted nothing: at last being come to the straits of TOMANIS in GEORGIA, where the Castle (as we haue before said) was erected, he from thence secretly escaped into PERSIA. The manner of his escape is diuersly reported: some say that Ferat in discharge of his promise, for his good direction had gratified him with M his libertie: others say, that Ferat corrupted with money, gaue him opportunitie to escape; some others (with more probabilitie) that this escape was made, neither for money nor discharge of promise, but by the onely vigilancie of Aliculi himselfe, and the sleepe of his keepers; and that watching the opportunitie of the night (a friend to all escapes) he started away. Howso-

After it was, in fine, hee was deliuered from his long captiuitie to the discredit of Ferat, and returned into PERSIA, to performe such enterprises against the Turkes, as shall bee hereafter declared.

Generall Ferat (before his departure out of GEORGIA) had commaunded the Bassa of the dangerous Castle called SATTAN CHASI (in our language, the Castle of the Dimall) which how with great diligence performed, and left therein fiftie pieces of artilerie, and a thousand souldiours vnder the charge of a Sanzacke: and so quieted the passages from fort to fort, as that all the waies from REIVAN to CHARS, and from CHARS to TEHLIS were made easie and safe, and all the means taken away whereby the enimie might be able to plot any new treacherie vpon those passages: B which was no small piece of good seruice. The Persian king in the meane time lying at TAVRIS with his armie, vnderstanding that the Turkes had changed their purpose from NASSIVAN to GEORGIA, so that there was no further need to employ his armie against them for the defence of TAVRIS or NASSIVAN, at last resolved with himselfe to licence his souldiours to depart, and to apply himselfe to more priuat reuenges. For calling Emir Chan vnto him, whom he had left Gouverneur of TAVRIS, and Generall for that part of his kingdome; he required of him the occasion, why he had not performed the great promises which he had made to him before his departure to HAR, nor done his endeour to hinder the Turkes Fabrik at REIVAN: and why he went not out with other souldiours appointed for that purpose, and namely with the Turcomans (as he had promised) to reuenge so great an iniurie, and in best manner he could, to haue endamaged the Turkish forces. Sundrie excuses did Emir Chan alleadge for the colouring of his manifest default, but none sufficient to cleare him of the crimes objected against him by the king and the Sultans: wherefore he was by the king adjudged to haue his eyes burnt out with an hoar yron; and so deprived of his sight, to be deposited of all his goods and shut vp in close prison. Which heauie doome was without further delay accordingly put in execution: whereof within the space of a few moneths, the wicked Chan (but yet a famous souldior) miserably died in prison. Whose death so highly offended the Turcoman nation (who had him alwaies in great estimation) that they absolutely denied their defences for the crowne of PERSIA: and the more, when they heard that the king had bestowed the roume of Emir Chan vpon Aliculi; who although he had in many respects deserued all preferment, yet for that he was an auncient enimie to certaine Turcoman captaines, they would not in any wise endure that he should be exalted to so great an honour. And therefore they waxed more disdainfull and ill affected towards the king, whereby the Persian forces became the more weakened and diuided.

The Turkes notwithstanding the league yet in force betweene Amurath and Rodolph the Christian emperour that now is, did many times make incursions into the vpper part of HUNGARIE, burning the country villages, and carrying away the people into captiuitie: but in their returne, they were oftentimes cut off by the emperours souldiours, and slaine. Which being reported at CONSTANTINOPLE much moued the Turkish tyrant: but when he vnderstood that his men had without any cause made those inrodes into the territorie of the Christians, and so received the foresaid losses, he was againe appealed, and in the beginning of this yeare 1584, renewed the league betwixt him and the emperour for eight yeares more.

Ferat from ERZIRUM aduertised Amurath of all that had happened in his late expedition, desiring him to commaund what he would haue taken in hand the next Spring. But besides this information from him, there wanted not many others which did the like also, although in another manner: declaring vnto the king (and that in an odious sort) the whole proceedings of Ferat, the escape of Aliculi Chan, the shamefull losse of his women, his quarrels with the Ianizaries, his falling out with Vies Bassa, a man well regarded of Amurath himselfe, the disorders of his whole campe for his want of discretions; and to be short, the particularities of all such actions as had not altogether so honourably been by him performed that yeare: causes of themselves sufficient to induce the king to remoue the said Ferat from his Generallship. To which occasions, were also added, sundrie other secret respects: for euer since the last departure of Ferat from ERZIRUM, Amurath had still in his head, the next yeare following to attempt the enterprise of TAVRIS, and thereby to stirre vp through the world, a famous report of his conquests correspondent to his greatnesse. Now among the captaines whom he esteemed to be worthe men, to whom he might with trust commit this so great an enterprise, he bethought himselfe of Osman Bassa, left at SYMACHIA in SIRVAN by Generall Mustapha in the first yeare of this warre: who having in that prouince remained euer since, had without any helpe of the Tartarians; by his owne industrie and valour, to the great contentment of Amurath, brought that large countrey into a reasonable obedience of the Turkish empire: and that which most of all pleased the Turkish emperor, had in a countrey so farre distant maintained his armie; wherewith he had done all this without any expences at all to his king; having now a good while leuied his souldiours stipends vpon the lands and territories of that region; and still exercised a kind of government and soueraigntie ouer those places. Of all which his good proceedings, he had caused intelligence from time to time to be sent vnto the court: by which meanes, and other fauours which he had about the king, there was fostered in the mind of Amurath a wonderfull good opinion of him; so that now without delay he resolved to send for him to CONSTANTINOPLE, and for that purpose, before Feras was arrived at ERZIRUM, he had dispatched certaine Capigi and Chiaus to call this famous warrior vnto him: yet wanted there not some (and those not of the meanest sort) that went about to hinder both his comming to the court; and also these designments of so great importance. For Sciaus the chiefe Visier (who rather for the comeliness of his person and alliance with the king, than for any other his vertues, was mounted to that high roome) did greatly feare least Osman, whose course it was to sit next vnto him in the order of the greatest Bassaes, partly for his experience in matters of warre, and partly for the good affection the king did beare vnto him, should at his comming to CONSTANTINOPLE persuade the king to what he listed, and so peraduenture take from him the chiefeest office, and get into his hands the whole government of the empire, whereby so great wealth was to be gained. Wherefore to rid himselfe of these feares, he cast about by all meanes to keepe him from comming to the Court: but because that to attempt the same openly, might proue a matter both difficult and dangerous, he thought it better to make triall of a more commodious and secret meanes. This Sciaus in consideration of many gifts bestowed vpon him by Mahomet the Cumman Tartar king, had many times excused him to Amurath of diuers accusations which Osman by his letters had laid to his charge, For not aiding him in the subduing of SIRVAN, as he was both by promise and dutie bound: and for all his oversights alleadged such reasons in his behalfe, as if they did not altogether persuade Amurath to be kind vnto him, yet at the least not to carrie a mind of reuenge against him: and had so far proceeded in countenancing this Tartarian king, that there was betwixt them confirmed an interchangeable amitie and mutuall confederacie. Him Sciaus imagined to find willing and readie by all meanes possible, to hinder the comming of Osman his enemy to the Court, if he were but made acquainted with the matter. And therefore Sciaus, as soone as he vnderstood the certaine resolution of Amurath to call Osman to the Court, secretly wrote to the Tartar king, who lay encamped nere to the haven of CAPPA vpon the Fens of MEOTIS, certifying him, That Osman was to come to the Court, and that therefore it were good for him to call to mind, how great an enemy he had been to him, and how much he had endeouored by letters to Amurath, to turne all his hatred and displeasure against him: and withall, That if he was able to doe so much by letters, as if Sciaus had not defended him with verie reasonable excuses, the king had executed his wrathfull indignation vpon him to his great danger; he should then imagine with himselfe, what Osman should be able to doe when he should come in person to the presence of Amurath, and without any mediator, betwene themselves determine of all matters what they should thinke conuenient. These, and peraduenture worse letters which Sciaus wrote to the Tartar, ministred matter enough vnto him to resolve to doe what he might, not to suffer so pernicious an enemy of his to arrive at CONSTANTINOPLE: and especially perceiuing that Sciaus, in whose breast he reposed all his hope and all his protection, did so greatly feare his comming. Wherefore to rid himselfe of that feare, he commaunded twelue thousand souldiours, that changing their weapons and apparell, they should go and lie in wait for Osman in the borders betwene COLCHIS and IBERIA, towards the Tartarian Nomades, by which way he was to come; and so making an assault vpon him, to bereaue him of his life. Hoping that such an outrage once done could not, or would not be imputed to his procurement, but rather to the Tartar Nomades, or to the Mengrellians, or to the Georgians, or to the Moscouites, or to the robbers by the high way; and to be short, rather to any bodie else than to him. This commaundement of the Tartar king, was accordingly by the souldiors put in practise: who without further stay joyned themselves together, and so rode towards the place appointed.

And now were the messengers sent from Amurath, come to Osman, who readily put himselfe on his way towards CONSTANTINOPLE, having left behind him at DERBENT and SYMACHIA two Bassaes, thought to be the most sufficient men in SIRVANIA; having also appointed very good orders in the same, and an assured establishment of all those countreies and places which Mustapha first had subdued, and he himselfe had afterwards maintained vnder the obedience of Amurath. He had also provided for the safetie of his own person, in passing those troublesome and dangerous passages through which he was to trauell, by chusing out foure thousand souldiours which he had tried in diuers battels, and brought vp vnder his own discipline; through whose valour he doubted not safely to passe through the treacheries of the Albanians, and the populous squadrons as well of the Tartarians as of the Mengrellians.

Thus departed he from DERBENT, and coasting along the rockes of CANCAVS (that at all times of the yeare are all white and hoarie with continuall snowes) leaving on his left hand MEDIA, IBERIA, and CHOLCHIS, and on the right hand the famous riuers of Tanais and Volga, euen at his first entrance vnto the shores of the Euxine sea, he was by the abouenamed twelue thousand Tartarians, being apparelled like theeues that lie vpon those wayes, suddenly assailed and fought withall. But like as an huge rocke lying open to tempests and waues, standing fast and vnmoueable in it selfe, resisteth the thunderings and rushings of the great and fearefull billowes: so stood Osman fast and firme, and couragiously sustained this trecherous assault, turning the bold countenances of his resolute souldiours against the rebellious multitude of those traiterous squadrons: who as is their manner in the beginning vsed great force, but finding so stout resistance in those few, whom they had thought with their onely lookes and shoutings to haue put to flight, they began at length to quail. Which Osman quickly perceiuing, couragiously forced vpon them, and in a very short space and with a very small losse of his owne, put those Tartarians to flight, killing a number of them, and also taking many of them prisoners: by whom Osman was afterwards informed (as the truth was) that their king for feare that he had conceiued, least when he came to CONSTANTINOPLE he would procure his destruction from Amurath, had sent this armie to seeke his death. Of which treason Osman caused a perfect proceffe to be made, together with the depositions of the Tartarian prisoners, which he sent the shortest way he could deuise to Amurath at CONSTANTINOPLE; with letters declaring all that had passed, enflaming him to reuenge so grievous an iniurie and so wicked a practise. Amurath receiving these aduertisements from Osman, according to the necessitie of the matter tooke order that Vluçales his Admirall with certaine gallies well appointed, should passe ouer to CAPPA to fetch Osman; and withall to carrie with him Islan, a brother of the Tartar kings, commanding Osman by letters, that he should (to the terrour of others) put to death the treacherous king, and place his brother in his roome.

This Tartar king was one of those mightie princes, who basely yeelding to the Othoman power, led vnder them a most vile and troublesome life, as their tributaries and vassals, always at commaund: whose yonger brother Islan (presuming of the sufficiencie of himselfe and the fauour of the people) going to CONSTANTINOPLE, became a surer vnto the Turkish emperor, to haue his eldest brother thrust out of his kingdome, as a man for his euill government hated of his subjects, and to be placed himselfe in his roome. Which his fute was so crossed by the embassadours of the king his brother, who spared for no cost in the behalfe of their master, that the ambitious youth was sent from the Turkes Court to ICONIUM, and there clapt fast vp in prison: where apparelled like an Eremit, he led his life altogether conformable to his miserie, with such a kind of externall innocence, as if he had beene void of all hope or ambitious desire of a kingdome, but rather like a forlorne and unhappie wretch with vaine affliction and impious deuotion to prepare himselfe to a laudable and honourable death. But whilest he thus liued, sequestred from all worldly cogitations, vpon the discouerie of the king his brothers rebellion he was in more than post hast sent for to CONSTANTINOPLE, and put into the gallies bound for CAPPA, with letters to Osman of the tenor aforesaid. Now in the meane time Osman had by cunning means got into his hands this Tartar king, being as is reported betrayed by his owne counsellours, corrupted with the Turkes gold: whom with his two sonnes Osman vpon the receit of the aforesaid letters from Amurath, caused to be presently strangled with a bowstring, and Islan his younger in his stead.

younger brother to be saluted king in his place, yet as vassale to Amurath. This shamefull death, the vsuall reward of the Turkish friendship, was thought iustly to haue happened vnto this Tartar king, for that he not long before, supported by Amurath, had most vnnaturally deposed his aged father from that kingdome, just vengeance now prosecuting his so great disloyaltie.

Osman embarking himselfe in the forenamed gallies at the port of CAPPA, passing ouer the Euxine sea, and entering into the Thracian Bosphorus, arriued at CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was receiued with great pompe and singular significations of good loue. But with most euident and expresse kinds of joy was he saluted by Amurath himselfe, when by his owne speech and preface he declared vnto him euery particularitie of the matters that had happened in his long and important voyage, and in liuely manner represented vnto him the perils and trauels that he had passed, and the conquests that he had made in SIRVAN. After all which discourses Amurath who longed after nothing more than to see the Persian king somewhat bridled, and the famous citie of TAVRIS brought vnder his own subiection, began to enter into conference with Amurath demands Osman's opinion concerning the enterprise of Tauris.

Osman's resolution.

Osman about that enterprise, and in the end would needs throughly know of him, what issue he could promise him of this his desire; and in what sort by his aduice and counsell the forces should be employed, and the armies disposed for the subduing of that citie, which ouer all the nations of the world was so famous and so great an honour to the Persian kingdome. To all which demands his answere and resolution was, That for so much as the matters of GEORGIA were now well settled, the trecherous passages by the new built forts assured, and the prouince of SIRVAN vnder his obedience established, there was now no cause why he should any longer follow so famous an enterprise, but by the conquest of TAVRIS, &c erecting of a fort in that proud citie, to bring a terrour vpon all PERSIA, and to raise a glorious renoune of so mightie a conquest among the nations of EVROPE: for the accomplishment whereof he thought that either the same armie, or at the most a very little greater would suffice, so that it were raised of the best and choicest souldiours.

By reason of one of the letters which Sciaus Bassa had written to the late Tartar king, and by the instigation of the young Sultan Mahomets mother (jealous of the neere alliance of the great Bassa with her husband, as prejudiciall and dangerous to her sonne) Amurath had in the open Diuano deposed the said Sciaus from the office of the cheefe Visier, and hardly pardoning him his life, at the intercession of his wife, being his sister, had banished him the Court, so that he liued afterwards about CALCEDON, vpon the borders of ASIA, not far from CONSTANTINOPLE. K In a close pallace he had there built for his owne pleasure: in whose rounge he appointed Osman to be cheefe Visier; and to honour him the more, nominated him the Generall of his armie against the Persians. Such power hath vertue, that euen from the very scum of the rascall sort, and out of the rustickall rout of mountaine peasants (which notwithstanding cannot be truly justified of this Osman, his father being Beglerbeg of DAMASCO, and his mother the daughter of the Beglerbeg of BABILON) it doth oftentimes in the course of this variable world draw diuers men into princes Courts, and aduance them to the highest dignities. Truth it is, that from a priuat souldiour, though well borne, he by sundrie degrees grew vp to the highest honours of that so great an empire, and was at one instant created the cheefe Counsellor and Generall of the Othoman forces. Great was the joy that Osman conceived hereat, and great was the desire hee had to make himselfe worthe of so honourable fauours; and the greater confidence he perceived that Amurath had reposed in him, the more eagerly was hee spurred on to doe any thing possible whereby he might shew himselfe to haue deserued the same. And therefore aduising with himselfe, that for as much as the greatnesse of the enterprise required a greater armie than was leuiued in former yeares, so it was necessarie also for him the sooner to send out his aduertisements into all his subiect prouinces, and by his owne example to stirre vp the other capitaines and souldiours, euen in the Winter (though it were as yet somewhat troublesome) to passe ouer to SCYTARIA, and from thence to ANQORI, to AMASIA, to SIVAS, and there in those territories to drine out the time, vntill his souldiours which were summoned were all gathered together. And because vpon this his great speed it might peraduenture fall out, that the enemy misdoubting his purpose for TAVRIS, might prouide a greater armie than they would otherwise, he caused it to be giuen out, That he must goe for NASSIVAN; to the end, that the Persians be beguiled, should not regard the gathering of so mightie an armie as they would haue done if they should haue heard of the Turkes comming to TAVRIS: and so the generall coufening rumor flew, not only through Osman Bassa made cheefe Visier and Generall of the armie.

A through all the cities subject to the Turkes, but into the countries of the Persian also: who not withstanding being very jealous of the citie of TAVRIS, and fearing that the matter would fall out, as indeed afterwards it did, ceased not to make most curiuous and diligent enquire about it: And although the disgrace offered to his embassadour at CONSTANTINOPLE, dissuaded him from sending any other for treatie of peace: yet to spie out the secrets of the Turkes, and to vnderstand the certaintie of their purpose for NASSIVAN or TAVRIS, he sent diuers messengers to Osman, as if he had meant to feele his mind touching a peace, but in very deed for nothing els but to sound his designements: which for all that he could not with all the cunning he could vse, possibly discouer, but still remained doubtfull as at the first, the same still running for NASSIVAN.

B In the beginning of this yeare, now growing towards an end, Amurath sent one Mustapha, one of the meanest of his Chiaus, vnto Stephen king of POLONIA, to excuse the death of Podolonus (so shamefully murdered, as is before declared): as if the same had happened by the infolencie of certaine souldiours, and not by his commaundement: who the better to colour the matter, had brought with him two base fellowes, as authors of that outrage, for the king to take reuenge vpon; but were indeed no such men as they were pretended to be, but rather (as it was thought) men before condemned for some other fact worthe of death, and now sent thither to serue this purpose: for whom the Chiaus (in proud and threatening manner in the name of his master) required to haue present restitution made of all such goods as the Polonian Cossackes had not long before taken from the Turkes, and the capitaine of the said Cossackes to be deliuered also vnto him, to be carried to Amurath: and so hardly vrged the matter, that (notwithstanding the vnworthie death of Podolonus and his followers, and the taking away of his horses) all the goods taken by the Cossackes, were forthwith restored: which the Chiaus almost in triumphant manner presented vnto Amurath at CONSTANTINOPLE.

This Summer also Amurath disposing himselfe with his Muts, was almost dead. These Muts are lustie strong fellowes, deprivied of their speech; who neuerthelesse by certain signes can both aptly expresse their owne conceits, and vnderstand the meaning of others: these men for their secretie are the cruell ministers of the Turkish tyrants: most horrible commaunds, and therefore of them had in great regard. With these Muts mounted vpon faire and fat but heauie and vnreadie horses, was Amurath, vpon alight and readie horse, sporting himselfe (as the manner of the Turkish emperours is) riding sometime about one, sometime about another, and striking now the horse now the man at his pleasure; when suddenly he was taken with a fit of the falling sicknesse, his old disease, and so falling from his horse, was taken vp for dead: insomuch, that the Ianizaries supposing him to haue bene indeed dead, after their wonted manner fell to the spoiling of the Christians and Iewes, and were proceeding to further outrages, had not their Aga or capitaine to restraine their infolencie, to the terror of the rest hanged vp one of them taken in the manner, and certaine others in the habit of Ianizaries. Neuerthelesse, Amurath shortly after recovered againe; and to appease that rumour of his death (openly vpon their Sabbath, which is the friday) rid from his pallace to the temple of Sophia; where I with many others saw him (saith Leunclanius) his countenance yet all pale and discoloured.

E This yeare also happened such a chance as had like to haue raised new warres betwixt the Turkes and the Venetians: which for as much as it is worth the reporting, I thought it not good in silence to passe ouer. The widow of Ramadan Bassa, late Gouvernour of TRIPOLIS in BARBARIE, with her sonne, her familie, and a great number of slaues of both sorts, being about to depart from TRIPOLIS to CONSTANTINOPLE, had rigged vp a faire galley for the transporting of her selfe and her substance, reported to be worth eight hundred thousand duckats: vnto which galley for her more safetie she had joynd two others, as comforts. Thus embarked, she came to the mouth of the Adriaticke, where sayling by CORFU, she was by force of tempest driuen into the gulfie of the Adriaticke. At which time one Petrus Emus, one of the Venetian Senatours, with certaine gallies had the charge for the keeping of that sea against pyrats and all other enemies wholoener. He hearing of the Turkes comming into the gulfie, without delay set vpon them, and being too strong for them, tooke them all: and hauing them now in his power, exercised most barbarous crueltie, as well vpon the women as the men: for hauing slaine the men, in number two hundred and fiftie, and the sonne of Ramadan in his mothers lap, he caused the women, being before rauished, to haue their breasts cut off, and afterwards to be cast ouerboard into into the sea, being in number about fortie. The brother of Emus chancing vpon a beautifull virgine, was by her most earnestly entreated to haue spared her honour; and the rather for that (as she said) she was a Christian, taken prisoner about twelue yeares before in CYPRVS, since which time she had liued in most miserable captiuitie among the Turkes, and being now fallen by good hap into the hands of a noble Venetian, was in good hope to be set at libertie inuiolated: which the most humbly besought him for the loue of God to doe, and not to embroie his hands with her guiltlesse blood, or to dishonour himselfe by forcing of her. But all she could say, preuailed nothing with the cruell and vnbrideled youth, who after he had at his pleasure abused her, cast her with the rest into the sea. It is thought that Emus suffered this so great an outrage (and so farre vnbecoming the honor of the Venetians) to be done, to the intent that none should be left alive to bewray the greatnesse of the bootie, or of the villanie there committed: which was neuertheless (God so appointing it) reuealed by one of the Turkes, who saued by a furlong of CYPRVS, which knew him, and afterwards comming to CONSTANTINOPLE, openly declared the same. With the odious report whereof the Turkes were so enraged, that in euery corner of the citie a man might haue heard them threatening vnto the Venetians most cruell reuenge: yea they had much adoe to hold their hands from the Bailo or Gouvernour of the Venetian marchants in CONSTANTINOPLE, and to forbear to spit in his face, as he went in the streets. At that time was one Io. Franciscus Maurocenus (or as they commonly called him, Moresin) Bailo at CONSTANTINOPLE: who vnderstanding that Amurath in his rage was about to send one of the great gentlemen of his Court, whom the Turkes call Zausij (the great Turkes vsuall ambassadors) to VENICE about that matter, found meanes to haue him stayed at CONSTANTINOPLE, and another of lesse authoritie sent to expositulat the matter with the Senat, and in the name of Amurath to require to haue the offendour punished, and the gallies with the slaues and goods restored: so should the league betwixt him and them continue firme, whereas otherwise he should be constrained by force of armes to reuenge the wrongs done to his subjects. This message being by the said messenger deliuered at VENICE, the Senatours after diligent examination of the matter, returned this answer: That the widow of Ramadan with her familie comming to ZACYNTHVS, an island of theirs, was there honourably entertained, and presented with certaine courteous presents; but departing thence, and comming to CEPHELENTIA, another of their islands, her people running on land, contrarie to the conditions of the league, made spoyle of whatsoever they could light vpon, sparing neither man nor beast: Of which their insolencie their Proueditor vnderstanding, and making after them, found them in armes within the gulfe; and comming neere vnto them, was neither by them saluted, as the manner at sea is, neither was any top saile stricke, in token that the command of that sea belonged vnto the Venetians, all which they ought by the league to haue done: for which their outrages and proud contempt their Proueditor had taken so sharpe a reuenge: neuertheless, they promised in that case to doe what befecemed them in reason and justice to doe, for the satisfying of his desire. With which so reasonable an answer Amurath seemed to be well contented, but being indeed loth to entangle himselfe with warres against that mightie State at sea, his warres against the Persians being not yet finished: yet shortly after Emus was for his dishonourable and cruell dealing with the ladie and her familie worthily condemned and beheaded, and the gallies with all the goods and slaues restored. This great woman had in those gallies foure hundred Christian slaues, all which vpon the taking of the gallies were (as the manner is) set at libertie, for whom the Venetians made restitution of as many others of the Turkes.

Ramadan Bassa, the husband of the aforesaid great ladie, was Gouvernour of TRIPOLIS in BARBARIE and of the countrey thereabouts: who hauing warres with one of the barbarous kings of the Moores, went out against him with all his forces, wherein were certaine companies of Ianizaries, sent by Amurath from CONSTANTINOPLE. Now in this countrey, as in many other places of AFRICKA, are great and desert sands, ouer which whofoeuer is to passe, must prouide himselfe both of victuals and skilfull guides, without which they are not without danger to be passed: Ramadan with his armie vnprouided both of the one and the other, hauing entered these deserts, was at length brought to that case, that he could neither goe forward, neither without losse of his men returne. Yet at length he retired, and got home, but not without the losse of some of his people, and the manifest danger of his whole armie: for which his improuidence the Ianizaries fell into such a rage, that not respecting the honour of the man, or regarding the

A displeasure of their soueraigne, they fell vpon him and slew him. At which their insolencie, if Amurath did winke, and passe it ouer vnpunished, let no man maruell: for why, the auncient obedience of those martiall men is not now as it was in former times, when they were with a more seuerer discipline gouerned; but now growne proud and insolent (as the manner of men is, liuing in continuall pay) with weapons in their hands doubt not to do whatsoeuer seemeth vnto themselues best; be it neuer so foule or vnreasonable. Which although it be in many places of this Historie to be seene; yet for the more manifestation thereof I thought it not amisse here briefly to set downe an example or two of their notorious insolencie.

Not many yeares before, the Ianizaries in CYPRVS with like insolencie slew Achmetes Bassa Gouvernour of that island, pretending for the colour of so foule a fact; That he had defrauded them of their pay, and oppressed them of the countrey with intollerable exactions. Amurath highly offended with this their disloyaltie in killing their Generall, whom they had neuer before complained of; thought it much to concerne the maiestie of himselfe, and the repressing of the like insolencie in others, not to suffer it to go vnpunished: and for that purpose sent another new Gouvernour into CYPRVS, with ten gallies furnished as well with other necessarie prouision, as with such a conuenient number of souldiours as might suffice to chastice the insolencie of the chiefe offendours. This new Gouvernour arrived in CYPRVS, dissembling the secret commandement he had for the executing of the transgressours, by certaine trustie men gaue it out among the Ianizaries, That Amurath was so farre from being angrie with the death of Achmetes, as that he thought him worthily slaine by the Ianizaries for defrauding them of their wages, and oppressing of his other subjects: which report the new Gouvernour had of purpose giuen out, to put them in securitie, and without farther trouble to bring them into his danger. Hereupon the Ianizaries cheerfully and with all due reuerence receiued their new Gouvernour: but shortly after to be sure, they by an vnexpected guile when as nothing was lesse feared, compassed in all the new come souldiours, and slew them euerie mothers sonne; and not so contented, seized also vpon the gallies that brought them. Which second outrage, though Amurath tooke in euill part as seeing his maiestie therein contemned, yet was he content to passe it ouer, being loth to adde domesticall troubles to the great wars he had in hand with the Persian.

But to end this matter with the opinion of one of their owne greatest Bassaes concerning these maisterfull men: It fortuneth, that whilst Busbequius embassadour for Ferdinand the emperour vnto Solyman, lay in the Turkes campe (at such time as Solyman in person himselfe was gone ouer the strait into ASIA, to countenance his eldest sonne Selymus against his younger brother Biazeret) that vpon a light quarell (though heauily taken) betwene the followers of the said embassadour, and certaine Ianizaries washing themselves at the sea side; the embassadour for the quieting thereof, was glad to vse the helpe of Rustan the great Bassa, Solyman his sonne in law; who vnderstanding the matter (by a messenger sent of purpose) aduised the embassadour to cut off all occasion of contention with those most naughtie fellowes: asking him farther, if he knew not that it was now the time of warre, in which time they so reigned, as that Solyman himselfe was not able to rule them, but stood in feare of them. Which speech fell not rashly from Rustan, a man right well acquainted with his lord & masters griefe: for that most notable prince feared nothing more, than least some secret & dangerous treason should lie hidden among the Ianizaries, which breaking out vpon the sudden, might worke his finall destruction; whereof hee needed not to seeke for any farther example, than to his grandfather Biazeret. For, as true it is, That great are the commodities of a perpetuall armie of a princes owne; so are the incommodities also not small, if they be not carefully met withall: but especially for that the prince is euer in doubt of rebellion; and that it is still in the power of those armed souldiours, at their pleasure to translate the kingdom to whom they list. Whereof there haue been many great examples, although there are many waies for the remedying of the same.

But now that we haue by occasion of the occurrents of that time a little stept out of the way, let vs returne againe vnto the wars of PERSIA, the chiefe object of Amuraths hautie desires. Now according to the commandements gone out through all the cities of the empire, the souldiours of all sorts began to flock together: and all those that were either desirous to be established in their former charges and gouernments, or ambitiously sought to be now promoted, repaired to Osman as vnto a king, and the soueraigne moderator of the Turkish empire, presenting him with large and liberall gifts, whereby he gathered together a huge heape of infinit treasure: and so so entertaining them with all affable courtesie, and promising both rewards and honours, to such as would follow him in his purposed expedition; he leuied a wonderfull great number both of men and monies. And now was the time come that called him away to go towards Egypt, where he was greatly expected of his huge armie there assembled together. And now, considering the great dearth of victuall that commonly reigneth in those quarters, yet thither he must, where he arrived about the latter end of the month of July in the year 1585; and there taking a view of his whole armie, and of all the provision necessary for so important and famous an enterprise, he daily laboured to hasten his departure. In this city of Egypt were met together all the souldiours of the prouinces that were yent to lend help; but yet in a greater number than euer was gathered by any Generall before: for that euery man forooke his owne priuie busynesse, and vpon assured hopes of new rewards and yauoured honours, were all reduced to follow the fame of this their new Visier and Generall. Onely the people of Egypt and Damascus were busied with other more priuie quarrels at home, whereof because they were both of great importance, and also fell out at this verie instant (leaving Osman with his armie for a while at Egypt) I will in a few words as I may make a brieue rehearsal.

Hassan Bassa the queenes Eunuch sent to Caire to gouerne there.

Amurath had heretofore taken Hassan Bassa the Eunuch out of the Serraglio, from the charge he had there to serue in the queenes Court; and at her instance sent him, as Bassa to Caire the great cite of Egypt. Which great office, beside the honour belonging vnto it, is also beneficiall to them whose good hap it is to be advanced thereunto: the riches the multitude of people inhabiting therein being so great, that it seemeth not to be one citie; but rather to containe within the large circuit thereof many cities. This man being exceeding covetous, and therefore desirous to handle the matter in such sort as that he should little need to seeke for any more such grants at the kings hands, fought by all manner of meanes to oppress the whole nation, and by all importunities to wring and extort from them rewards and bribes, without regard of honestie or reason. By which his sinister and corrupt dealing, he had now made himselfe so odious and intollerable to the people in generall, that they in great number, and many times, began to go to Constantinople, and with humble petitions to request the king to take from them such a cruell and vnjust Gouernour; so that generally in the Court there was no talke but of the villanies and mischiefs that were reported of the covetous Eunuch. At last Amurath seeing that these publike exclamations went daily so farre, as that he could not for shame let them go any further without due punishment, he resolved with himselfe to call him to the Court; and having sent vnto him certaine messengers, admonished him sundrie times to returne home. But the Eunuch loth to leaue so fit an occasion to enrich himselfe, did still delay his returne, alleading diuers fained excuses for his longer stay. Which thing when Amurath vnderstood, thinking himselfe thereby deluded, he determined to provide for so great a disorder, and by punishing of the mischieuous Eunuch, to satisfie in some part the discontented minds of his oppressed subjects in Caire.

Ebrain Bassa in speech to marrie Amuraths daughter.

There sat at that time among the chiefe Bassas of the Court one Ebrain (or as most call him Ibrahim) by nation a Sclauonian, a young man of the age of two and thirtie years or therabouts, of verie faire conditions, and of a reasonable judgement: vpon whom Amurath himselfe had determined to bestow his owne daughter to wife; and so to make him his sonne in law. And therefore being now minded to remoue the Eunuch from his office, and to satisfie the citie; and being also willing withall to giue meanes to his said sonne in law to enrich himselfe: he resolved to send him as generall Syndic, and soueraigne iudge into Egypt, giuing him in particular charge, to remember how wickedly his predecessour had dealt before him. And so this new Bassa tooke his journey towards Egypt, although there ran before him a great rumour of his comming, and of the great authoritie wherewith he was sent. At which report, as the Egyptians rested content and joyfull, so the Eunuch waxed verie sad and sorrowfull: perswading himselfe, that this alteration could not but engender some strange issue and effect against him. Whereupon aduising himselfe, to provide better for his owne affaires and the safetie of his life, he resolved not to stay the comming of the new Gouernour: but departing out of Egypt, with great care and circumspection for feare of meeting with Ebrain, he trauelled towards Constantinople in hope to appease the kings wrath, or at least by mediation of bribes, and by the intercession of the queene to find him more fauourable than he should find Ebrain; who without doubt would not haue spared any extremitie or crueltie, to haue bereft him both of his goods

A goods and life together. Amurath aduertised from Ebrain of the sudden flight of the Eunuch Bassa out of Egypt, and hearing withall that he kept not the high way from Caire to Constantinople, began to feare least when he came into Soria he should flie into Perisia to the king, and so worke him double and treble damage; as one that had already gathered a huge treasure, and hauing long liued in the Court, knew the most secret affaires thereof, and had learned all the priuie deuises and fashions of the Serraglio. Whereupon he with all diligence dispatched his Imbrahur Bassi (whom we may call Master of his horse) with fortie of his Capigi (all gentlemen Vthers, and officers of most secret & neereest roomes about him) with charge and commaundement, that if they met him they should bring him to the Court; vsing all the aid and assistance of his people that might be requisite: and for that purpose deliuered vnto him verie effectually and large letters, after the best manner of the Court. This messenger with his appointed traine departed, and without any extraordinarie enquire found the Eunuch in Soria, encamped in the plaines neere vnto the citie now called Amant, but in times past Apamea; the principall citie of that countrey. As soone as the Eunuch vnderstood of the comming of the Imbrahur himselfe, he gaue order to his guard of slaues, which in great number with speares and arcubuses did ordinarily keepe his pavilion, that they should not grant entrance into his tent so any, but onely vnto the Imbrahur himselfe, and if need were, by force to keepe the rest of the Capigi from comming in. Which order was in verie good time giuen; for as soone as the kings officer had discovered the tents of the fugitiue Bassa, in all hast he ran towards the same, and seeking out the greatest among them, went presently thither to haue entred with all his followers: but the slaues being in armour opposed themselves against them, and permitting onely the Imbrahur to enter in, entertained the rest of his traine without. The Imbrahur being come in, read vnto him the commaundement which he had from the king to bring him to the Court; and most instantly moued him, that without any further resistance he would quietly go with him. To whom the warie Eunuch answered: Behold, how without any calling of the king, or conducting by you, I come of my selfe, well assured to find not onely pardon and pitie, but also fauour and grace in the sight of my lord; whose vpright and mild nature, the wicked treacheries of my false accusers cannot abuse, to the preiudice of me an innocent. And so without more adoe they went all to Constantinople: the Eunuch yet still standing vpon his guard.

The waitinge of the craftie Eunuch.

The politlicke and craftie Eunuch had in this meane time dispatched diuers postes with letters D to the Sultan ladies, certifying them of his comming, and principally beseeching the queene to protect him, and to appease the kings wrathfull indignation, that happily he might haue concealed against him; and so at length they arrived at Scvta. As soone as Amurath vnderstood of his comming thither, he caused all the treasure which he had gathered to be taken from him, with all the rest of his priuie substance, and the wretch himselfe to be clapt vp in prison in the Iadricula or seauen towers. Where after he had languished many daies, still fearing some deadly blow, he at length receiued from the queene, an vnexpected, but most welcome aduertisement, That he should be of good cheere and quiet himselfe, for that his wealth had already saued his life, and that she hoped in short time to procure him also his libertie: Which in deed she brought to passe; for she her selfe made earnest petition to Amurath her husband, that for as much as he had bereft her Eunuch of all his goods, he would yet at least deliuer him out of prison, and restore him vnto her againe. Which request of the queenes was granted accordingly, and the Eunuch enlarged: but the treasure that he had so vnjustly scraped together in Egypt, that remained still among the gold and other jewels of the kings.

The Eunuch cast in prison at Constantinople, and his euill gotten goods confiscated.

But Ebrain Bassa with his new commission now arrived in Egypt, had in short space by far more sinister deuises than had the Eunuch before him, scrapt together such an infinite heape of riches, as was able onely of it selfe to make him worthie of his promised wife, and therefore he was called home to the Court to accomplish the intended marriage. With this commaundement to return to Constantinople, he receiued also in charge, to make his journey through the people of Druvia; and such as he should find loyall, to confirme them in their due obedience, and to make them pay their ancient duties; but such as he should find stubborne and disobedient, he should quite root them out and destroy them. This commaundement Ebrain presently put in execution, and hauing packt vp together all the riches he had gathered in the time of his government, and raised good store of souldiours in that prouince, he tooke with him thirtene Sanzackes, that were ordinarily accustomed to sit as assistants vnder the government of the Bassa in the ruling of the populous territories of CAIRE: and so set forwards towards GAZA, G passing ouer those vast and huge wildernes of sand that lie betwene CAIRE and GAZA. From GAZA, joyning the Sanzacke thereof with him, he went to IERUSALEM: & from thence causing the Sanzacke there also to follow his traine, he turned by SAFFETTO, by LEZIVM, by NAPLOS (called in times past SAMARIA) still taking with him the Sanzackes of all those places, and at last turned himselfe towards DAMASCO: so that before he joyined with the band of DAMASCO, he had gotten together eightene Sanzackes, with all their squadrons of souldiours and slaues. Besides these, hee had also his owne priuat Court, which was wonderfull populous, and two hundred Ianizaries of CONSTANTINOPLE, whom Amurath would needs haue him to take with him at his departure from the Court, so that he had in his armie almost twelue thousand horsemen. From DAMASCO, Vies the Bassa was come as farr as IERUSALEM to meet him, with all the souldiours vnder his gouernment, in number about two thousand persons. Besides that, there came vnto him by the way of SIDON the Aga of the Ianizaries of CYPRVS, with all the band of that desolat and destroyed island: which captaine with his souldiours was transported ouer into the maine in those gallies that by the kings appointment were sent to fetch Ebrain: who now strengthened with all these souldiours, had purposed the vtter ruine of the disobedient Drusians, and the raising of his owne glorie, by triumphing ouer them.

These Drusians, against whom these great preparations were now made by this new captaine, and of whom the Turkish emperour is so suspitious and doubtfull, are supposed to be by descent, Frenchmen, the reliques of those that with great deuotion did in times past fight those memorabile and Christian battels in IVERIE, and recouered the holy citie: but being afterwards brought low, partly by the plague, and partly by the furie of the Barbarians, mingled their seed with the circumcised nation, and so together with their authoritie and command lost also their first faith and religion: yet so, that they grew into an haired of the Turkish superstition, and abhorring the circumcision of the Iewes, betooke themselves to a new prophet of their owne called Isman, whose doctrine they follow. The right Drusians liue vncircumcised, neither doe they forbeare wine as doe the Turks: they make it lawfull among them (most vnlawfully) to marrie with their owne daughters: the Turkish gouernment they haue sought by all meanes to eschue, and notwithstanding all the endeouours and attempts of the Turkish tyrants, but especially of Selymus the second, yet haue they alwayes beene subiect to their owne naturall princes, and would neuer admit any captaine or gouernour of the Turks within the countries which they possessed. They are a people very warlike, stout, resolute, and religious obseruers of their owne superstition: in battell they vse the arcubuse and scimitar, yet some of them at this day do serue with lances and darts: they are apparelled after the manner of the Easterne people, with a turbant on their heads, and breeches they neuer weare, but in stead thereof they couer those parts with their coat, which reacheth downe to their knees, buttoning it vp before. Their feeding is grosse, and of mountaine meats. They inhabit all the country that is enuironned within the confines of IORDAN, above CAESAREA and PALESTINA, and within the riuers of Orontes and Jordan, stretching it selfe euen to the plaine of DAMASCO, neere to the hils that compasse it about vpon the coast of mount Libanus. They were all in times past good friends and confederats, so that they were greatly esteemed: but now being at variance, through greedinesse and couetousnesse, they were deuided among themselves, one seeking the destruction of another. At this time they were gouerned by fise chiefe captaines or gouernours: one of them was called Ebne-man, and of the Turkes Man-Ogli; another Serafadin; the third Mahamet Ebne-mansur; the fourth Ebne-free; and the fift Ali-Ebne-Carsus, by the Turkes called Ali-Carsus-Ogli. Vnder these, who indeed carrie the title and authoritie of an Emir (that is to say, King or Chiefe) there are diuers their lieutenants or deputies, whom they call their Macademi or agents. Ebne-man or Man-Ogli inhabited the mountaines and fields that are contained vnder the iurisdiccions of CAESAREA, of PTOLEMAIDA, of TIRVS, and of SIDON, and had his residence for most part vpon the hill, in a towne called ANDARA: he was very mightie in men and armour, and since the time that by treacherie his father was murdered by Mustapha then Bassa of DAMASCO, alwayes a deadly enemy to the name of the Turkes. Ebne-free, Ebne-carsus, and Ebne-mansur, were alwayes great friends, but now especially at the comming of Ebrain Bassa they shewed themselves more straightly confederated together. Serafadin and Man-Ogli were euer opposit against them: so that the one side procuring the ouerthrow of the other, they lost their strength, and left no means to defend themselves

A selues against the Turkes, who had long lien in wait for their libertie. Now as soone as the news came among them, That Ebrain being departed from CAIRE, was comming into SORIA to subdue them; the three confederats aboue named resolu'd among themselves to goe and meet this great Bassa, and to submit themselves vnto him, of purpose to turne all the intended mischief vpon Serafadin and Man-Ogli their enemies. And so hauing packed vp great store of money, cloth of silke, cloth of woollen, and cloth of gold, with many loades of silkes, and other things of exceeding value, euery of the three being accompanied one with some two thousand, another with some three thousand men, they put themselves vpon their journey towards Ebrain, and met him at IERUSALEM, where he was already arriued. This their comming Ebrain tooke in wonderfull good part, and courteously accepted those their rich and great presents which they brought him; and by the offers of their fidelitie, and the grievous accusations they made against the other two Drusian lords their enemies, began to conceiue great hope of his intended enterprise: for why, he saw that nothing could more easily compass their ouerthrow than this their discord. Being thus accompanied, he came by the way of DAMASCO to the champaigne of BOCCA, and there encamped. This was in the moneth of Iuly this yeare 1585. The whole army that was with Ebrain, reckoning also the souldiours of the three Drusian lords, was about the number of twentie thousand horsemen strong. In this place there came people out of all quarters thereabouts with presents to honour the Bassa, to whom he likewise yeelded such small fauours as his couetous nature could afford them.

From this place also Ebrain presently sent letters to Serafadin and Ebneman, whereby he enuited them to come vnto him, to acknowledge their obedience vnto the Sultan: for that otherwise they might assure themselves to be in short time depriv'd both of their estates and liues. For all that, Man-Ogli would not by any meanes come in. But Serafadin being poore both in wealth and forces, resolu'd to come, in hope by rich presents to purchase his attonement with the great Bassa. And therefore hauing packed vp together diuers loades of silkes, great store of money, and many clothes of good value and beautie, and also attended vpon with diuers of his subiects, he arriued at last at the paullion of Ebrain with these his rich presents; which were there readily receiued, and he himselfe with great attention heard: whose speech in effect tended to no other end, but onely to persua'de the Bassa, That he had alwayes beene a deuoted vassale vnto Amurath, and that he had carried a continuall desire to be employed in any his seruice: and that now being led by the same affection, and assured of his fauour, by the friendly and courteous offers made him in his letters, he was come to shew himselfe vnto him to be the same man, and so proffered him whatsoever lay in his slender power to performe. Whereunto Ebrain made no answer at all, but onely asked him the cause why he liued continually in discord and brawles with the three Emirs (who also sat at that time in the same paullion.) Whereunto Serafadin answered, That it was not long of him, who as one desirous of peace, had not at any time taken vp armes but in the just defence of himselfe, against the injuries of those his enemies; who because they were more mightie than he, fought continually to oppresse him. Hereat the three conspirators arose, and with their grim lookes bewraying their inward hatred, falsly charged him to haue beene euer the author of those brawles: adding moreover, That his insolencie was at that time growne so great, as that no strange vessell durst for feare of him arriue at the ports of SIDON, TIRVS, or BERITO, nor any marchant or marchandise passe ouer the plaines: but that those countries, as though they were a prey and spoyle to the theecs of ARABIA, were generally shunned of all travellers both by sea and land, to the great hinderance of the Sultans customes. Serafadin would hereunto haue gladly replied, but preuented by Ebrain, and surcharged with many injurious words, was committed to the custodie of the two hundred Ianizaries of CONSTANTINOPLE. And so being by them brought into a rotten tent that was appointed for him, was euery night from thence forward put in the stockes fast chained, and continually guarded with a trustie guard of the same Ianizaries. In the meane time came the answer of Man-Ogli, who wrote backe vnto the great Bassa Ebrain as followeth:

To the Lord of Lords, Soueraigne aboue the great ones, the mightie, the noble captaine, cousin to the graund Lord, and the worthiest among the elect of the Prophet Mahomet, the noble and famous lord Ebrain Bassa, God giue good successe to his haughtie enterprises, and prosperitie in all his honour. A letter of Man-Ogli to

thee, and serue thee alwaies in any occasion that it may happen thee to stand in need of my helpe: For I know that thou wouldest rest assured of the reuerence that I beare towards thy lord, and of the most fervent desire wherein I lye to serue him, and to employ both my substance and my life in his service; whereof I haue also giuen some testimonie, though but small, in the managing of his vissions: that I haue receiued: wherein I haue alwaies so carried my selfe, as that I am for his sake, ready to do any thing that Ebrin Mansur (who is now with thee) hath comd me. For although by his comings to meet thee euen as farre as IERUSALEM, he would make assay of his fidelitie; yet dost thou in more than two hundred thousand duckats of the kings; which he doth most unustly desire from him of his customes. But my hard fortune will not graunt me the favour that I may come vnto thee: for there are at this present with thee three of mine enemies, who (I know well) being not contented haue alwaies disquieted and troubled my estate; doe now seeke to bring me into so great hatred with thy heart, that if thou haddest me in thy hands, thou wouldest without any consideration breake me of my life. And I am assured, that this sending for me importeth no other thing, but onely a desire thou hast to imprison me, and so to kill me. For I know how much thou art giuen to great enterprises. Besides this, my coming is also hindered by mine auntient oath that I took: when being yet but a child, I saw mine owne father so villanously betrayed by the murdering sword of Mustapha, being at that time the Bassa of DAMASCO: who vnder the colour of vnsuited friendship got him into his hands, and traiterously stricke off his head: For in truth I carrie the image of my fathers reuerend head, all pale, and yet as it were breathing, imprinted in my mind; which sometimes presenteth it selfe vnto me, as well sleeping in the darknesse of the night, as also waking in the light of the day, and talking with me, calleth to my remembrance the infidelitie of the murdering tyrant, and exhorteth me to keepe my selfe aloofe from the hands of the mightie. And therefore I neither can nor may obey thy requests, and in that respect it grieueth me, that I shall seeme disobedient vnto thee; being in any other action and in all my cogitations wholly addicted to doe any seruice not onely to thee, who art most worthie to be reuerenced of farre greater persons than I am, but also to euery the least vassale of Amuraths. Thou wilt pardon me I hope, and thou shalt well perceiue, that if there be any thing neere me that may be acceptable to thee, all that I haue whatsoeuer, though in respect of thy selfe it may seeme vile and base, yet is it thine, and is now referred wholly for thee, and not for me. Farewell, and commaund me, and hold me excused vpon these iust causes which thou hearest, for my being so backward in coming to honour thee, as my dutie requireth.

The poore and the least among the slaues of the graund Lord,

The Sonne of Man.

Ebrin burneth 24 townes of Man-oglis.

Ebrin perceiuing by this letter the resolution of Man-ogli, resolved also in himselfe to goe vpon him with all his armie, and either by force or sleight to get him into his hands, or at least to draw from him so many arcubuses, and as great gifts and tributes as possibly he might: and therefore rising with his campe, and turning himselfe toward the countrey of Man-ogli, he burnt and destroyed foure and twentie of his townes; and so mounting vp certaine rocks of LIBANVS, vpon the top of a large hill (that standeth ouer ANDRA and other places belonging to Man-ogli) he encamped himselfe. But whiles the armie was thus marching forward, Vais Bassa of DAMASCO with a great part of his people, and his sonne the Sanzacke of IERUSALEM, with his souldiours likewise, to the number of fifteene hundred persons, hauing separated themselves from the rest of the armie, in manner of a reward; as they were busie in raising their tents, vpon the sudden were furiously assaulted by a great band of Drusians, of the faction of Man-ogli, and discomfited. Which victorie the Drusians so prosecuted, that they became lords of the pailions, the wealth and armour of the Turks: and leading away with them their horses and their carriages, put to the sword fise hundred persons, and scarce gaue any leisure to escape either to the Bassa the father, or the Sanzacke his sonne, who fled straight to IERUSALEM, and neuer returned againe to Ebrin; but Vais his father still followed the armie with those few which he had left, and was thought worthie of all men to be pitied.

Vpon the hill aforesaid Ebrin continued foure and twentie daies together, with abundance of all things necessarie for victuall: during which time he attended nothing else, but to trie all deuises how he might draw money and presents from Man-ogli, or how he might traue him into his

A his hands. For the compassing whereof, he dispatched one Gomeda (Ebrin Mansurs Agent) to Ebrin sendeth Man-ogli, being in ANDRA; to tell him, That for as much as he would not giue credit to the promise which was made him, nor aduenture himselfe into the hand of his friend, he should send vnto him all the arcubuses he had: for that the Sultans pleasure was, that his people that went not to the wars in his seruice, should not be furnished with so great store of weapons, to the danger of their neighbours, and of the subjects themselves. With great griefe of mind did Man-ogli behold the messenger, as the man whom he well knew to be the Agent of his deadly enemy; yet in regard of him that sent him, he forbore to doe him iniurie, or to giue him any reproach; telling him, That all his people and weapons were dispersed abroad ouer his territorie, so that he could not tell what arcubuses to send him: with which cold answer Gomeda returned. Which thing when Aly Bassa of ALERPO vnderstood, he offered himselfe to the Generall, that hee would go vnto him, and that to some better purpose. Many reasons did Aly Bassa vse to persuade the warie Drusian to come and yeeld his obedience to Ebrin, swearing that no harme should be done vnto him: and withall promising him great and honourable fauours. But neuer could he remoue the resolute and prouident mind of Man-ogli, or win him to yeeld himselfe into the hands of a man, whom he thought to be so murderous: yet at last with much adoe he prevailed so much with the Drusian lord, that in signe of the reuerence he did beare towards the Generall, and of his obedience towards Amurath, he was content to send a present to Ebrin. And thereupon gaue him three hundred and twentie arcubuses, twentie packs of Andarine silks, and fiftie thousand duckats to carrie to the Bassa for a gift, and to reconcile him vnto him. For the better effecting whereof, he sent his owne mother to the great Bassa, who in the behalfe of her sonne performed a verie worthie message, excusing him as well in respect of his enemies that far there so neere vnto him, as also in regard of his oath which he had solemnly sworne, That for the treacherie of Mustapha he would neuer commit himselfe into the hands of a Turke: and therefore besought him to accept of the gifts that were sent him, and withall, a mind and heart most readie to serue and obey the king in all occasions; and that he would hold him excused, for that his excuses were both iust and reasonable. Whereunto the Turke replied, That although he had found so foule a fault in Mustapha, who vnder the assurance of his promise and fidelitie had betrayed her husband: yet for all that she ought not to feare any such wicked or infamous act at his hands, who stood vpon his honour and the word of a souldior: And so by oath protesting all faithfull and constant friendship towards him, in token of his sincere meaning he cast a white vaile about her necke, and put another vpon himselfe, and the third he gaue her in her hands: willing her to report to her sonne the oaths he had made, and to carrie him that vaile and bring him with her, protesting no otherwise to intreat him, but as a friend and a brother. The peaceable old woman went her way accordingly, but she neither could nor would go about to alter the purpose of her sonne, but returned to Ebrin such answer as did not greatly please him. After which time, he sought more than euer he did before, to get the warie Drusian into his hands, or at least without regard of shame to draw from him mo presents and weapons. And therefore once againe he sent the craftie Gomeda, to exhort him vpon the faith and promise giuen, to come vnto him: but for all the craft and lying speeches that the treacherous messenger could cunningly vse, he could obtaine nothing of the Drusian lord, but good words onely. Yet at last after much finenesse he prevailed so much, as that Man-ogli was contented by him to send another present to Ebrin, with an expresse condition notwithstanding, that he should cause Ebrin to depart out of those quarters, and that he should not himselfe returne any more to request any thing farther of him. Which he verie largely promised, only desiring him to send a good number of arcubuses, thereby to content the Bassa fully: so he gaue him fiftie thousand duckats mote, and foure hundred and fourescore arcubuses; with a thousand Goats, an hundred and fiftie Camels, an hundred and fiftie Buffes, a thousand Oxen, and two hundred Vnethers. With this rich present came Gomeda to Ebrin, declaring vnto him that this he had got from him, vpon promise that he should not molest the Drusian any more. For which promise he made, Ebrin sharply reproved Gomeda; and threatened to make him know what it was to take vpon him so dangerous a libertie: and for the greater despight both to the one and to the other, Ebrin would needs haue Gomeda himselfe to returne againe with like message to trouble the Drusian. Whereunto although he went in great feare of some mischief by the hands of Man-ogli, yet was there no remedie but needs he must follow the commaund of him, in whose power it was to take from him him both his honour and life; and therefore on he went. But as soone as Man-ogli saw Gomeda G (thinking as truth was, that he came againe about his wonted request) he was with the verie fight of him so farre moued, as that he was euen at the point to haue throwne a dart at him, and so to haue dispatched him, had not the regard of more dangerous effects staied his furie; yet spared he not with ignominious words and deadly threats to disburden his choller. Notwithstanding Gomeda could doe no lesse but accomplish the effect of his fraudulent requests, and so wrought with him, that he drew from him foure burdens more of arcubuses, ten swords and ten guilt daggers, certaine siluer belts, ten packs of silke, and some few pence: causing him withall to protest vnto him, neuer to suffer himselfe to be perswaded to come againe vnto him; for if he did, he threatned to kill him, happen afterward what might of it. With exceeding joy and triumph did Ebrain receiue this present, and thinking now with himselfe that he had gotten a sufficient bootie from him, he determined to rise with his armie, and to sacke all the rest of Man-oglies country. Which he performed accordingly, and being conducted by Emir Ebne-fre, burnt ANDRA the place of Man-ogli his residence, and in two daies burnt and destroyed nineteene other of his townes, with vnspcakable crueltie committing all things to fire and sword. After all this sacking and rasing, Ebrain sent diuers messengers to Man-ogli, to trie whether hee would yet be perswaded to come vnto him, but nothing could moue the resolute Drusian to commit himselfe into his hands, but rather encreased his constancie to auoid a most certaine death. Now the great Bassa still thirsting after blood and reuenge, vnderstanding by a spie, that the captaine of ANDRA (being one of the Factors of Man-ogli) with three hundred and fiftie souldiours was got vp to a certaine hill, into a place of great securitie, he sent Emir Ebne-fre to entice him, and to tell him, That seeing his lord Man-ogli would not come and yeeld himselfe, he should come vnto him; which if he would doe, he would assuredly in despiight of Man-ogli make him a Sanzacke of some of those places which he most desired. The ambitious and vnhedie Macademo suffered himselfe to be easily perswaded, and being accompanied with his three hundred and fiftie followers, went with the said Ebne-fre, and came at last to the pailioun of Ebrain, hauing first caused his afore said men to stay behind in a valley two or three miles off. But Ebrain would not so much as see the Macademo, although both in respect of the nimbleness of his person, and also the fierceness of his lookes he was worthie to be looked vpon: but commaunded him to be kept in a feuerall place from Serafadin, and in the meane time deuised how he might with least losse of his owne men, put to death those three hundred and fiftie the Macademoes followers: which was by training them, by means of the said Ebne-fre, into a certain vineyard, and so hauing brought them into a strait, suddenly to set vpon them and kill them. Which was accordingly performed: for being by the treacherous Emir brought into the place appointed for their slaughter, fearing nothing lesse, they were suddenly enclosed by the Turkes Sanzackes and Ianizaries, and slaine euerie mothers sonne. This massacre thus finished, Ebrain commaunded the Macademo to be brought before him, and without delay to be stripped and slaid quicke: who being come, stoutly vpbraided Ebrain with his promise and his oath; and amongst other speeches which he vttered while they stripped him, said: Cut me off my members, and first putting them into the priuities of that infamous Ebrains wife, put them afterwards into the mouth of himselfe: for so (I trow) he will be contented and satisfied with my flesh. And to them that were the executioners of his painfull death, he said: It is your great good fortune in deed, that with such violence and needlesse deformitie, ye are now able to spill my blood and to take my life from me: where as none of you all had been able, or once durst man to man to haue drawne one drop of it from me, nor to haue endured my countenance. But goe to, proceed in your wicked and vnstable desire of my blood, and fulfill the cruell command of your Master: for in the end there will also light vpon you the iust reward of this so villanous a fact. With these and other such like speeches the miserable wretch was stripped, and three great slashes made on his backe; where they began to flea him; he in the meane time not ceasing to blasphemie their religion, & to curse their king, and their false prophet also. But the barbarous souldiours proceeding in their cruell action, made other like gashes vpon his breast and stomacke; and so drawing the skin downward, could not bring it to his nauell before he was with the extremitie of the paine dead. After this, Ebrain caused the followers of Serafadin (in number about 1500) to be cruelly slaine, and all his country to be most miserably wasted: he himselfe still remaining in chaine.

A to SIDON, where his gallies lay at rode, commaunded, That disembarking foure thousand souldiours, they should sacke all those countries alongst the sea coast euen as far as CÆSARBA in PALESTINE, sparing neither age nor sex, nor any person of condition whatsoever. Which his cruell command was presently put in execution, and three thousand soules brought away captiues, great booties made of much rich merchandise, many townes burnt, sundrie castles rased and laid euen with the ground, and to be short, all the whole countrey of Serafadin and Man-ogli laid vtterly wast and desolat.

Ebrain was now in readinesse to depart for CONSTANTINOPLE, where he was by Amurath expected, as well for his gold as the accomplishment of the marriage. But bethinking himselfe, that whatsoever hitherto he had done would be accounted either little or nothing, vnlesse he provided in some sort for the quieting of those people vnder the Turkish obedience, he determined to nominate one of the three Drusian Emirs that came to him to IERUSALEM; to be Bassa of all those regions. And because Emir Aly Ebne-carfus was the richest and most obedient of them all, he thought good to commit that charge vnto him, and honoured him with that dignitie; yet not without a bribe, but for the price of an hundred thousand duckats. Wherefore he apparelled him in cloth of gold, gaue him a horsemans mase, and a sword all guilt, and deliuered vnto him the kings commission, causing him withall to sweare faith and obedience to Amurath. And so hauing (at least to shew) set in order the affaires of those mountaines, which an hundred of the Turkes great captaines had in former time vainly attempted, he returned to DAMASCO, where he staid twelue daies, by shamefull shifts extorting money from diuers persons. At last hauing no more to doe in those parts, he turned himselfe towards GAZIR and BARVTO, places vnder the gouernment of Ebne-mansur, where he arriued with all his armie, and found the gallies which he had left in the port of SIDON, now in the haueu of BARVTO as he had before commaunded. Now vpon a certaine hill about BARVTO nere vnto the sea, Ebrain had pitched his owne tent only and none other; and hauing sent all the rest of his best and goodly things which he meant to carrie with him to CONSTANTINOPLE aboard the gallies, shrowded himselfe only vnder that narrow and bafe tent. Thither he called Ebne-mansur, and in pleasant manner told him, That now it was time for him to make payment of the debt of an hundred and threescore thousand duckats, which he ought the king his lord for the custome of TRIPOLI and BARVTO: for that he could not longer stay in those quarters, but was to returne to CONSTANTINOPLE, which he knew not how to doe vnlesse he carried with him the discharge of that debt. Whereunto Ebne-mansur made answere, That it would not be long before his Macademoes would come with his monies, and that then he would without farther delay make payment. Which thing Ebrain well knew to be but an excuse, and therefore determined with himselfe to thrust him into the gallies; and because he could not carrie the money vnto the king, yet at the least to bring him his debtor. But for as much as he doubted to put this his determination openly in execution, for feare of some insurrection amongst the people, as well for that he was within the territories of the said Ebne-mansur, as for that he saw him greatly beloued and fauoured of the other two Drusian lords, Ebne-fre and Ebne-carfus: he therefore thought it better policie by concealing this his purpose, to shew him in his outward actions all good countenance, and by secret and subtile meanes to take him prisoner. Whereupon he deceitfully told him, That for as much as he was to stay there for his businesse that night, and was resolued the next day to make a road into the countrey of Man-ogli, he therefore praised him to doe him the fauour to be his guide: and for that purpose, when he should send for him at midnight, that he would come vnto him verie secretly, because he was minded to depart without any stirre, onely with fife hundred men in his companie. The Drusian lord verily beleeued the matter that so it was, and withall was in good hope by that means to find some way to escape his hands. Whereupon being called vp at midnight, he readily went to the tent of Ebrain, who presently charging him (whom all men thought he had especially affected) with many abhominable and foule tearmes, caused a chaine to be cast about his necke and his armes, and so fast bound to be carried into the gallies. And yet not so contented, tooke the spoile of all his countrey, whereby there was leuiued such a prey as was maruellous to behold: for besides money (whereof there was a verie huge summe) the store of clothes of silke and gold was such and so great, as might better beseme some great prince, than such a mountaine rusticall lord as he was. When the Bassa had conueied all this into his gallies he failed to TRIPOLI, where he found Serafadin in the custodie of Veis Bassa and Ali Bassa: and hauing stayed there some few days, wherein he committed sundrie villanous and abhominable robberies, he caused the said Serafadin to be put into the galleys, with all his silkes and other wealth, and so departed for CONSTANTINOPLE: where at such time as he entered into the channell of the citie, accompanied with foure and twentie galleys, hee was encountered and receiued by a wonderfull number of his friends and fauourits, and saluted with an honourable peale of artilerie out of the Seraglio. John Thomas Minadoi the best reporter of this historie, as also of the late warres betwixt the Turkes and the Persians, being then at CONSTANTINOPLE, and hauing (as he reporteth of himselfe) good meanes to see the bountifull and beautifull presents which the spoyling and rauenous Bassa gaue the Turkish king, reporteth the summe thereof to haue bene a million of gold; besides the yearely reuenue of CAIRE amounting to six hundred thousand duckats, with threecore horses most richly garnished, of singular beautie, but especially of the Arabian race, a liue Elephaur, and a liue Giraffe: (which is a beast like a Cammell and a Panther) two great Crocodiles dead; a chaire of masie gold richly set with pretious stones, a casket also beset with pretious stones and gold, many packs of most fine clothes, woollen and silkes, certain other clothes with fringe of gold and siluer and the Barbarian cutworke, most fine linnen of ALEXANDRIA, and all the arcubuses taken from the Drusians: besides sundrie rich presents given by the proud Bassa to the great ladies of the Court, reported by Leunclaius to haue bene worth two hundred thousand Sultanines.

But now for as much as we haue before made mention of the Sanzacke of IERUSALEM, and his flight, it shall not be altogether impertinent to our historie (though somewhat out of time) in few words to declare what passed between him and the Arabians of PALESTINE, a little before the comming of Ebrain the great Bassa into those quarters: by which little, the desirous Reader may easily perceiue the wofull and troublesome state of that sometime most blessed and fruitfull but now most miserable and barren land of IVRIE, and of those places in holy WRIT so much renowned.

In the confines of SODOME, and in the places that lie not only betweene the lake ASPHALITES and DAMASCO, but also in the plaines and in the vallies of ERICHO, and of SAMARIA, and in other places about BETHLEHEM, EMAYS, BETHANIE, BETHPAGE, CAPHARNAVM, NAZARETH, LEVI, BETHSAIDA, NAPLOS, and other townes of name thereabouts, there doe haunt and liue sundrie Arabian captaines; who spreading themselves euen as far as RAMA and IOPPA, ouerrun at their pleasure all the countries there round about, and continually commit greivous outrages as well against the said cities as also vpon the goods and wealth not onely of the inhabitants there, but also of strangers: yea and their insolencie oftentimes groweth so great, that they dare to assault the fenced cities, beside the spoiling of trauellers, that by reason of their businesse haue occasion to passe from one citie to another. They are good horsemen, but vse no armour: their horses are very swift to run, and spare of diet, and are themselves bold and aduenturous theeues. These Arabians hauing had intelligence, that the aforesaid ambitious youth, appointed Sanzacke of IERUSALEM, was in mind to raise all the Sanzackes thereabout; and joyning himselfe with them, and his father the Bassa of DAMASCO, to restrain their insolent libertie, and to worke their destruction; resolved with themselves not to stay vntill he and his confederats were readie, but rather by sundrie inuasions vpon him, euen vnto the gates of IERUSALEM, to prouoke him to come out into the field. And the rather to induce him so to do, they compacted with a certaine Subbassi of BETHLEHEM, their friend, to encourage and animate the Sanzacke thereunto, by promising vnto him good successe and prosperous euents. The ambitious young man, seduced with the glorious persuasions of the false Subbassi, of whom he made good reckoning, and prouoked by their insolencies, resolved (as they had wished) to issue out of the citie into the open field: and thereupon hauing armed an hundred of his vassales, and raised all the horsemen that were vnder his gouernment, to the number of six hundred, he made a rode towards ERICHO, sending before defiance vnto them: against whom the Arabians came accordingly, and with their arrows and Indian canes ouerwhelming his arcubuses, as if it had been a raging flood, wrought him great woe: when in the very nicke the battell yet being at the hottest, the traitorous Subbassi fled towards BETHLEHEM, and left the souldiours of IERUSALEM in the hands of the Arabians, who put most part of them to the edge of the sword, and scarcely gaue li- bertie to the Sanzacke to saue himselfe by flight. The Sanzacke certainly enformed of this fraud of the dissembling Subbassi, to be reuenged vpon him, began also in like manner to dissemble with

The land of Iudie much troubled with the Arabian theues and robbers.

A with him, feigning that he would once more trie his forces against the same Arabians; and so vsed the matter, that the Subbassi arming himselfe, came vnto him, without any suspicion. of the mischeefe intended against him. But as soone as he was come, the Sanzacke tooke him aliue; and presently caused him in most cruell manner to be slaine quicker.

Thus hauing passed ouer the troubles that staied the people of EGYPT and DAMASCO and the countries thereabouts, from resorting to Osman the Turkes great Generall at ERZIRVAN, let vs againe returne thither where we left him, taking a view of the preparations against the Persian; and prosecute those affaires, which of all others most exercised the forces of the two mightiest Mahometane monarchs; and with the expectation thereof filled the world from the East to the West.

B The straight commaundement from Amurath, together with the same and reputation of Osman the Generall, had drawne together such a world of people of all sorts to ERZIRVAN; as that it seemed not the power of one king alone, but rather the vniued forces of many kings. Wherefore Osman perceiuing that he had gathered together too great a number of people and too huge an armie, and that it might fall out that he might want victuall for so great a multitude; neither so greatly fearing his enemies forces, as that he needed to lead so populous an armie against them; determined to discharge a great number of such as he thought most weake, and least able to endure trauell: so that out of this great multitude hee drew out about fortie thousand persons, who liberally according to euery mans abilitie redeeming the ordinarie perils of the warres, returned home to their owne dwellings. And so in Osman armie remained the

C number of an hundred and fourescore thousand persons or thereabouts. With this multitude the Generall departed from ERZIRVAN (about the eleuenth of August this yeare 1585) towards TAVRIS, continuing for all that the speech for NASSIVAN. But he had scarce marched two dayes, when diuers souldiours of GRACIA and CONSTANTINOPLE presented themselves before him, vpbraiding him with great improuidencie, and telling him that they began already to feeble the want of victuall, by wanting the same day their ordinarie allowance of corne for their horses: so that if in the beginning, and as it were in the enterance of so long a journey they felt such want; they could not tell with what iudgement or discretion hee meant to lead so great a companie so farre as NASSIVAN, nor by what cunning conceit he had presumed to sustaine so great an armie in the seruice of their lord. Osman quietly heard their complaints, and presently D provided for them, by causing such store of barley to be distributed among them, as they desired; and severely punished the officers that had the charge for the allowance of corne, who most co- uetously began to make marchandise of the common prouision, by conuerting it to their owne priuatiues. And hauing thus quieted their troubled minds, he proceeded on his journey, and by the way of HASSAN CHALASSI and of CHARS arriued vpon the Calderan plaines, famous for the memorable battels there fought betweene Selymus and Hyssmaell. In these plaines hee tooke a generall review of his armie, wherein there wanted a number, that by reason of sicknesse being not able to continue the journey were enforced to stay behind, some in one place, some in another. Remouing thence, he tooke the way not to NASSIVAN, as he had still hitherto giuen it out he would, but now directly to TAVRIS. Which so sudden an alteration of the jour- E ney, as soone as the souldiours of GREECE and CONSTANTINOPLE heard, they fell into a great rage, and comming againe before the Generall, reuelled with him in this sort to his face.

And what are we thou villaine, thou Turke, thou dolt, whom thou handlest in this sort? We are neither oxen nor sheepe of the mountaines, for the leading of whom thou thinkest thou art come out: neither can we brooke these thy lies and deceits. If thou hast publicly professed to lead us to NASSIVAN, and by that speech hast trained us from the furthest bounds of GRACIA, to what end now after thou hast wearied us so much, dost thou deceiue us with such vanities, and prolong our tour- F ney, and set before us such strange and important dangers as our minds neuer once thought on? But if this was thy first purpose and intent, and that now not foolishly or by chaunce, but vpon premeditation and good aduice thou changeest thine opinion, why diddest thou dismiss so many souldiours, as thou might haue made the armie more terrible and stronger for the enterprise of TAVRIS? Dost thou thinke that by suffering others to redeeme their liberties, and so to encrease thy riches, thou shalt set our liues to sale, and to make us slaues to the Persians?

At these arrogant speeches the Generall was exceedingly troubled, seeing his good meaning, and the earnest desire he had to aduance the maiestie and glorie of his king, taken in so euill part, and

and those his best souldiours so highly offended. And although he could indeed haue readily vfed the sharpest and hardest prouisions and remedies for it, that in such occasions are ordinarily applied: yet vpon good aduice he forbore so to doe, and in stead of rigour and punishment resolved to worke by more easie meanes. VV hereupon causing many of the capitaines and chiefe men amongst those seditious souldiours to come before him, he first perswaded them: That the former speech for NASSIVAN was not raised at all by him, nor that he was minded at that time to goe for TAVRIS: but all that was done, he had done to fulfill the commaundement of the Sultan, who had charged him so to doe, to the end to lessen the Persian preparations: which they would undoubtedly haue made farre greater if the speech had bene given out at the first for TAVRIS: which his princely care of their safetie they for their parts ought willingly to further, for that in so doing they should still preserve that great opinion, which both the king and the world had conceived of their valour and fidelitie. Neither needed they to feare, that the souldiours which were dismissed might weaken the armie, for that they themselves were not onely sufficient to pierce into TAVRIS, and to open the way vpon the enemies, but to daunt them euen with their lookes: and that those which were discharged, had but purged the host of all cowardise, and left nothing in it but vertue and courage. By this mild answer of the Generall the tumultuous souldiours were sufficiently pacified, but much better apayed and contented they were, as soone as he put his hand to the common purse, and bestowed among them all a small quantitie of monies: for by this his kind vsage all their stomackes were overcome, and they themselves became so willing and so courageous, that now they durst venture not to TAVRIS only, but to CASBIN, yea euen to the furthest parts of all the Persian kingdome.

These important outrages thus appeased, the Generall turned himselfe with all his armie towards COY, a citie situate beyond VAN, in the midst betwene TAVRIS and the Marian Meere, where he refreshed his armie with all things he could desire. From COY he passed to MABANT, a citie subiect to the Persians, plentifull also of all things needfull for man or beast. From thence he leaned downe towards SOFFIAN, a fruitful place, subiect also to the Persians; from whence he began to discouer TAVRIS. Great was the joy of the whole campe, and now the mutinous souldiours of GREECE and CONSTANTINOPLE could highly commend the aduice of the Generall, or rather of Amurath himselfe, in giuing out the rumour of NASSIVAN for TAVRIS, as the onely meanes whereby they were in quiet come so farre, the Persians being wholly occupied (as they supposed) about NASSIVAN: in so much that euery man being waxen courageous, and replenished with joy, without any feare at all began proudly to plot vnto themselves nothing but sackings, pillings, taking of prisoners, rauishments, robberies, and all those insolent and outrageous actions that vse rashly to proceed from the greedie affections of those barbarous victors; especially they of the vauward, who being desirous of bootie, and to discouer the enemies countrey, descended downe toward certaine pleasant gardens full of all sorts of trees, springs, and fruits: where hauing satisfied their appetites, they withdrew themselves to a certaine little river neere to a bridge called The Bridge of salt water, and there stayed at pleasure attending the coming of the armie. But euen whiles they were thus enjoying the water, the fruits, the shade, the greene grasse, and other delights of the place, the Persian prince Emir Hamze, king Mahamets eldest sonne, who with ten thousand good souldiours had closely couched himselfe, watching still when some of the enemies bands should come downe to those resting places, suddenly set vpon them with such speed, courage, and furie, that as if it had bene a lightening and in a manner without any resistance he ouerran all those Turkes, and dispersed them, putting to the sword about seuen thousand of them. And so leading away with him many prisoners, horses, slaues, with sundrie ensignes and Turkish drums, he withdrew himselfe backe towards his blind father, who lay then encamped about twelue miles from TAVRIS with fiftie thousand souldiours or thereabouts; Aliculi Chan Gouvernour of TAVRIS being left in the citie with foure thousand souldiours onely. A greater armie than this, not exceeding the number of threescore and foure thousand men, was not the Persian king able to leuie; the principall occasion whereof was the death of Emir Chan, for which the Turcoman nation being waxen rebellious and disobedient, would not by any meanes be brought to defend that citie, whereof Aliculi Chan their capitall enemy was now Gouvernour: and from GEBILAN and HERI there came not so much as one souldior to relieue the necessities of PERSIA. So that with these small forces in comparison of the enemies, the Persian king had no stomacke to meet the Turkish armie in plaine battell, but sought

A sought how he might with as little losse to himselfe as possibly he could, make triall of his forces, and by all politike meanes to weaken and annoy his strong enemy.

Osman vnderstanding of this discomfort of his vauward, forthwith dispatched Sinan Bassa the sonne of Cicala, and Mahamet the Bassa of CARABMIT, with fourteen thousand souldiours to pursue the victorious prince: who in their pursuit vfed such expedition, that at length they ouertooke him in the way towards his fathers campe. But as soone as the prince saw the Turkes so neere him, that without a shamefull and dangerous flight he could not auoid the battell, courageously he turned his face, and joynd with them a most bloudie conflict: which being begun two houres before night, was most fiercely maintained, vntill that the darknesse of the night be- reauing them of the vse of their weapons, enforced both the one side and the other to retire.

B Which was done with the notable losse of the Turkes, who in this second conflict (as it was commonly reported) lost six thousand men: and had (as it was thought) suffered a generall slaughter, had not the night interrupted so vnconuentionall an action, well worthie of a thousand day- lights. So that hitherto the Turkes sustained the losse of more than ten thousand souldiours, and yet had scarce discouered or seene the citie which they so greedily longed after.

The next morning the Turkes campe remoued and came within two miles of TAVRIS, where they encamped. But whiles they were setting vp their tents, Aliculi Chan issuing out of the citie with all his garrison, and such of the citizens as were fit to beare armes, set vpon the face of the vauward being now renewed, and with many cunning turnings and windings so charged them, that with great losse he forced them to retire euen vnto the maine battell: where after he C had espied the great artillerie, he without hurt withdrew himselfe againe to the citie. The confusion of the Turkes in this skirmish was notable, for in a verie small time the vauward was disor- dered, and almost three thousand slaine. But Aliculi not so contented, in the shutting in of the evening sallied out of the citie the second time, and swiftly running along that side of the armie that lay towards TAVRIS, slew the Bassa of MARAS, and did great hurt in that quarter: which done, without any stay he fled to the kings campe, and forsooke the defence of that sorrowfull citie which he could not hold. Neuertheless the Taurisians (as many of them as remained in the citie) gathered themselves together to the gates of the citie, well armed, prepared to make a bloudie entrance for the Turkes whensoever they should come. All the night was spent in watch- ing without rest on either side, and yet nothing attempted: but vpon the breake of the day, a

D great multitude of the feeble sort of the Turkes, and of the common rascall rout, without any order from their capitaines, armed with corselets, speares, and swords, went to the citie with reso- lution to haue sacked it, and so to haue enriched themselves with the spoile and pillage of that wealthie citie. But when they came to the guarded gates of the citie, they found there contrarie to their expectation, a terrible rescue, and were enforced there to joyne an hard and mortall bat- tell: so that the wals, the entrance, yea all the ground thereabouts was bathed with blood, and as it were couered with weapons and dead carcases. And yet for all that, though the Persians stood fast and firme at the arriual of this feeble rout; at the last they were constrained to yeeld the en- trance, being overcome by the multitude of them that out of the campe flowed in vpon them like a flood; and retiring into the citie, now astonied and amazed on euery side, they fortified

E themselves in their houses vnder the ground, and in the corners and winding turnings of the streets: from whence with their arrowes and some few arcubuses, they did the Turkes that entered great harme. Yet were they not able to kill and destroy so many of their enemies, but that at the last they were too mightie for them, and wrought many grievous mischiefs in that wofull citie. And so a great number of this rascall people that remained aline, returned to the Turkish campe, carrying away with them too manifest tokens of the poore oppressed citie: wherein the misera- ble women and impotent soules stood embracing and straining the doores and poasts of their houses, and kissing their native soile, with prayers, mournings, and complaints, bewailing their present miserie, and yet fearing worse to come. Osman the Turkes Generall now made acquaint- ed with these calamities, caused proclamation to be published, That no man should be so hardie F as to molest the Taurisians, &c. in the meane time went himselfe about the citie, viewing through- ly the situation of it, and surveying the place wherein he might both encampe himselfe safely, and with better foundation and greater securitie erect a castle or fort, for the more assurance of that conquered countrey.

The citie of TAVRIS is seated at the foot of the hill ORONTES, about eight daies journey

from the Caspian sea, and is subject to winds, cold, and snow: yet of a verie wholesome ayre, G abounding with all things necessarie for mans life: and wonderfull rich, with perpetuall concount of merchandise brought thither out of the East, to be conuayed vnto the West; and also of others brought out of these Westerne parts, to be dispersed into the East. It is verie populous, so that it feedeth almost two hundred thousand persons: but yet open to the furie of euerie armie, without wals, and vnfortified. The buildings (after the manner of those of the East) are of burnt clay; and rather low than high. For all things it carrieth the name, and was the place of the Persian kings residence, vntill such time as that the late king TAMAS removed his seat from thence farther into his kingdom to CASBIN: neuertheless both before and since, although it had been sundrie times molested by the intodes and furie of the Turkish emperors, yet was it still in great estimation and renowne. H

Of this citie Osman Bassa hauing taken diligent view, caused his tents to be pitched on the South side thereof, where was a spacious garden all flourishing and beautifull, replenished with sundrie kind of trees and sweet smelling plants; and a thousand fountaines and brookes deriued from a pretie riuer, which with his pleasant streame diuided the garden from the citie of TAV-RIS: and was of so great beautie, that for the delicacie thereof, it was by the countrey inhabitants called Sechia Genet (that is to say) the eight Paradises: and was in times past the standing house of their kings, while they kept their residence in this citie; and after they had withdrawne their seat from thence to CASBIN, became the habitation and place of abode for the Gouvernors of TAV-RIS. Of these gardens and places Osman made choise to build his castle in; whereof he gaue the modell himselfe, and commaunded that all the whole circuit of those pleasant greenes should be environed with wals, and trenches digged round about them to conuay the water from the fore-said riuer. Which was accordingly begun with the greatest care that possibly might be: the foundation of the embattled wals laid, the ditches digged fourteen foot broad, & a mans height in depth; and in the space of six and thirtie daies the whole worke finished and brought to an end: great store of artillerie mounted vpon the walles, and diuers bathes, lodgings, and such other houses necessarie for the Turkish vses built within the castle. The first day of this building Osman fell sicke of a feauer with a bloudie flux, which happily was the cause both of the slownesse of the building, and of many other losses that afterwards happened, as shall be hereafter declared. I

The castle of Tauris built in Eight Ianizaries

with certaine Scourges found strangled in a bath at Tauris.

Five daies after the building of the castle was begun, newes was brought into the Turkish K camp, That eight Ianizaries and diuers Spaogians were scene strangled in a bath within the citie of TAVRIS. Whereupon the Zaini, Spahini, and Ianizaries came presently vnto the Generall, declaring vnto him, That although he had with too much clemencie giuen order that no man should hurt or molest the Taurisians, and that according to his pleasure euerie man had vsed mo-destie towards them and obedience to him: yet the Taurisians themselues had most audaciously strangled in one of their bathes eight Ianizaries and certaine Spaogians, which iniurie and inso-lencie (they said) in their judgement was not to be suffered. This outrage so moued the Generall, that without any farther delay he commaunded the citie to be sacked, leauing it wholly to the pleasure of his souldiours: who forthwith so vsed the matter, not as if they would haue reuen-ged an iniurie, but rather at once haue brought an vtter destruction vpon the whole citie. Eue-ry place was filled with slaughter, tauishment, rapine and murder; virgins were deflowred, men-children defiled with horrible and vnspcakable sins; younglings snatched out of their parents armes, houses laid euen with the ground and burnt, riches and money carried away; and in briefe, all things ruined and wasted. Neither were these mischiefs committed once onely, but the second followed worse than the first, and the third vpon that worse than the second: so that it was a miserie almost inexplicable, to behold that citie so populous, so rich, sometimes the court and pallace of the Persian kings, and honour of that empire, now subject to the furie of the Turkes, plunged in calamitie and vtter destruction. L

The miserie of the Taurisians.

The wofull aduertisement hereofore troubled the Persian king, but the young prince his sonne much more; who moued with the passions of most inward griefe, disdain, and dispaire, M and desiring nothing more than reuenge, resolved to attempt any thing whereby to requite so great a wrong. In which resolution hauing confirmed his armie, he commaunded five hundred of his horsemen to present themselues euen to the verie sight of their enemies tents, and as it were to dare them to battell: which thing they performed accordingly, and made a gallant show

A of themselues. At the discouerie whereof, the Turkes imagining that the Persians were come in great number to assaile the armie, order was giuen by the sicke Generall, that Cicala Bassa; and Mahamet the Bassa of CARABMIT, with the people of GRACIA; and all their owne forces should go to encounter the enemy: who presently with their ensignes displayed vnder which there stood about foure and thirtie thousand strong, besides a number of seruile people; yet men exercised in labours and perils, in all well neere fortie thousand, set forward. Now the five hundred Persians, with a maruellous cunning kind of skirmishing dallied with the Turkish souldiours, and drew them forward for the space of eight miles and more: and being brought so farre on, and now forewearyed with the skirmish, were lustily assailed by the Persian prince, who with part of his armie (to the number of about twentie thousand persons) courageously set vpon the two Bassas, and joyned with them the deadliest and cruellest battell that euer was written of:
B Wherein the Persians hauing giuen a most perilous onser and done great harme, it was thought that they would haue contented themselues with so luckie an encounter; and so retired: which the Turkes minding to preuent, and not to returne without a notable victorie; hardly pressed vp-on them, hoping in the end to put them to flight, and so to giue them a bloudie and deadly ouer-throw. But the Persians hauing quietly and with great assurance for a reasonable space endured their charge, at last as if they had been fresh men, made head vpon them afresh, and began a most terrible battell anew: wherein the Bassa of CARABMIT (aboue named) was put to flight, and being wholly dismaied and discomfited, fled backe againe to the campe, carrying with him the most manifest tokens of the vnhappie issue of the battell. Cicala the other Bassa notwithstanding C valiantly and with great cunning still sustained the furie of the Persians, labouring by all meanes to encourage his souldiours, and to haue restored the battell: but when he had done what he could, overcome at last by greater valour, he was enforced to betake himselfe to flight also; and so altogether discomfited, came to the campe without any ensigne, hauing left behind him 8000 of his souldiours dead vpon the ground. Eight thousand Turks slain.

The Persian prince encouraged with this so fortunat a victorie, by speedie heralds sent to the sicke Visier (whom he thought notwithstanding to haue been in health) and gaue him to vnder-stand, that if he were willing to fight he was readie for him, and in what sort soeuer it pleased him to accept of battell, to make him good account of his valour; and to cause him to know, not only that Amurath his master had most vnjustly raised this warre, but also that it had been good D for himselfe not to haue taken the same in hand. Of this offer Osman accepted, but being not able himselfe to go and answere the prince in person hand to hand, by reason of his sicknesse which euerie houre mortally encreased, hee sent out all his captaines with his armie to dare him battell.

The prince lay ten miles or thereabouts distant from the campe of Osman, towards whom the Turkes set forward in this manner: The maine battell was guided by the Bassa of CARABMIT and Siman Cicala, with all the souldiours of ASSIRIA and BABYLON: the left wing was led by the Bassa of NATOLIA, with the band of GRACIA; and the right wing was conducted by Amurath Bassa of CARAMANIA, with the people of SORIA to the number of threescore thousand: beside such as were left behind at TAVRIS, with the trustie guard of the Ianizaries, and the E artillerie, for the safegard of the sicke Visier. In this order they confronted the Persian prince, who was himselfe in the midst of his armie, with all his people in verie good order: hauing on the one side the souldiours of PERBIA and HIRCANIA, and on the other them of PARTIA and ATROPATIA, in all to the number of fortie thousand. The Turkes feared nothing more, than that the Persians fetching a great compasse about, should with all celeritie and furie set vpon their tents, and the riches they had laied vp together in their pavillions: and therefore at euerie motion of theirs, they continually feared this sudden outroad; whereof they had such especie-all care, that resirring themselues as much as they might, and feigning as if they had giuen place to the Persians, it wanted not much but that they had brought them euen within the iust leuell and marke of the artillerie. Which the Persians perceiuing, without any further dallying hard-F ly began to assaile the maine bodie of the battell. The prince himselfe being entred amongst the souldiours of the Bassa of CARABMIT (who as Generall sustained the place of Osman) and pressing into the midst of the battell, dispatched euerie man that came in his way; and hauing singled out the Bassa from the rest, smote off his head, and gaue it to one of his followers to carrie vpon the top of his lance. Which being openly defied, brought a great terrour vpon the Turkes, The Bassa of

Turkes, and exceedingly encouraged the Persians; who embred with the blood of their enemies, and intermingling themselves more and more among them, made of them a most confused and generall slaughter: wherein beside the Bassa before named, there died also the Bassa of ERZIRVAN, the Sanzacke of BVRSTA, with five other Sanzackes, and as it was commonly reported twentie thousand Turkes more. It fell also to the lot of Amurath Bassa of CARAMANIA to be there taken prisoner, with diuers other common souldiours. But night comming now on, and the Persians being come somewhat too nigh the Turkish artillerie, they gaue ouer the fight, and withdrew themselves backe to the place where their king lay encamped with the rest of his armie.

But now were diuers dayes spent wherein the new fortresse at TAVRIS (as we haue before said) was fully finished, when the souldiours of GRACIA and CONSTANTINOPLE wearied to see their friends and fellowes thus slaine before their faces, and hauing also safely layed vp in their owne custodie such preyes and booties as they had gotten in the sacke of the citie, resolved with themselves to procure their owne departure, and so much the rather, for that Winter was now fast comming on. And for as much as the Generall was through the immoderat flux of blood brought weake, and in despaire of life, and quite abandoned of all hope by his phisitions, and therefore not to be spoke withall; they were faine by the mouth of such as were their trustie friends about him, to represent vnto him the necessitie of their returne, and withall after many reuerent entreaties caused it also to be signified vnto him, That if he stood obstinate, and would needs stay dallying out the time in those dangerous places where no such need was, they should be enforced to withdraw themselves and to forsake him. Osman, who had now nothing els to doe in those countries but onely to leaue some conuenient garrison in the new fortresse at TAVRIS, liberally promised to satisfie their requests by departing thence the next morning. So calling vnto him Giasfer the Eunuch Bassa of TRIPOLIS, a man of a craftie and cruell nature, made him gouernour and keeper of the new built fortresse at TAVRIS. And the more to encourage him to take that charge vpon him, he gaue him freely for the space of three whole yeares not onely the office and authoritie, but also the rents and reuenues of a Bassa of CARAEMIT, lately slaine by the Persian prince, and withall honoured him with the title of the Bassa of the Court: so that hauing finished his three yeares office of CARAEMIT, he was then to goe and sit among the soueraigne seats of the Bassaes of the Porta. The Bassa seeing so faire and so high a way for him to mount to those high honours (greater than which there is none in the Turkish empire) readily accepted the offer, and dispatching his lieutenant for CARAEMIT to the government of those countries in his absence, with an hundred of his owne followers; settled himselfe in the said fort with a garrison of twelue thousand souldiours, furnished with all necessarie prouision vntill the next Spring. The Generall hauing thus set all things in order, and carefully provided for the safetie of the fortresse, departed according to his promise, and the same morning, which was the four-score and seuenth day after his departure from ERZIRVAN, came to a place called SANCAZAN, seven miles distant from TAVRIS.

The Turkes were now vpon the point of their encamping in a confused disorder and hurly-burly, when those that were hindermost in the armie heard the neighing of horses, and the noise of drums and trumpets, as if it had bene the comming of an armie. Which when the whole campe vnderstood, they ran all headlong, and disordered as they were to the rescue, on that side where the noise of the horses and warlike instruments was heard. But whilest the Turkes were thus intently busied on that side to expect the comming of the enemy, the Persian prince without any signe or token of battell, with eight and twentie thousand horsemen was readie vpon them on the other side: who hauing discovered the cammels and other carriages whereupon their booties, their spoiles, and their riches were laden, which they had taken in TAVRIS, beside much of their prouision for victuals for the sustenance of the armie, he turned vpon them, and with a proud and safe conuoy had taken for a prey eighteene thousand of the cammels and mules, well laden with the same booties and victuals; which the prince sent presently away with six thousand of his souldiours, and he himselfe with his two and twentie thousand Persians entered into the Turkes armie, who now to withstand his assault, had on that side also made head against him. A gallant thing it was, and terrible withall, to see what a mortall battell was made, what singular prowesse shewed euen presently in the forefront of the battell; for in a moment you might haue scene the tents and pauillions turned vpside downe, and their encamping lodgings

A replenished with dead carcases and blood, victorious death raunging and rainging in euery corner. The Turkes themselves were astonished and maruelled to see their enemies (so few in number, and intermingled among so populous an armie of warlike people) more like fatall ministers of death, than mortall men, to brandish their swords ouer them, as if it had lightened, and to make so generall a slaughter; and doe to this day with great admiration recount the valour and prowesse of the Persians. But they all now doubting least the enemy in this furie should forcibly haue entered the very lodgings of the sicke Visier, it was commaunded nor by himselfe (for he lay now at the last gaspe) but by him who at that time commaunded in his name, That without delay the artillerie should be vnbarred, and discharged: which in that medley and confusion of both armies, without any exception or distinction of persons, ouerthrew both friends and B foes, and did perhaps more harme among the Turkes themselves than among the Persians: for at the first thundering noise thereof the prince with all speed retired, after whom presently followed all the rest: so that the Turkes which remained behind were more annoyed with the deadly shot than were the Persians, who flying away could not feele the damage, but that the Turkes must first be well payed for their labour. The Turkes pursuing the flying Persians, made shew as if they would gladly haue ouertaken them: but night comming on, they feared to proceed any further than they might without danger returne. In this battell of SANCAZAN were slaine twentie thousand Turkes, without any notable losse of the Persians.

Among the rest in the same place died the Visier Osman, Generall of the late dreadfull but now desolate armie; not by the hand of the enemy, but consumed by the vehemencie of an ague and C a flux of blood. Whose death notwithstanding was kept secret from the whole army, euery man verily thinking, that it was but onely the continuance of his sicknesse, because the chariots wherein he lay were still kept close: and in his name Cicala Bassa (for so he had appointed in his will) gaue out answers and commaundements to the whole armie. Neuertheless it was disclosed to the Persians, by meanes of three young men, who in the life of Osman hauing charge of his jewels and treasure, were with the best thereof and the fairest of his horses fled to the Persian king, to whom they reuealed the death of the Generall. The Persians who before had thought it not possible for so great cowardise, and dishonourable kind of fighting and ordering of an armie to haue proceeded from the vertue and valour of Osman, of whose worth they had too manifest a triall and experience in times past; now vnderstanding of his death, were thereby encouraged to attempt the vter ouerthrow of the Turkish remnant, and so to giue them an honourable farewell. Whereupon the Persian prince with foureteene thousand men followed the Turkes, who had now raised their campe, and were remooued to a certaine riuer of salt water, not farre from SANCAZAN; where the prince caused a few tents to be pitched, about foure or five miles distant from the Turkish campe, the aforesaid brooke running in the midst betwene the two armies. Now the prince had purposed to haue assailed the Turkes in the morning, whiles they were loading their carriages, hoping in that confusion to haue wrought them some notable mischief: which his designement was reuealed vnto the Turkes by one of his spies whom they had caught. And therefore they did neither rise so early in the morning as their manner was; nor load their stuffe vntill such time as they were all armed, and on horsebacke readie to receiue their enemies. E By which their warie and vnusual manner of rising, the Persians perceiued that their purpose was by some meanes discovered. And yet considering that if they should loose this occasion, they should find no other good opportunitie to annoy them before the next Spring, they vterly resolved to aduenture the assault: and hauing obserued that the enemies artillerie was on the right side of the armie, they in the sight of euery man began to enter on the left. But the Turkes presently so vncovered and vnbarred their artillerie against the assailants, as was to their great losse and danger. Howbeit they were so nimble and so quicke to throwd themselves vnder the enemies armie, and to auoid the mischievous tempest, that being come now very neere the Turkes squadrons, they must needs joyne battell with them. The Persians had purposed before as soone as they saw the Turkes begin to stirre, to retire, and so to draw them on into a very filthie and deepe marish; which being then drie, was not feared or doubted of any, but onely by those that were acquainted withall, or borne thereabouts. VVhich their policie the rebell Maxmet Chan, and with him Daut Chan (as being well acquainted with those places) perceiuing, gaue notice thereof to Cicala Bassa: who presently caused a great compassing wing to be made, commaunding them to set vpon the Persians; and to charge them home: which was forthwith put in execution, so that Giasfer Bassa of Tripolis an Eunuch made Gouernour of Tauris.

Osman the Generall departed from Tauris, and commeth to Sancazan.

that their forefront opened it selfe with very large and spacious cornets vpon the prince: who no sooner saw this their vnwonted order of comming on, but by and by he perceived that his purpose was discovered. And thereupon without any stay he began to retire, calling his people after him: which could not so readily be done, but that three thousand of them remained behind, all miserably stifled, ouertreden in the mire, with very little losse to the Turkes: and this onely battell of fue that were fought vnder TAVRIS and in those quarters, was lesse hurtfull to the Turkes than to the Persians.

armie discharged
at Van.

The prince returned to the king his fathers campe, recounting vnto him the whole action, together with the departure of the enemy. And so the Turkes came to SALMAS, where the death of the Generall was published: from SALMAS they went afterwards to VAN, where they tooke a survey of their armie, and found wanting therein about fourescore and fife thousand persons, or as some say more. At VAN all the souldiours were dismissed: and Cicala from thence gaue notice to Amurath at CONSTANTINOPLE of all that had happened. Where first was published the death of Osman the Generall; for whom were made many signes of great sorrow: and together with his death were blazed the bloudie and mortall actions that were in that expedition performed: so that the whole citie seemed to be greatly discomforted, and in many places were heard much secret railing vpon the king, many curses of this warre, and insolent maledictions of these manifold mischiefs. After that, was dispersed the great fame of the new fortresse erected at TAVRIS, of the sacking of the citie, and of all the losse that had happened therein: and a generall edict published in the kings name, That through all the cities of his empire they should make solempne feasts, with other expresse tokens of joy and rejoycing: which was accordingly done both in CONSTANTINOPLE and other places. There was also word sent to the embassadours of HUNGARIE, of FRANCE, of VENICE, and of other countries, that they should doe the like: but they all with one accord answered, That it was neuer the custome of embassadours to make any such signe of rejoycing, but onely when the king himselfe in person returned from the like victories.

In the meane time consultation was held at VAN for the sending of succours to TELIS in GEORGIA: vnto which important seruice, Daut Chan to deserue some reward at Amuraths hand, offered himselfe: vnto whom Cicala Bassa deliuered thirtie thousand Cecchini to be conveyed to the fort at TELIS. Which piece of seruice the renegade performed, and without trouble relieved the souldiours in the fort: which was so well accepted of Amurath, that he for the same good seruice honoured him with the dignitie of the Bassa of MAHAS. Maxut Chan also the other Persian rebell, that guided the Turkish armie to Reiuau, and afterwards to TAVRIS, was in like manner by the same Amurath honoured with the great rich office of the Bassa of ALEPPO.

The miserie the Turks armie endured at Tauris.

The miseries the Turkish armie endured in this expedition for TAVRIS, beside the losses before rehearsed, were wonderfull: for as the Sanzacke of AMAN, a citie of SORTA (called in ancient time APAMEA) present in all this action, reporteth in a letter which he wrote to Ali Bassa of ALEPPO, there was such a dearth in the Turkes armie, that they were enforced to giue their cammels bisket and tice, and when that failed, they gaue them their pack-saddles to eat, and after that pieces of wood beaten into powder, and at last the very earth: which dearth endured vntill they arrived at VAN. And at TAVRIS whiles the fortresse was in building, they were of necessity constrained to giue their horses their dung in very drie powder. By reason whereof there followed a grievous mortalitie of horses, cammels, mules, and men, and the stinke which grew of this mortalitie became so great, that euery man was faine to carie a piece of a strong smelling onion still vnder his nose, to auoid the heauinesse thereof.

The fort so lately built in the royall citie of TAVRIS exceedingly grieved the Persians in generall, but especially the king and the prince his sonne: to let it alone, they reckoned it too great a shame, and how to demolish it they well knew not, finding themselves not onely destitute of artillerie, but also of such sufficient strength as was requisite for the performance of so great an enterprize: yet prickt on with desire of glorie and the necessitie of the cause, they determined even in the sharpnesse of Winter to gather new forces, and with trenches of earth to approach the ditch, and to trie if they could aduance a countermure as high as their wals, and so to attaine to the conquest thereof. But in the gathering of their men they discovered new difficulties: for, to hire any souldiours either from HARRI or GHILAN, was denied them by Abbas and Amet Chan: and

A and the Turcoman nation, which might haue been the readiest and the neerest at such a need, for the late death of Emir Chan, and for the succession of Aliculi, were growne verie contumacious: so that neither the king, nor the prince, nor the presidents and gouernours of the kingdome, could tell which way to turne themselves. At last for the common safetie they determined to draw the Turcomans to a reconciliation; hoping that by promising them any honest satisfaction for the wrong wherewith they challenged themselves grieved for the death of their captain, they would become more tractable to doe them seruice in their common necessities. Whereupon the king sent kind letters to the heads and captaines of those nations, and principally to Mahamet Chan, and to Calife the Sultan, declaring plainly vnto them the perill of his state, and of the libertie of the whole kingdome, with the confidence he had in their valour: and that therefore forgetting all that was past, as done not in shame or scorn of their nation, but onely for zeale and loue to the kingdome, they would demand such satisfaction as they desired, and that he would be ready to agree to any just request they should make. To which letters they readily answered, That they would come vnto him, to put in execution whatsoever he should for the common necessitie or the honour of his State command. Now they had craftily among themselves already concluded, not to suffer any other to sit in the roume of Emir Chan their late Gouernour, but onely young Tamas the kings third sonne. Which conclusion they had plotted to themselves, with a resolution in the end to cause him to be accepted for king at CASBIN, in despite of the king himselfe and of the prince Hamze: nothing regarding, that by this action farre greater troubles would arise in PERSIA than euer were yet heard of, but onely being wholly bent to reuenge the death of one onely Emir Chan. With this malicious and fraudulent resolution, they to the number of ten thousand (vnder the conduct of two captaines, Mahamet and Calife) went to the king, in all reuerence offering themselves with all readinesse to be employed in the enterprise wherunto they were called. The old credulous king, not suspecting any mischief plotted by these secret rebels, was greatly comforted at their comming: and although by some of his Sultans that had felt some inkling of this conspiracie, he was aduised to deale circumspectly and warily with them, and not commit any matter of importance to their trust, yet did he thinke euery houre a thousand vntill he had offered them satisfaction: promising them, that what captaines they would desire in the roume of Emir Chan, if it were possible they should haue him. Whereunto the dissembling Mahamet Chan made answer, That their desire aboue all things, was to doe him pleasure and seruice; not doubting but he would appoint them such a chieftaine, as should be valorous, noble, and acceptable vnto them. The king could stay no longer, but frankly declared vnto them, That to assure them of his good will, and to giue them an hostage in pawne thereof, he had made choise of young Tamas his sonne to succeed in the roume of Emir Chan their late Gouernour: As soone as Mahamet Chan heard this resolution of the king, who beside all expectation voluntarily of himselfe yielded them the meanes to put in execution, what they had maliciously before contriued against the peace and libertie of the kingdome: he became more iocund than he was wont to be, and outwardly shewed himselfe ready for whatsoever the king would command him: and in the nantes of the rest yielded also large promises of fidelitie and obedience, so that the matter might be performed for which he had now E given his word.

The king, who desired nothing more than to see the fort of TAVRIS raised (which could hardly be done without the helpe of those Turcomans) contrarie to the aduise of the wisest of the Sultans, and of the prince, secretly and as it were by stealth gaue his young sonne Tamas into the hands of Mahamet, as chiefe of all the Turcomans. Who to nourish the good opinion and credulitie of the king, and to secure the prince, and the Sultans, gaue a lustie beginning by the helpe of his followers, with trenches and rampiers to approach the fort. Neither was there any great time spent therein for they had now almost made their trenches and mounts euen with the enemies wall, and the ditch it selfe was almost filled vp with earth, so that there wanted but little more labour to begin the desired assault: when contrarie to all mens expectation, the false and wicked traitour Mahamet Chan, with all his Turcomans, leading away with them the child Tamas, departed in the night time and vpon a sudden, from so noble and honourable an enterprise. And blinded with desire to put in execution his ill hatched purpose, courtly and without any noyse, removed from the besieged wals, and put himselfe on his way towards CASBIN: still teeming Tamas by the name of the king of PERSIA, and sundrie waies abusing and mocking the

the poore old king and the prince. This so sudden and so dangerous a rebellion, whereby not onely so honourable and so necessarie an enterprife was to be abandoned, but the whole state of the kingdome like to be endangered, exceedingly grieued all good men, but most of all the old king and the prince his sonne: who no lesse carefull of his rightfull succession, than was the aged king of his present estate, both now hazarded by this rebellion; wholly incensed with griefe and anguish of mind, began to cast a thousand deuises in his troubled head, what course to take, and what to resolute vpon. To abandon the siege it grieued him about measure, and to suffer so pernicious a rebellion to go forward, seemed too dangerous for the state of PERSIA: and to provide for both these mischiefs at once, was altogether impossible. In these huge waues of contrarie thoughts, he resolute at last to turne himselfe against the Turcomans, and to suppress that rebellion as most dangerous to the State. And so with twelue thousand souldiors, and a part also of the kings ordinarie guard, all couragious and hardie men, he followed after the rebellious Turcomans; and marching directly toward CASBIN, he ouertooke them at a place called CALISTEZA, a daies journey on this side CASBIN, and there joyned battell with them. Wherein many of them being sorie for that they had done, would not so much as draw their swords against the prince: many others fled alway for feare, so that he easily obtained a wished victorie ouer them. The seditious Mahamei Chan was taken prisoner, and by the princes commaundement presently beheaded: so was also Calife the Sultan, and diuers other captaines of this pestilent conspiracie. Young Tamas was also taken, and by the direction of the prince sent to the castle of CAHACA. Five thousand Turcomans of the late followers of the rebell Mahamet, fled out of the battell towards BABYLON by the way of SIRAS, and yielded themselves to Solyman Bassa of that citie; who afterwards repenting themselves of their folly, sought to returne againe into the fauour of their king, but all in vaine: so that being become rebels to the one, and suspected to the other, they did at one time loose their countrey, their libertie, their honour, and the fauour of all men as well friends as foes. The prince after this victorie held on his way to CASBIN, and there staying, laboured to gather the dispersed Turcomans, especially those that moued with the honestie of the cause, would not beare armes in so vnjust an action; intending afterwards to returne to TAVRIS, to attend the besieging and conquest of the fort. This was the end of this dangerous rebellion, the chiefe cause that TAVRIS was not againe recouered out of the hands of the Turks, to the great weakning of the Persian kingdome.

Giasfer Bassa
sends to Cicale
his Bassa for aid

Now Giasfer the Eunuch Bassa Gouverneur of the castle of TAVRIS, fearing least the Persian K prince would with a greater armie againe returne to the siege: perceiuing himselfe to waxe euery day weaker and weaker, by reason that many of his men secretly fled from him, beside them that perished with sicknesse, and others slaine in aduenturing too boldly to go abroad to seeke for victuals; sent aduertisement thereof to Cicale Bassa at VAN, signifying farther vnto him by writing, That if the prince should againe returne to assault the fort, he should of necessitie be enforced to yeeld it: and that therefore as he tendered the honour of his Sultan, he would be carefull to send him succour, whereby he might be able to maintaine the fort: adding moreouer, That now it was most easily to be done, because there was no forces of the enemies in those quarters, saving onely a few which remained about the king, lying twelue miles off from TAVRIS. Cicale moued with the importance of the enterprife propounded, and withall desirous to gaine some credit of glorie and renowne with his king, entertained the aduices of Giasfer, and getting him to horse with a traine of three thousand harquebusiers and good store of munition, set forward toward TAVRIS. The Persian king aduertised thereof, sent out spies to learne what way they held, meaning to meet them and to set vpon them: but these spies comming neere to SALMAS were apprehended by the forerunners of Cicale, and being put to torture, reuealed at last how that their king was in armes, and on his way towards SANCAZAN. At which newes Cicale was greatly astonied, as well for the danger whereinto the forces and munition which he had with him were likely to fall, as also for that by any losse which his troupes should sustaine in this expedition, the citie of VAN (being indeed the greatest and most noble frontier towne in all those countries) must needs be in hazard to be lost, hauing left in it but his lieutenant with a verie few M souldiors. Whereupon he determined to relinquish this dangerous enterprife, and to withdraw himselfe backe to the defence and preferuation of the citie committed to his trust and gouernment. But although these expected and desired succours were not conuaid to TAVRIS as was intended, yet had Giasfer as good fortune as he could wish: for the preparations of the prince

A prince were so long and so troublesome, and his returne so much prolonged, that there was time enough yielded vnto the Turkes great Generall now newly chosen (as by and by shall be declared) to go with a strong armie into those quarters; and so to preserue all that which the only expedition and celeritie of the enemy might haue put in great hazard, and almost haue brought to a desperat case.

In the meane time, Amurath the Turkish emperour was greatly troubled at CONSTANTINOPLE in making choise of a new Generall: on the one side Osman Bassa hauing by his last will left Sinan Cicale to be his successour, as a man of approued valour; and the many dangers he had run through in the late seruice about TAVRIS, with the great fauours he had in the Court, did not a little encline the king to his election: on the other side, he heard of a publike rumour spread amongst the souldiors, that they could by no meanes endure to be commaunded by so young a captain, and that some in plaine teames should say, That they would not obey him: which caused Amurath to doubt, that some dangerous discord might thereof ensue in the armie, if he should proceed to make choise of him. Then there was also Ferat Bassa, the same man which had already sustained that charge before Osman; who now verie ambitiously sought againe for this honour, hauing of late performed some good seruice to the good liking of the king. Of any other to make better choise he had none, so that he stood in great doubt what to doe. In the end, because he was in good time to provide for his affaires, he made choise of Ferat Bassa, the same man whom he had before made prooue of: a man of great fidelitie, of an honourable carriage, and already experienced in the leading and commaunding of such an armie, to whom hee granted the ordinarie authoritie, to manage at his pleasure such affaires of the empire as concerned his journey. Vpon this resolution generall precepts were sent out to all cities within the kingdome, to the Ballies and other Gouvernours with speciall commaundement, That all their souldiors, together with their taxes, tenths, munitions, victuals, armour, artificers, and to bee short, all their necessarie furniture and prouision should be readie and in order, vpon the first warning should be sent them the next Spring. Great prouision of money was made, and in SORIA (besides the ordinarie summe that is bestowed vpon the yearly pay of souldiors in RIVAN, ERZIRUM, LORI, TOMANIS, TEFELIS and CHARS, which swallow vp all the reuenue of that countrey, and of the citie of TRIPOLI, amounting to the summe of six hundred thousand duckets) there was taken vp in prest of priuat merchants in the citie of ALBPO only, the summe D of threescore thousand Cecchini, to be repaid vnto them with the first monies that should be received by the officers of his custome houses. A matter that moued an extraordinary grudging among the people, for that it seemed to euery man a verie strange and intollerable exaction, beside so many grieuances laid vpon them, for corne, for carriages, for pioners, and for workmen, to endure this burthen also of lending their money without hope of restitution thereof: yea and indeed euery man did greatly wonder how they were thus ill aduised, to make it knowne to the Christian princes what scarcitie and want of money they had. The Generall had also with him four hundred pieces of artillerie, and did beside so worke the matter, as that Maxut Chan (who was appointed Bassa of ALBPO) was granted vnto him to be the guide of his armie, as hee had been of Osman; and that Cicale Bassa of VAN (scarce his good friend) was removed from thence, and sent farther off out of his way as Bassa to BABYLON.

E And thus hauing put all things in readinesse, he departed from CONSTANTINOPLE in the moneth of Aprill, in the yeare 1586; and passing ouer the strait into ASIA, came to SIVAS something later than he should haue done, being hindered partly by the plague which then raged exceedingly in CONSTANTINOPLE, and partly by other occasions incident to such actions. At SIVAS he staid so long for the comming together of his armie, and in mustering men, that it was the latter end of Iuly before he departed thence; staying in deed the longer at SIVAS, by reason of the exceeding dearth and want of victuals at ERZIRUM: which dearth was also so great in ALBPO, that a VENICE bushell of wheat was sold for twelue Cecchini.

Ferat yet making his aboad at SIVAS, but readie to depart, was aduertised by certaine postes F sent from Giasfer the Bassa of TAVRIS, how that the Persian prince was hourly expected with a great armie, and that if he did foreflow to send succours, and to preuent the comming of the prince, and so to giue him time and leisure to assault the castle, he doubted greatly how he should be able to hold the same. Vpon which aduertisement Ferat presently removed, and so hastened his journey, that about the beginning of August he was at ERZIRUM and still hearing more and more more of the princes comming, stayed not there, but hasted to VAN: where hauing gathered together all his souldiours, and taken a new suruey of his armie, he departed thence; and being presently come into the open and large champaines, to make prooue of the readinesse of his souldiours, he marshalled them in such sort as if he should forthwith haue joined battell with the enemy, and so in seemely order marched on.

The Turkish Generall continually feared least the Persians should come vpon him with some sudden assault: besides that, the constant report of the princes comming to TAVRIS with his armie, much encreased his troubled thoughts. But on the other side, he reposed great confidence in the conspiracie that was now plotted against the life of the prince, with the priuie of Aliculi Chan the protectour and champion of Abas Mirza of HERRI: who vnder colour of accompanying the prince to assise his forces, had resolutely concluded with himselfe, and absolutely promised Abas (hauing also giuen intelligence thereof to the Turkish Generall) to rid the prince Hamza of his life; or at least (which he thought might more easily be brought to passe) in the sundrie revolutions and variable chances of the battell at some time or other to make him fall into the hands of Ferat, and so to settle his lord and master Abas in his estate. Vpon these treacheries Ferat grounding himselfe, began with greater confidence to dispose his designments, and somewhat lesse to feare the fame of the huge preparations of PERSIA against him. Which preparations in truth as by most wicked deuices and malicious conspiracies they were turned quite contrarie from that end whereunto the prince Hamza had continually appointed them: so if they had bene employed with such faith and fidelitie as so righteous a cause required, without all doubt the writers of our time should haue had matter ynough in this fourscore and sixteene years before going. But for as much as rebellion and discord, the two infernall ministers of the diuell, haue for the vtter vndoing and ouerthrow of the glorie of PERSIA continually fauoured the Turke armies, no maruell it is that the Persian nation cannot vaunt of any reuenge taken for the indignities offered them by their enemies; and that our writers cannot chuse but write of the true and vndoubted victories of the Turkes, and the bare shadowes of the Persian exploits; which notwithstanding many Christians vainly beleue, because they most earnestly desire them to be true, although they doe see to the contrarie the manifest prospering and euident conquests which the Turkes haue in diuers their states and countries.

The Persian prince about the latter end of Iuly arriued at TAVRIS with the greatest part of his armie, where he (contrarie to the opinion of all men) stayed not, for what cause is vncertaine. But vnderstanding that Zeinel Bassa of SALMAS, by nation a Curdo, lay encamped before the citie, who of a Persian was become a Turke, and had done great harme against the state of PERSIA; he determined suddenly to set vpon him, and to chastise him for his rebellion. According to which resolution, being accompanied with twelue thousand souldiours, he rode to SALMAS, where finding Zeinell with all his people encamped as he had bene before enformed, he gaue him the assault. Zeinell more readie to flee than to fight, and his souldiours as readie as he, fled presently, and fell before the Persians, so that the Bassa himselfe with a few others had much adoe to escape and saue themselves in the closest corners thereabouts, leauing the citie committed to his charge, for a prey vnto the angry enemy: who entering into the same, sacked and spoiled it, exercising thereon all such cruelties, as partly the naturall desires of souldiours vse to practise, and partly such as the Turkes themselves shewed vpon them in that miserable and most lamentable lacking of TAVRIS the last year. The like spoyle did the Persian armie in all those quarters round about, and so would haue peraduenture returned to TAVRIS, but that certaine spies arriued vpon them, with aduertisement, That the Bassa of RERVAN being issued out of his forresse with fiftene hundred arquebusiers, had committed the like outrages in the villages and fields thereabouts, as the prince had done about SALMAS. With which newes the prince was greatly moued; and immediatly rising with his armie, and marching towards RERVAN, not farre from the citie encountered the Bassa: who discovering the enemies forces afarre off began in great disorder to flee and retire into his fort, leauing the greatest part of his souldiours (making not so much speed in flight as himselfe) to the furie of the prince, who put them all to the sword, and did what harme he possibly could in all the places thereabouts.

At the very same time great troubles arose in the Drusian country for Man-ogli the valiant Drusian (of whom we haue before spoken) in reuenge of the injuries done vnto him and his people

A ple by Ebraim Bassa, and by a violent kind of restitution to recompence himselfe of all those bribes and presents which by so many shifts and subtilties were by the couetous Bassa wrung from him (as is before declared) had now taken vp armes, and hauing wasted and sacked all the territorie of Ebne-manfur and of his other enemies who had yielded their obedience vnto the Turkes, without let forced all that country with sudden inuasions and inrodes, euen very neere vnto the cities of BALBECK and TRIPOLI, and did there exceeding harme. For redresse whereof, Amurath was glad to dispatch away from the Court Ali Bassa borne at ALBPO, with the title of the Bassa of DAMASCO, and with authoritie to muster fresh souldiours, and so wholly to attend the vtter subuersion of Man-ogli. But comming thither, he found all againe quiet, so that his presence in that country serued rather for a reconciliation and peace making amongst them, than for the prosecuting of any further warre; which at that time was most necessarie for the Turkes to be auoided, as well for want of money in the common treasure, as for the exceeding scarcitie of victuals.

Now the Persian prince hauing made an end of the outrodes and spoyle before mentioned, retired himselfe to TAVRIS, and so towards his fathers campe; where the rest of his armie was now arriued, to the number of about fortie thousand: of whom the prince dispatched away the souldiours of HERRI to the number of eight thousand, vnder the conduct of the traitorous Aliculi Chan their Generall; and part also of the Turcomans, vnder the leading of Emanuli Chan; with speciall charge, That they should by the way in places of most aduantage meet and receite the enemies armie, and in those narrow and troublesome passages to doe them what mischief they possibly could. Which the prince thus appointed, thinking by this meanes to weaken the enemies forces, and so at their arriuall at TAVRIS to come vpon them with all his power, and so vtterly to destroy them.

Both these captaines departed accordingly, making shew that they would with all affection accomplish the commaundement of their prince: yet neuer was there heard any seruice of moment put in execution by them: For Aliculi full of treason, after their departure began to allege many forced reasons and excuses, Why they should surcease from meeting with the Turkes: and Emanuli as yet vtterly ignorant of the wicked purposes and mischievous treacherie of Aliculi, suffered himselfe to be misle-led by him also. By the delays and negligence of these two Persian captaines, the Turkish Generall tooke leisure without any losse or hinderance at all to arriue at TAVRIS, and to put the desired succours into the fort: at what time the Persian prince by good hap had got knowledge of the treacherie of Aliculi, and of the designments which many of the Sultans had lately continued, for the betraying of him aliue into the hands of the Turkish Generall. Of which suspicion he being greatly afraid, durst not onely not trust himselfe to performe those battels that he had before determined to haue performed; but quite abandoning this noble and honourable enterprise, wholly employed all his care and studie for the safetie of his own person, and so left the triumph of the matter in the power of the Turkes. And thus those great hopes and expectations which the Persians had conceiued of great exploits to haue bene done against the enemy, did not onely prooue vaine and come to no good issue, but contrariwise by this discouerie were converted into most strange disturbances, and all PERSIA thereby endured sundrie alterations and reuolutions of most important consequences. For both Aliculi Chan and his complices were pursued by the prince, as rebels and traitours: and also Abas Mirza of HERRI was manifestly discouered for a wicked and treacherous contriuer of his brothers death: whereby the common mischiefs were encreased more than euer they were before, and the publicke calamities yielded greater hopes vnto the Turkes than they had euer before conceiued in all the course of these warres.

When Ferat had thus reliqued them in the castle of TAVRIS, leauing for the custodie thereof Giasfer the Bassa with his former companies, he returned towards EZIRVM: hauing first caused a fort to be erected at CVRCHIVE TAVRIS, a place neere vnto TAVRIS, another at COV, and the third at CVM: in euery one of which forts he left a conuenient number of souldiours, with all things necessarie and sufficient for their maintenance, and defence of the places they were to keepe. He sent also succours to the fort at TEBLIS in GEORGIA, which they had long expected, and now most joyfully receiued. But the Persian prince hauing hunted Aliculi Chan out of the quarters of TAVRIS, thought himselfe now wholly deliuered from the great feare of treason and rebellion, wherein he of late liued: and therefore in as great hast as he could, put himselfe selfe on his journey towards GANGE: in which place hauing gathered together a good number of souldiours, he determined to remoue thence, to intercept the succours that were by the Turkes to be brought to TAPLIS. Now he had alwayes found Emanguli Chan to be both faithful and wise, and in him he reposed an assured confidence for performing any enterprise that he had in hand, and communicated with him euery deuice that he had conceiued in these wars. And therefore he made head and joyned with him; and lodging most familiarly in his citie, he stayed there for the setting in order and disposing of his foresaid designement, being very desirous not to let such an oportunitie to ouerslip, without signification vnto the world of some notable noueltie, which might be correspondent to the fame that of matters passed and performed the yeare before, was now spread and published abroad ouer all the world. But when he was euen at the very fairest to haue put this his desire in execution, and least of all feared any treacherie or treason, vpon a sudden in the night time as he slept vpon a pallet he was miserably stricken through the bodie, by an Eunuch of his that attended vpon him: and so the most resplendent and bright lustre that euer shined in PERSIA, was utterly extinguished. What was the occasion thereof, and who procured his death, diuers and sundrie are the opinions of men. Some thinke, that his brother Abas Mirize of HERRI, who had before conspired to haue had him betrayed into the hands of the Turkish Generall, had now by force of money and gifts enduced the wicked Eunuch thereunto. Others deemed it not to haue beene done without the priuie of his father, as more desirous to preferre Abas Mirize his other sonne vnto the kingdom. Diuers others doe diuersly reason of the matter; so that to affirme of a certaintie, that thus or thus the death of so worthie a prince was procured, were great rashnesse: and therefore we leaue it, with the further proceesse of the Persian state, vnto the further discouerie of Time, the auntient mother of truth.

Notwithstanding the league betwixt the Christian emperour Rodolph the second and Amurath the Great Turke, many sharpe skirmishes oftentimes fell out betwixt the Christians and the Turkes vpon the frontiers of their territories and dominions, especially in HUNGARIE, CROATIA, and STIRIA: as now in the latter end of this yeare 1586 in the month of December, the Turkes after their insolent manner making an inrode into the borders of CROATIA, receiued a notable ouerthrow by the Christians, being in number much fewer: where amongst others the Bassa of BOSNA with his brother was slaine; whose head with certaine prisoners was sent to VIENNA to Ernestus Archduke of AVSTRIA, the emperours brother. This Bassa of BOSNA and his brother, slaine in this conflict (as we haue said) are reported to haue beene the sonnes of Muhamet the late great Visier, by one of the daughters of Selymus the second, Amurath his sister. For diuers yeares following Amurath did no great matter worth the remembrance, contenting himselfe (as it should seeme) with that he had already got from the Persians: and holding his league in some reasonable sort with the Christians: yet not so, but that many a bloudie broile tending at last euen to the breach of the league passed betwixt the Turkes and the Christians, which for the continuation of the historie we will briefly set downe, as they are vnto vs by the writers of our time reported.

The castle of Koopan in Hungarie surprisid by the Christians.

In Februarie the yeare following, which was the yeare 1587, the Christians prouoked by the often outrages of the Turkes, setting vpon the castle of KOPPAN, not faire from the lake of BALATON, being then frozen, by good fortune surprisid it. There was at that time in the castle three of the Turkes Sanzackes, and about a thousand Turkes, of whom an hundred and ninetie of the better sort, with seuentie women, besides diuers of the meaner sort, fell into the hands of the Christians; the rest sauing themselves by flight, or by creeping into secret corners. An hundred horses for seruice were there taken also, and so much bootie as was esteemed to be worth fortie thousand duckats. Of the three Sanzackes that were there present, Alis Sanzacke of KOPPAN was taken, and brought first to VIENNA, and afterward presented to the emperour: Another of them standing vpon his defence in a vault vnder ground, was there smothered: The third escaped by flight, but was afterwards the same yeare taken, with diuers others, as shall be forthwith declared.

The eight of August following, foure of the Turkes great commaunders in HUNGARIE, viz. the Bassa of ZIGERT, the Sanzackes of MOHAS, of QVINQVE ECCLBSIA, and the new Sanzacke of KOPPAN, with fise thousand souldiours brake into the borders of the Christians, and in most cruell manner destroyed seuenteen countrey villages about LIMBACH: carrying away with them

A them all the miserable countrey people, with the spoile of the countrey. Whereof George Countie Serinus (sonne to that most valiant Countie Nicholas Serinus slaine at ZIGERT) commaunder of the garrison of CANISIA vnderstanding, with as much speed as was possible raised such forces as he was able out of his territorie betwixt the riuers of Draus and Mura: and calling vnto his aid the Countie Nadastis, the Lo. Bathianus, and some other valiant captains that had the charge of those frontiers, with such diligence tooke the straits and passages whereby the Turkes must needs returne amongst the marshes, that the Turkes comming backe againe that way with a verie rich prey and many prisoners, being in the breake of the day hardly charged by those most expert and resolute souldiours, in those straight and troublesome passages about a mile from CANISIA, were at length discomfited and put to flight; with such a miserable slaughter, that many of them yeelded vp their scimitars, pitifully crying for mercie; other some fled backe into the woods and Forrests, and many running headlong into the marshes there perished, or sticking fast in the deepe mud, cried together for metcie and helpe of their enemies. In this conflict Muhamet the Sanzacke of QVINQVE ECCLBSIA (sonne to Hali Bassa slaine in the battell of LEPANTO) was taken prisoner. Sinan Beg Sanzacke of MOHAS, thinking to escape thorough the marsh, stucke fast with his horse, and was shot through the head with a small shot, and there died. The Bassa of ZIGERT with Chasan the new Sanzacke of KOPPAN, seeing all desperat and lost, fled betimes out of the battell: but he of KOPPAN, wandring vp and downe in the woods, was the next night after the battell, with others taken: the Bassa of ZIGERT almost spent with hunger and griefe of mind, escaped on foot seauen daies after to BRESENZA. There were taken of the Turkes a thousand three hundred, of whom manie died afterwards of their wounds. In this battell there was slaine of the Turks, with them that perished in the marshes and woods, about two thousand: and of the Turkes horses were taken about fiftene hundred. All the prey before taken by the Turkes with the miserable captiues, was againe recovered. The number of them that performed this notable seruice, was in all but fiftene hundred foot and fise hundred horse: of whom there was but eleuen slaine, but most of the rest wounded. Foure hundred heads of the slaine Turkes were (after the manner of those bordering souldiours) carried for shew to CANISIA, with fise hundred prisoners. The Christian souldiours with the helpe of the countrey people, ceased not for certaine daies to hunt after the Turkes that were fled into the woods, as after wild beasts; of whom they found a great number: diuers others also seeing no means to escape, came forth of their lurking places and yeelded themselves.

Amurath vnderstanding of all these troubles that had so happened, commaunded Ali the Bassa of BUDA to be strangled, for that he had broken the league, and not restrained the insolencie of his Sanzackes, whom he might haue commaunded: And in his stead placed Sinan Bassa, whom before in disgrace, he had now at the request of his wife againe receiued into fauour and restored to his former dignitie. About this time also, Sigismund (the king of SVEDEN his sonne) now after the death of king Stephen chosen king of POLONIA, and Maximilian the emperours brother rejected: euen in the beginning of his raighe sought to renew the league, which Stephen his predecessour and other the Polonian kings had before made with Amurath and his predecessours the Turkish Sultans. And to that purpose writ vnto him as followeth.

Sigismund the third, king of Polonia; vnto Amurath the third, emperour of the Turks, sendeth greeting.

The Almighty long keepe and preferue your maiestie in health and honour. Most mightie prince, our best beloued friend and neighbour, after that we by the grace and goodnesse of God were chosen to gouerne the kingdome of POLONIA, and the embassadours of that kingdome had signified so much vnto us: we providing vs of necessaries, came to DANKSKE the 18. day of October, from whence we send Iohn Zamogil our Secretarie to give your maiestie to vnderstand of this our coming. For being told by the Polonian embassadours, that we were chosen vnto the gouernment of that kingdome vpon condition, That according vnto the custome of our predecessours the Polonian kings, we should keepe loue and friendship with the most excellent * Muslman emperours: we promise vnto your so-ueraigne maiestie, that we are willing with the like or greater zeale and deuotion, to continue that amitie and friendship with your most excellent maiestie, and the Othoman emperours your successours. For confirmation whereof, so soone as we shall come vnto CRACOVIA the regall citie of POLONIA, Sigismund the Polonian king his letter vnto Amurath.

* The Turke's deuotion to be called Muslman, which in their language signifies a right believer.

LONIA,

LONIA, and there be crowned; we will forthwith send our great embassadour vnto your maiestie. In the meane time we most earnestly request your maiestie, that our kingdome may on your maiesties behalfe rest in safetie and peace: which we perswade our selues you will easily grant. So wishing vnto you all health and happinesse, we bid you farewell, from DANKS the 18 of October, in the yeare 1587, and of our raigne the first.

Vnto which the kings request and letters, Amurath not long after returned this answer in writing.

Amurath the third, emperor of the Turkes, vnto Sigismund king of POLONIA greeting.

Amurath his answer vnto the letters of Sigismund.

I take it well, and as a token of your loue, that your embassadour Iohn Zamogil came with your letters vnto our most high and glorious Court, the refuge of distressed princes: wherein you haue giuen vs to vnderstand, how that in stead of the most excellent and famous king Stephen of worthie memorie late king of POLONIA; you, descended of the same noble stocke and race of the Polonian king, are by the free election of the whole State of the famous kingdome of POLONIA, and the great kingdome of LITHVANIA, chosen king of POLONIA: and being sent for by lawfull embassadours, by the fauour and goodnesse of God to be come vnto the citie of DANKS, and from thence to be about to go vnto CRACOVIA the chiefe citie of the kingdome of POLONIA. And when you are there arriued, to send your great embassadour vnto our most high and glorious Court, to confirme, preserve, and establish the league and amitie commodious and necessarie for both our kingdomes, honoured and kept by your auncient predecessours, with our grandfathers and great grandfathers; yea and that with greater Zeale and deuotion than any your noble aunccestours. And therefore your embassadour in your name requesteth, That no inuasion on our behalfe be made into the borders of the kingdome of POLONIA, or any harme there done: and that the most noble Tartar prince Isbam Gerai (whom God bleesse) should be warned and restrained, that he neither make nor suffer any incursion to be made into the confines of the kingdome of POLONIA. All which things in your letters contained, with the rest which your embassadour hath by word of mouth deliuered, are with speed orderly by vs conceiued. Know you therefore our most stately and magnificent Court to be alwaies open vnto such as resort thercunto, and that from thence neuer man had repulse, neither shall hereafter haue: wherefore it becometh you, as soone as these our letters shall be brought vnto you, to open your eyes, and to beware that nothing be on your part done against the maiestie of our Court, and the league; and that our peace and amitie be neither in much or little disturbed, but as best becometh, well and sincerely kept: and so perswade your selfe it shall on our part also be most inuiolably obserued. Our letters are also directed vnto the most excellent Tartar prince Isbam Gerai, whom God bleesse, straightly charging and commaunding him, not to make or suffer any incursion to be made into the borders of POLONIA. In brieft, the league and amitie shall on our part be religiously kept: and whosoever shall presume to doe any harme vnto the kingdome or confines of POLONIA, shall therefore without faile receiue from vs due punishment. So on your part also it is requisite that the same be done, and that in declaration of your loue you forget not oftentimes to intimate vnto our most high and glorious Court, such certaine occurrences and newes as shall happen in those parts; which shall be vnto vs a signe of your sincere loue and friendship. So know you, and giue credit vnto this our scale from CONSTANTINOPLE.

Neither was king Sigismund vnmindfull of this his promise before made for the sending of his embassadour: but being possessed of the Polonian kingdome, sent Christopher Dziercius (his Secretarie) embassadour vnto Amurath for the confirming of the league: which he hath euer since so firmly kept with the Turke, as that he could neuer by any inuention of the emperor, or of the princes electors, or others, or in respect of the common danger, be drawne into the fellowship of this long and religious warre, so hardly maintained by the emperor, and some few other Christian princes his confederats; first against Amurath whilest he liued, and euer since against Mahomet his sonne, which now raigneth: the issue whereof, God grant it proue not as well vnto the Polonians as others farther off, in fine lamentable.

The yeare following, Ferat (yet the Turkes Generall in PERSIA) tooke the citie of GENGE, being before for feare of the Turkes quite abandoned and forsaken by the inhabitants; who yet vpon his faith giuen for their safetie returned againe, yeelding to pay vnto the Turke a yearly tri-

A bute of fise thousand duckats. But when he would haue gone farther into the enemies countrie, hauing part of his armie cut off by the way, he was by his mutinous souldiors foully intreated, wounded, and enforced to retire. Cicada Bassa also passing ouer the riuier Euphrates, had in those quarters diuers bloudie skirmishes with the Persians, sometime carrying away the better and sometime the worse, as the fortune of the field serued. Vntill at length Amurath himselfe, no lesse wearie than his people of that long and chargeable warre, and the Persian king also enclining to peace; hee by the persuation of Sinan Bassa (but lately before receiued into fauour) was now contented to be entreated to hearken vnto the same: moued thercunto as well by reason of new troubles then in other places arising, as for the great famine and plague then raging in CONSTANTINOPLE. And considering withall what a great territorie he had woon from the Persians, and how necessarie it was for him by peace to confirme himselfe in those his new conquests, and by the building of certaine strong forts for the succour of one another, and by the placing of his Timariots therein to assure the same vnto him: all which without peace he could not possibly doe, as the old Bassa right wisely told him. For which reasons he yeelded to peace; and so embassadours passing too and fro, a peace was at length agreed vpon betwixt these two great Mahometane princes: the Turke couenanting to keepe vnto himselfe the places he had already gained, namely TAVRIS, GENGE, SIRVAN, and CHARS, with all the profits thereof arising, for the maintenance of his garrisons and Timariots there. Whereof it was thought new stirres would eessoones arise; the Turkes growne insolent of their late victories, being not able to content themselves with the conditions of the league; and the Persians not willing to liue in continual feare of the Turkes, especially seeing themselves to be daily by them more and more oppressed; and withall doubting least the Turkes after they had taken fast footing in those new conquered countries, and so growne strong, and gotten better knowledge of the passages, should (after their ambitious manner) seeke to possesse themselves of the rest; not keeping the couenants agreed vpon betwixt them, nor at all regarding the capitulations of the league. Which was neuertheless (as we said) on both sides for the space of ten yeares orderly confirmed, with all due circumstances and ceremonies in like occurrences by the great potentats of the world vfed; and for the more assurance thereof, one of the Persian kings sonnes (or as some others say, one of his nephewes) giuen vnto the Turkes in hostage, as Amurath required.

These long warres thus ended, shortly after a great sedition was raised at CONSTANTINOPLE by the souldiors of the Court, which retuning out of PERSIA, with great insolencie demanded their pay. For the satisfying of whom, by the consent of the great Sultan himselfe, the value of the coine was enhauned; and a new kind of subsidie for leuying of money imposed vpon the subjects in generall, none excepted: who standing vpon their auncient liberties and priuiledges, refused to pay it, especially the Ianizaries and other souldiors of the Court. Wherefore their Aga (or capitaine) was commaunded to appease them, and to perswade them to pay the demanded tribute: in attempting whereof he was in danger to haue been slaine by the insolent Ianizaries, and yet neuertheless for preuailling no more with them, was in displeasure thrust out of his office, and another placed in his rounge, that should haue married Amuraths daughter; of whom for all that the Ianizaries would not accept in any case, but threw stones at him, and threatened to kill him. The next night a great fire arose in the citie, for the quenching whereof, the Ianizaries were commaunded (as their dutie was) to put to their helping hands: which they not only most obstinately refused to do, but also kept backe others that brought water for the quenching thereof, and together with the other souldiors of the court did what they might to make it burne the faster. With the rage of this fire were consumed scauen of their temples, fise and twentie great Innes, fiteene thousand houses, with many warehouscs and shops. To appease this dangerous stirre, and to prevent farther mischief, commaundement was giuen to the Beglerbeg of GRACIA, and David Passy a Jew, the first authors of this new imposition, that they should either gather the aforesaid tribute by them deuised, and pay the souldiors, or by some other meanes to giue them contentment. But here began the priests publicly to dissuade the people from payment of this new tribute, or any other such like; perswading them in any case to defend their auncient liberties and customes: whereupon the churches were by the priests shut vp, publike prayers for the health of the Sultan intermitted, the Bassas houses assaulted, and all the citie on a new hurly burly. For the appeasing whereof, Amurath was glad to yeeld vnto the Ianizaries, to pay the souldiors out of his owne treasure, to reuoke his mandates giuen out for the exaction of the new tribute, and to deliuer the two persuaders thereof to the pleasure of the Ianizaries; who drew them vp and downe the streets at horses tailes, and afterwards cutting off their heads, in scorne toffed them from hand to hand one to another, as if they had bene tennis balls.

About the latter end of September Sinan Bassa of BVDA hauing with the assistance of the Sanzacks about FILIB, raised an armie of eleuen thousand soldiours, with purpose to haue spoiled all the vpper part of HUNGARIE, came the sixt of October before the castle of PVTNOG, and gaue thereunto summons: but finding them in the castle better provided and more resolute than he had before supposed, he departed thence, and passing the riuier Schayo, came to SIXO, a towne of about fife hundred houses, which after a fore batterie he tooke, and burnt it downe to the ground. In the meane while Claudius Russell, Generall for the warres in that part of HUNGARIE, hauing assembled his forces, came vpon him, and after an hard fight put him to the worke, when he had slaine of his Turkes about two thousand fife hundred, besides three hundred other drowned in the riuier Schayo. Shortly after, the Christians in like manner breaking into the frontiers of the Turkes, tooke from them the castles of B LAVENTSTEN, GESTES, with some other small forts thereabouts in the vpper part of HUNGARIE.

Sinan for that he had contrarie to the league, and without commaundement from Amurath, so vnfortunately attempted warre in HUNGARIE, was the next yeare in great displeasure sent for to CONSTANTINOPLE, and Ferat Bassa of BOSNA (late Generall of the Turkes armie against the Persians, and now but newly come home) placed in his rounge at BVDA.

Amurath before not ignorant of the great preparation that Philip the king of SPAIN had made, and of the inuincible Armado (as it was tearmed) by him set forth for the inuasion of ENGLAND (the same whereof had long before filled a great part of the world;) as also of the euill successe thereof the last yeare, viz. 1588; and of the purpose her Majestie of ENGLAND had for the troubling of his rich trade, especially into the West Indies, and for the relieuing of Don Anthonio, by him driuen out of PORTINGALL: writ vnto her about this time concerning those and such like matters as he had bene moued of by her Agent as followeth.

Amurath the third, Emperour of the Turkes, vnto Elizabeth, Queene of ENGLAND, FRANCE, and IRELAND, greeting.

Most honourable Matrone of the Christian religion, mirror of chastitie, adorned with the brightness of soveraigntie and power amongst the most chaste women of the people which serue Iustismistris of great kingdomes, reputed of greatest maiestie and praise among the Nazarets, Elizabeth queene of ENGLAND, to whom we wish a most happie and prosperous raigne. You shall understand by our high and imperiall letters directed vnto you, how that your Orator resiant in our statelie and magnificent Court, hath presented vnto the throne of our Maiestie a certaine writing, wherein he hath certified vs, how that about foure yeares agoe you haue made war vpon the king of SPAIN, for the abating and breaking of his forces, wherewith he threateneth all other Christian princes, and purposeth to make himselfe the sole Monarch both of them and all the world beside: as also how that the same king of SPAIN hath by force taken from Don Anthonio, lawfully created king of PORTINGALL, his kingdome: and that your intention is, that his ships which go and come into the Indies, may from henceforth be imbarred and stayed from that nauigation: wherein are yearely brought into SPAIN precious stones, spices, gold, and silver, esteemed worth many millions, wherewith the aforesaid king with a great treasure enriched, hath meanes to molest and trouble all other Christian princes: which if he shall still proceed to doe, he will make himselfe dayly stronger and stronger, and such an one as may not easily be weakened. After that, your aforesaid Orator requested our Highnesse in the beginning of the next Spring to send out our imperiall fleet against him, being assured that the king of SPAIN could not be able easily to withstand it for that he had now already receiued a great overthrow by your fleet: and being scarce able to withstand you alone, if he should be on diuers parts inuaded, must needs be overcome, to the great benefit of all the Christian princes, as also of our imperiall state. Besides this, that whereas the aforesaid Don Anthonio is by force driuen out and deprived of his kingdome, that (to the imitation of our noble progenitors of happie memorie, whose graues the Almighty light should also giue the aid and succour of our magnificent state; as did they vnto all such as had reuen) should also giue the aid and succour of our magnificent state; as did they vnto all such as had reuen) course vnto their high Courts and pallaces for reliefe. In briebe, all these things, with many others,

A which your aforesaid Orator hath at large declared vnto our imperiall throne, we haue well understood, and layed them up in our deepe remembrance. But for as much as we for many yeares past haue made warres in PERSIA, with a full resolution and intent vnto to conquer and subdue the kingdome of that accursed Persian hereticke, and to ioine the same vnto our antient dominions; and by the grace of God and helpe of our Great Prophet, are now vpon the point for the satisfying of our desire: that once done, due prouision shall be assigned vnto all such things as you haue of vs requested or desired. Wherefore if you shall sincerely and purely continue the bond of amitie and friendship with our high Court, you shall find no more secure refuge or safer harbour of good will or loue. So at length all things shall goe well and according to your hearts desire in your warres with SPAIN, vnder the shadow of our happie throne. And for as much as the king of SPAIN hath by fraud and deceit got whatsoeuer he holdeth, without doubt these deceitfull deceimurs shall by the power of God in short time be dispatched and taken out of the way. In the meane time we exhort you not to loose any opportunitie or time, but to be alwayes vigilant, and according to the conuentions betwixt vs, fauourable vnto our friends, and vnto our enemies a foe. And giue notice here to our high Court of all the new wars which you shall vnderstand of concerning the said king of SPAIN, for the behoofe both of your selfe and vs. To be briebe, your embassadour after he had with all care and diligence dispatched his embassage, and here left in his place one Edward Bardou his Deputie and Agent, now by our leaue maketh his returne towards your kingdome, being for the good and faithfull seruice he here did, worthie to be of you esteemed, honoured, and before others promoted: who when he hath obtained of you all those his deserved honours and preferments, let him or some other principall embassadour without delay be appointed to our imperiall Court, to continue this office of legation. This we thought good to haue you certified of vnder our most honourable Scale, wherunto you may giue vndoubted credence. From our imperiall pallace at CONSTANTINOPLE the 15 of the blessed moneth * Ramazan 1589.

* September.

Yet for all these faire shewes it may seeme vnto him that looketh more neere into the state of the Turkish affaires at those times, and that which hath ensued since, that Amurath glad of the discord of these two so great Christian princes, and not yet well assured of his new conquests in PERSIA, had no great mind to the inuasion of SPAIN, as too farre from the strength of his empire, an enterprise not to be so easily managed by sea, as were the wars he shortly after undertooke against the Christian emperour Rodolph by land: wherewith for all that (God be thanked) he found his hands full all the remainder of his life, as hath his sonne Mahomet that now reigneth after him, euen vnto this day.

About this time also the Polonian borderers (whom they call Cossackes) a rough and warlike kind of people, after their wonted manner making an inrode vpon the Turkes and Tartarians, vpon the sudden surprised KOSLAVA, a port town within a daies journey of CAPPA, where they had the spoile of many rich warehouses of the Turkes marchants, and the rising of certain ships lying there in harbour; and hauing taken their pleasure, burnt the rest, and so with a great boote returned to their lurking places. With which iniurie the Tartars prouoked, and set on by the Turkes, to the number of fortie thousand brake into PODOLIA and the prouinces neere vnto PODOLIA, and resting in no place, but burning the countrey before them, slew the poore countrey people without mercie; and making hauocke of all that they light vpon, beside the spoile, carried away with them many thousands of most miserable captiues: the greatest part whereof for all that, the Polonians rescued, with the notable slaughter of the enemy, surprised in his returne. Whereupon such vnkindnesse rose between the Turkish emperour and Sigismund the Polonian king, that it was thought it would haue broken out into open warres, had not the Polonian by his embassadours and the mediation of the queene of ENGLAND wisely appeased the angry Turke, and so againe renewed his league.

Amurath now at peace with the world, from which he by nature abhorred not, and sitting idle and melancholic at home, was persuaded by the Bassas his counsellors to take some new warre in hand. For that great empires (as they said) could not without the continuall vse of armes long stand or continue: as appeared by the Romane state, which so long as it was at wars with CARTHAGE; or their great captaines and commaunders occupied in armes against their neighbour princes, still remained triumphant, and commaunded ouer a great part of the world; but giuing it selfe to ease and pleasure, and the martiall men not after their wonted manner employed, it in short time by ciuile discord fell, and of the mistresse of the world became it selfe a prey euen vnto the the basest nations. Which old Cato in his great wisdom foreseeing, cried out in the Senat, That the souldiours and men of warre were to be kept still busied in armes farre from home: for that in so doing all should goe well with the state, and the glorie thereof encrease. VVherunto the Othoman emperours, his noble progenitors, hauing respect, propounded not peace as the end of their warres (as do other weake princes, hauing their owne forces in distrust) but as inuincible conquerours still sowed warres vpon warres, making one victorie the beginning of another: whereby they not onely brought that their empire vnto that greatnesse it was now of, but by such continuall employment made their souldiours more couragious and readie, and also kept them from rebellions and tumults: wherunto, in time of peace and liuing at ease, these martiall men are most commonly enclined, learning (as all others doe being doing nothing) to doe that is euill and nought. Euery thing (as they said) was by the same meanes to be maintained, whereby it was at the first encreased: and that therefore great empires as they were by warres begun and augmented, so were they by continuall wars also to be from time to time established; whereas otherwise the souldiours liuing in peace, and forgetting their martiall prowesse, would for most part grow cowardly, as giuing themselves ouer to the loue of their owne dwellings, of their wiues, and of their children, and other pleasures; or els conuerting their studies vnto marchandise or other profitable trades, would in time forget the vse of armes, and be therunto againe hardly drawne: vnto the great weakening of his strength both by sea and land, and the deminishing of the number of his great commanders and expert capitaines, not to be had without the continuall vse of warre. VVith these and such like reasons, the great Bassaes of the Court perswaded Amurath, That he must of necessitie take some new expedition in hand, and not to suffer his valiant souldiours, but now lately returned out of Persia, to grow lasie or insolent for lacke of employment. Which they did not so much for the loue of their prince, or zeale vnto the State, as for their own particular profit, especially the two old Bassaes Sinan and Ferrat, the enuious competitors the one of the others honour: who although they both much and almost all commaunded both in peace and warre, yet was their honours greater, and their profit farre more in commaunding of the Turkes great armies abroad, than in sitting in the Diuano at home: vnto which no lesse honourable than profitable preferment they both with like ambition aspired, accompanied with the hot desires of their great and many fauourites both at home and elsewhere. These perswasions well pleased Amurath, who although he were himselfe no souldior, yet was he desirous of new conquests, and to encrease his name: accounting it no lesse honour vnto himselfe by his seruants at his appointment to performe great things, than it was vnto his aunccestours to doe that they did themselves in person. But in this so serious matter, and of so great consequence, Amurath at the first could not tell what best to resolve vpon; not for that he was not desirous of warres, but because he as yet certainly knew not against whom he might with greatest profit and lesse difficultie and danger conuert his forces: vpon which point his counsellors agreed not, but for diuers reasons were of diuers opinions. Which for as much as they containe matters of greatest importance of all things then in the world done, but especially concerning the profit of the Christian commonweale, I shall not thinke it vnworth my labour to set them downe in such order as I find them credibly reported: hauing moreouer in them many secters and most weightie matters not yet come to all mens knowledge: as also opening the deuices of the Turkish tyrant against the Christian princes; a motiue not onely for them to joyne in counsell together how to withstand him, but for the common Christian commonweales sake to forget & forgiue all their priuat displeasures, and with their vnitd forces and power honorably and couragiously to make warre vpon him, and so at length by the mercie of God to ouerthrow him, together with his tyrannicall empire, the greatest terrour of our time.

The great Bassaes concerning the intended warre were of eight sundrie opinions: whereof the first was, That the warres against the Persian should be renewed: the second, for the inuasion of the king of Morocco and Fes: the third, for warre to be taken in hand against the king of Spain: the fourth, for the besieging againe of Malta: the fifth, was to set vpon the Venetians: the sixth, for the inuading of some part of Italy: the seventh, for the king of Polonia: the eighth and last was, for warre to be made vpon the emperour and the kingdome of Hungarie. VVith all the which aforesaid princes, except the Spaniard, although the Turke were then in league, and could not with all or any of them make warre, without the notable breach of his faith and honour: yet was that neuer made question or scruple of, but only, Which might best

A stand with the profit of his state for him to set vpon: his barbarous law allowing him that libertie, for the more assuring of his state or enlarging of his empire, to breake all faith and promise especially with the Christians; not more in any thing to be pitied, than in reposing any credit or confidence in the faith of such a miscreant.

The reasons the great Bassaes alledged for the renewing of the Persian warre, were, For that the Persian king was of himselfe like to breake the league so lately with him concluded, so soone as he should know the Turkes entangled in any other warre; moued thereunto, as well for the recouerie of his countrey to his great dishonour lost, as also in reuenge of so many and so great injuries to him of late done by the Turkish emperours. Beside that, the Christian princes would persuade him and pricke him forward thereunto: especially the Spaniard, who for the neerenesse of India might without his great charge procure him so to doe, and also conveniently furnish him with great ordinance and canoniars, which it was well knowne he of late did. The countries also but lately conquered, were not yet (as they said) in quietnesse or safetie, and the fortresses therein but of late built, together with the garrisons therein, to be in great danger, being for the length of the way and difficultie of the passage, not to be still speedily relieved: inso-much, that if the Persians did them no other harme, but onely to forrage and wast the countrey about them, they should bring the inhabitants into such distresse, as that those new conquered countries were againe by the defendants to be forsaken, or else they must themselves with hunger perish. True glorie (they said) consisted not so much in conquering, as in the vse of the conquest, and the prosecution of the happy victorie: and that therefore Amurath should take heed, C that he prouoked not the wrath and indignation of the Great prophet Mahomet against him; who hauing by his good fauour and guide obtained mo victories than any of his predecessours against the enemies of his religion, ought as a religious and deuout prince seuerely to reuenge the wrong by them done both to God and man. Vnto which religious warre Vsbeq Han the Tattar king, as also the prince of Grilan offered their readie helpe: as for the cunct of the victorie now as good as in his hand, he was to judge by the successe of his former warres. Neither that he need to feare the Persian horsemen, although they vsed Arabian horses, being by his men many times shamefully put to flight: or yet to doubt least the Georgians in fauour of the Persians should take vp armes, for that many of them were already vnder his obedience, and subject vnto the Bassa of Trebis and other his commanders; the rest were his vassals, or else such D as following the fortune of their princes, Simon and Alexander, sought after no greater matter, but contenting themselves with their own countrey, although but small, thought themselves well if they might keepe and defend the same; by nature and situation so strong, as that there is scarce any way into it, by reason of the high and broken mountaines, the thicke woods, and strait passages.

The second opinion which was deliuered, was for the transportation of his warres into Africa against the king of Morocco, commonly called the Seriphe: and that for these causes most, It would be a great shame and reproach (as they said) vnto the Othoman empire, that it was not yet able to subdue these Moores and people of Africa, in number but few: neither was it lesse shame or dishonour vnto the Othoman emperours, to haue so small a territorie in Africa, being the third part of the world, which by reason of the neerenesse vnto Italy, had long time held wars with the Romans. Beside that, Algers and Tynes could neuer be safely kept by the Turkes; neither that the subjects and pyrats which inhabited those cities would be content or at quiet, vntill they had againe got that kingdome into their hands. The promontorie of Agverro and port of Larace (two ports without the straits) were (as they said) to be taken, as places verie commodious for the Turkes friends, seeking in those seas after bootie, and for the securing of their trade. And although the Seriphe were himselfe a Mahometane, and held his kingdome as a tributarie vnto the Othoman empire; yet had he secret intelligence with the Spaniard and the knights of Malta, whereby they not long since had vpon the sudden almost surprisid Tripolis, he in the meane time as it were winking thereat. And that although F the Spaniard possessed in Africa, Maraschebir, Oran, Pregon, Tanger, Agdz, Zilla, Magaga, Cevteor Septa, places whereby he might helpe and assist the Moores; yet might his force and attempts by a strong fleet be easily hindered, and Spain it selfe infested. Beside that, the Spaniards had yet in such fresh remembrance the losse of Tynes and Gibraltar (places by them thought inexpugnable, and yet by Sinan Bassa to his immortall praise taken)

ken) as that they would not for the Moores sake easily seeme to attempt any thing against the G Turkes.

The third opinion was concerning the war to be made against them of MALTA, which was by a strong fleet to be performed: for that the gallies of MALTA did daily great hurt, as well vnto the Turkes merchants, as vnto such as for deuotion sake travelled by sea vnto M^ECHA. And that therefore the warre was thither to be transferred, not onely for religions sake and to assure the passage thither from the incursions of the Malteses, but also in reuenge of the old and late injuries by them done; and especially to blot out the infamie and disgrace which the Great Sultan Solyman had incurred, at such time as he had in vaine besieged that island, and to requite the losse by him there sustained. Beside that, they also alleadged the common complaints of the subjects: for that there were many which pitiously lamented the miserie and calamitie, some of H their friends, some their kinsfolke, whom they knew to liue in most wofull seruitude with those knights, and whom they most earnestly desired to haue now set at libertie: complaining, his subjects to haue been so farre from suffering of any such things from those knights in the time of his auncestors, as that contrariwise they themselves were by them driuen out of the island of the RHODES, the strongest bulwarke of the Christian common-weale toward the East. Being moreouer worthie also to be chastised, for that they had holpen the rebellious Moores with all kind of munition, and had themselves attempted to haue surprisid M^OON.

The fourth opinion for warre to be made against the K. of Spaine, and the reasons thereof.

In the fourth place were they which were of opinion, that it were best for him to make war vpon the king of SPAIN^E. These men alleadged it to be impossible for the Turkish empire to aspire vnto the Monarchie of the whole world (whereunto all the Turkes actions and deuises were alwaies as at a certaine marke directed) except the Spaniard his great strength and power were first weakened, wherein he seemed to surpasse all other the Christian kings and princes: and that there was no feare least he should besiege ALGIERS, which he knew to be now much better fortified than it was in the time of the emperor Charles the fifth. And that although the Spaniards without ceasing befought their king for the vndertaking of that expedition, by reason of the new losses and harmes which they daily received from the pyrats of AFRICA; yet would he not hearken vnto their request, for feare of the danger imminent both to himselfe and his subjects from the enemies fleet, which he should in so doing draw into the Spanish seas: neither would the Spanish gallies easily come into the Turkes countries in the East, for being too farre from their owne country, which for the most part stood in need of their helpe. And that the king of K SPAIN^E was with the multitude of his businesse, or other his vrgent affaires still so hindered, as that he could not suddenly put in execution what his counsell for the wars should decree. As also how much it was to be gathered by that which happened not long since at PREVEZA and NAVARINUM, That the Spaniards shunned the Othoman forces: as also how warily the king delt in all his affaires, least at length against his will he should be enforced to enter into warres with the Turke, was most manifest; as was to be seene when as of late about the end of the Persian warre, he refused to giue aid vnto the Persian king whom he might haue holpen, and was so before wont to doe. And in case that he would stand vpon his guard, and by force seeke to repell force; yet should he scarce haue so much strength as (beside those wars which he now maketh in diuers places) to be able to vndertake also a new warre, and to find so many souldiours, with so much coine and other things necessarie for so great a war. It stood him in hand (as they said) to defend the low countries, and to recouer againe the prouinces there lost, which of themselves wonderfull strong, both by reason of the sea and the multitude of the riuers, were also with wonderfull courage and pertinacie defended by the inhabitants, for their libertie and religions sake. VVhereunto the English (at deadly hatred with the Spaniard) might many waies giue great helpe, if they should inuade PORTINGAL, or with their ships lie in wait for his Indian fleet, or make incursions into other his kingdomes, as they did not long since at the GROINE and CADEZ; places most fit to trouble SPAIN^E, and to hinder his traffique into the Indies or other places. Beside that, he was at that time so entangled with his warres in FRANCE, as that he could scarce find how to dispatch himselfe thereof, without the losse of his honour and credit. And ad- mit he should make peace with the aforesaid princes, in such sort as that he should not be thence- forth from them receiue any harme; yet were other means to be sought and taken in hand for his farther disturbance; as by troubling his rich trade for spices and other merchandise, whereof he receiued great profit; as also if need were, by driuing his ships out of the Persian gulf, by the helpe of

A of those gallies which still lie at road at POSSIDIVM, which we now call SVZ. And that the fortresses and strong holds he there possesseth, were to be set vpon, and if it might be taken from him; as was once attempted against the Portugals at DIV and ORMVZ: the like whereof Alfonso Albuquerque (the king of PORTINGAL his viceroy in INDIA) attempted, when as with his light horsemen ruining through that countrey, he thought vpon the sudden to haue spoyleid M^ECHA, and to haue robbed the Sepulchre of Mahomet (as had happened vnder the empire of the Sultans) and as Traian the emperor had long since in like manner attempted to rage and spoile. Those places which he possessed in AFRICA, were (as they said) to be set vpon, and the coast of SPAIN^E towards the Mediterranean to be infested; so at length to gratifie the Moores his subjects, who still instantly requested the same, that so they might more safely traf- B fique and trauell, and that so the Moores might at length be deliuered from the importun com- mand of the Spaniards: of which exploit Sultan Selymus lately before dead, was in this time well perswaded; but might now at this time be much more commodiously done; for that the Moorish nation was now greatly increased, and much oppressed by the Spaniards; and hauing got great wealth by the trade of merchandise, euen by nature and religion had conceived a fier- tall hatred against the Spaniards: whereunto might not a little auaile the poise in AFRICA, whereinto the Turkes fleet might at all times in safetie retire: And in briefe; that which was of greatest importance to the better successe of this war, the French king and the queene of EN- C LAND, had of their owne accord promised the continuation of their warres; and that the French king should inuade NAVARRE, and by force of armes recouer the right he pretended vnto that kingdome; whilest in the meane time, the queene of ENGLAND should not only trouble him in the West Indies, and other places of the Ocean towards the North and the West, but might also stirre vp new broiles in the kingdome of PORTINGAL, where most part of the people with great impatientie beare the proud command of the Spaniard: as perswaded (and that truly) all their prosperitie and quietnesse to haue been lost, together with their last king their true and law- full soueraine. For he at peace with the kings of FRANCE and ENGLAND, exceedingly there- by enriched his subjects by traffique: whereas since they fell into the hands of the Spaniard, they daily complaine of their new losses and dangers by reason of his perpetuall wars. Moreouer, that there was to be found great store of exiled Spaniards dispersed here and there, which being malecontent and wearie of the Spanish gouernment, were fled not only out of PORTINGAL; D but euen out of ARAGON & other parts of his kingdome: which now liuing in FRANCE, ENGLAND, and CONSTANTINOPE, both secretly and openly liberally offered great helpes: the like whereof many of the Moores also promised. All which together seemed to promise a most easie expedition and certaine victorie, if any should vpon the sudden inuade SPAIN^E; for that there was almost no vse of armes, the inhabitants at home seldome times exercising themselves therein; neither in places needfull hauing any ordinat garrisons, and but few horses fit for ser- uice. And that in fine it was to be considered, SPAIN^E to be greatly bared of men which knew how valiantly and courageously to mannage armes, for the often choise they make of them; which are almost daily transported into the Indies, ITALIE, and the Low countries, whereby the strength of his countrey must needs be exceedingly impaired: so that if they should be inua- E ded with any strong and mightie armie, they might seeme hardly able to be holpen or defended by their owne people, but should need of the aid and helpe of the other neere prouinces subject vnto this kingdome: which if they should be either letted or stay to come in good time, they should leaue so much the more easie victorie vnto their enemies.

In the fift place were they which went about to persuaide Amurath to breake his league with the Venetians, vsing reasons rather probable than true; although they might seeme vnto the Turkes lesse doubtfull, for that men easily and willingly beleue such things as they themselves desire. These men went about to proue no expedition to be of lesse difficultie than this, as jud- ging of things present by the euent of former warres passed; wherein the Turkes had alwaies taken something from the Venetians: who to redeeme their peace, were diuers waies enforced to F satisfie the Turkes. That the Venetian common-weale was afraid of the Turkes and abhorred warre, was manifest they said in that, that in all actions it had propounded vnto it selfe peace, as the end thereof; and after the manner of their auncestors, neuer entered into warres; but enforced thereunto: and would happily vpon the first denouncing of warres, willingly depart with cer- taine places for feare of greater harme, or to be vtterly overcome, as it appeared they did in the

yeelding vp of CYPRVS. The power and force whereof was not so great, as that it could alone stand against the great Sultan: and to confederat it selfe with others, would require no small delay, for the great and many difficulties which commonly vsed to arise in making of leagues; not being now so conioyned with the Spaniard as in times past, of whose aid it being of late destitute, was constrained to make an hard peace with Selymus. And if so be the Spaniard would needs joyne himselfe vnto the Venetians against the Turkes, yet that he could by no means affoord vnto them such aid and supplies as were of necessitie to be required vnto so great a war, he himselfe being in his warres otherwise so entangled: as for all other confederation they could make without him, to be but weake and to no purpose. That which the Pope could do herein to be but little: for albeit he should according to his dutie exhort other Christian princes to giue aid, and to stirre them vp vnto this warre, yet that beside some little supplie of mony hardly drawne out of his owne cofers and the ecclesiasticall reuenues, he could scarcely performe any thing more; or when he had done his vttermost deuoir, could but joyne fise gallies of his owne vnto the Venetian fleet: which with the gallies of the duke of SAVOY, of the knights of MALTA, and of the Florentines, could but make a fleet of some twentie gallies, which was but a small matter. Besides that the Turkes were perswaded, that betwixt the Venetian state and the other Christian princes was no such friendship and good agreement, as the greatnesse of the imminent danger of that warre, and as the necessitie of the cause would require: and that hitherto their treasures had bene so exhausted in paying the debt they were run into in the last warre, and in building of fortresses, that happily they were not now so furnished with coyne, as was requisite for the defraying of so great a warre. And vnto this warre against the Venetians, consented almost all the Visier Bassaes, differing only in this, VV here or against what place of the Venetian territorie this warre were to be first begun: some naming one place, and some another (for diuers reasons them therunto leading) which for breuitie we passe ouer.

The sixt opinion for the attempt- ing of Italie, and the reasons thereof.

Other some of the Bassaes in the sixt place, reiecting all the former opinions concerning the warre to be taken in hand, would haue had all the forces of the Othoman empire, as well by land as sea, to haue bene conuerted against ITALIE: for that otherwise the Turkes should neuer come vnto the Monarchie of the whole world (whereunto as at a marke they had directed all their actions) except they did first subdue ITALIE. For that this countrey, as the centre of the whole world, was wont to giue both counsell and aid vnto the rest of the limbes, whereby the deuices of others were crossed: and that the Romanes had at length commaunded ouer all the world, especially for that they held in possession this countrey: Hereat did the Hunnes, the Alani and Gothes, the Vandales, the Frenchmen, Spaniards, and Sarasins, direct all their thoughts and cogitations. In fine they concluded, That no expedition could be taken in hand more honourable or profitable than this: for that ITALIE was as a queene amongst other prouinces, for conimodious situation, the wholesomenesse of the aire, the plentie of all things necessarie for mans life, for great, faire, and most rich cities, for the auntient glorie and maiestie of the Romane empire, and many other causes also. Neither that this expedition was to be deemed of much difficultie, for that ITALIE was vnder the rule of diuers princes, vnto whose commaund most of their subjects vnwillingly obeyed: as also for that the inhabitants of that countrey had now for many yeares liued in continuall peace, and were therefore the more effeminate and fearefull, and so vnfit for the warres: and that if that expedition were in one or diuers places taken in hand before the corne were full ripe, the Turkes in that so fruitfull a countrey could neuer want necessaries for them to liue vpon; whereas the inhabitants in great number wanting the same, and shut vp within the wals and fortifications of their cities and strong townes, should be brought into extreame wants: which was the more euidently to bee seene, for that at this time wherein they were at peace, they had not corne sufficient in the countrey for such a multitude of people to liue vpon, but were glad to haue it brought vnto them from other places, especially from PELOPONNESVS, CONSTANTINOPLE, and the cities vpon the coast of the great Ocean. Furthermore, that it was to be considered, That most part of the Italians liued by no other meanes than by their handie labour, or the trade of marchandise; of which meanes if they were depriued, they should in short time be brought to that point, as to be glad to accept of such conditions as the victor should propound vnto them, or as tributaries to submit themselves vnto the Othoman government. Neither that the souldiours would vnwillingly be drawne vnto that war, for that they were not to passe through barren regions of the enemy, frozen with yse, or desolate, either

A either by rough woods or inaccessible mountains; but were all the way thither to traueill through their owne country, and as it were in the sight of their own houses: and if the Turkes could oftentimes enter so farre, when as they had their confines more remote, and their passages more difficult, that the same might now much more easily be effected, when as they had a far greater opportunity, and their enemies so neere at hand.

The seuenth opinion was theirs, which thought it best to haue the war transferred into POLONIA, and from thence into HUNGARIE and GERMANIE: for which they alledged these reasons. First, for that they thought it a disgrace vnto the maiestie and reputation of the Othoman empire, That the king of POLONIA had sometime refused to pay his tribute due (for so the Turkes account of all such presents as are vnto their Sultan vsually sent by their neighbour princes, of courteisie) and that therefore he was by force of armes to be compelled therunto. VVhich they thought would the more easily be obtained, for that there was much secret hatred and heart-burning amongst the Polonian nobilitie. Neither that it would be any difficult or dangerous warre to bee taken in hand: for as much as POLONIA was confined with MOLDAVIA, the Tartars, and the Sanzacks of ACHERMAN, BENDERA, and VOSTA: and moreover, for that the Turkes could neuer haue any assured or full possession of MOLDAVIA or VALACHIA, except the insolencie of the Polonians were repressed; the Vayuods of which countries, when they had enriched themselves with much wealth, vsed still to flie into the kingdome of POLONIA. Besides that, they should thereby reuenge themselves for the injuries done them by the Cossackes, and haue more free and safe trafficke into MVSCOVIE, and bring a tertour vpon the duke of MVSCOVIE, by reason of the highnesse of the country: which great duke was an impediment vnto the Othoman emperour, that he conquered not the whole kingdome of PERSIA. And when they had by this meanes by little and little drawne neere vnto GERMANIE, happily it might lo come to passe, as that the Christian emperour should thereby receiue some notable losse, his empire being still more and more exposed and enuironed with the Turkes forces & garrisons. POLONIA they said to be a plaine and open countrey, neither to haue any strong places for to withstand them, and the inhabitants to haue small skill in martiall affaires, for that they had now long liued in peace. For as for the war that they had with Maximilian the Archduke of AVSTRIA, it continued not long: and king Stephen in the late wars he had with the Muscouite, vsed for most part the Hungarian souldiours, and ended those wars rather by besieging than fighting.

D They which in the eight and last place delivered their opinions concerning the intended war, perswaded, to haue it conuerted vpon the Christian emperour; whom the Turkes call the king of VIENNA. The causes they alledged for the beginning of this warre was, For that the Vscocchi were growne so insolent as to make good prife of the Turkes both by sea and land; in such sort, as that not onely for the harmes which they did, but euen for the maiestie and honour of the Othoman empire, their insolencie was not longer to be suffered. By whose injuries it was especially brought to passe, that the marchants to their great hinderance in priuat, and the Sultans great losse in common, hauing left the towne of NARENTO or NARONA in the Turkes dominion, had removed their mart to SALONA (now called SPALATO) a towne of the Venetians: and that yet for all that was not so sufficiently provided for the securitie of the said marchants, although there were peace betwixt the emperour and the Venetians: for that these vnuly men for most part liuing vpon the spoyle, troubled all both by sea and land with their robberies, driving away mens cattell, burning the villages, and taking away the young babes out of the mothers armes and laps. VV hereby it was easily to be seene, what mind they were of: and that it was not to be doubted, but that if occasion should serue for them to surprize any of the Turkes strong holds vpon the frontiers, they would with all their power attempt the same: which what a dishonour and infamie (not to speake of the losse) it would be vnto the whole Othoman empire, euery man might easily ghesse. Neither that it was vnknowne how little the Christian emperour had esteemed of the Turke, at such time as he was in warres with the Persian, paying his tribute too late at his pleasure; an euident signe rather of violating than of establishing the league. And that the good successe of this warre was not to be deemed either difficult or doubtfull: for that the attempt might be giuen both by CROATIA, HUNGARIE, and AVSTRIA, countries abounding with all things necessarie for the maintenance of a great armie; as also for that they were almost to traueill all the way in the Turkes owne territorie. Beside that, the chiefe fortresses of HUNGARIE, namely BELGRADE, BUDA, and ALBA REGALIS, with many other strong places, ces, were already holden by the Turkes garrisons, whither their armies might in all cases of extremity retire, or out of the same garrisons repaire their losses, if any should be. The Romane empire (as they said) was more desirous of peace than war; and the princes, of nothing more carefull than how to heape up and preserve their treasures: and the people of GERMANIE for that of long they had had no warres, to be lesse fit now to beare armes, and worse to be commanded by their captaines; alwayes having in distrust the Hungarians, the Italians, and Spaniards, for that those nations are not beloued, but rather hated of the Germans, being not at unity among themselves, but devided, especially about matters of religion. Neither that it was to be feared, least forraigne princes should giue aid vnto the emperor in this warre: For the Polonian and Transylvanian to liue now in peace with the Turke, and therefore would by no means turne the heat of this warre into their owne bosomes; as also for that the Polonians were afraid, lest in doing they should be driuen out of their countrey, and enforced to remoue themselves toward the frozen sea: and the Transylvanian having receiued his souerainetie from the Turke, no lesse in feare (if he should do so) to be of him againe stript and spoyle of the same: As for the king of SPAINIE, although he were of such power, as might affoord vnto the house of AVSTRIA great aid, yet that he was in other places now too much buied: and that the bishop of ROME could not in all places be readie to serue his turne: the princes of ITALIE would not spend their subjects and treasures to pleasure another man: and that the Venetian State would not rashly stirre up the Turkes armes against themselves, but rather at ease expect the event of the warre than to entangle themselves with other mens dangers. These were the chiefe opinions of the great Basses concerning the warre to be taken in hand, not so much proceeding from any tipe or sound aduice (as commonly they doe) but rather from a certaine barbarous insolencie and contempt of others, wherewith they moued, doe oftentimes vainely persuaide them of the easie performance of diuers expeditions: which in prooffe they find to be not onely most difficult, but vnto themselves also most pernicious.

In this so great diuersitie of opinions stood Amurath, of long in doubt what to resolute upon: desirous he was in all places to shew his power, and (if it were possible) to exceed the glorie of his predecessours, as he thought himselfe to haue already done in PERSIA, hauing as he boasted, by his seruants there performed more than they could themselves in person with their mightie armies. Wherefore contenting himselfe with that he had already done in the East, he resolved now to turne his forces against the Christian emperor towards the West, and that for diuers respects. First, it grieved him to see the honour of the house of AVSTRIA; and that it durst to make head against him: besides that, to make warre vpon a countrey confining vpon his owne, would be a thing of farre lesse difficultie than was the Persian war, where his armies were now still to be led through his owne peaceable countries, from whence they were to bee at all times plentifully relieved with victuals and whatsoever els they needed. In which opinion he was also confirmed by Sinan Bassa; who hauing in vaine persuaaded him to haue made warre against the Venetians, furthered now this warre, in hope thereby to recover his credit and reputation, (before greatly empaired abroad by the litle he did in PERSIA, as also at CONSTANTINOPLE, by the discord betwixt him and Ferat Bassa, commonly called the Blacke Serpent) as also to encrease his wealth and riches: which shortly after sort to his desire, being by the great Sultan Amurath appointed Generall for those wars. But about all others, Hassan Bassa of BOSNIA furthered this matter, in hope thereby to haue gained great riches (as the Turkes manner is) together with the greatest honours of the field, as hee was most vainely persuaaded by his cold prophets, to whom he gaue no small credit. He therefore daily certified Amurath of the harmes which the Vscocchi and other the Archduke his seruants and subjects did vpon the frontiers of his territories: telling him of their burnings, spoylings, and robbings, inciting him to begin his warre in CROATIA, and so to continue the same either against the emperor, or the Venetians, or els vpon the sudden that way to breake into ITALIE, as had sometime the like beene done in the time of Mahomet, Baiazet, and Solyman, his noble progenitours: whereby to bring a great terror vpon all the princes of ITALIE, and to enrich his souldiours with rich spoyles. By which his importunitie he (as a most mortall enemy not onely vnto the house of AVSTRIA, but vnto all Christendome) got leaue to begin those stirres in the frontiers of the empire, which were first fatall vnto himselfe, and haue euer since euen vntill this day notably exercised the armes of these two last Othoman emperours Amurath and Mahomet; as also the Christian emperor, with others

Others his friends and confederats. Yet vnto this leaue granted vnto the Bassa, was this condition at the first annexed, That he should not seeme to doe it by the commaundement of Amurath, but of himselfe, vnder colour to restraine the Vscocchi; who as well by land as by sea (as he pretended) spoiled both the Christians and Turkes, by the great libertie of the princes of AVSTRIA, hauing small care to chasten them.

Now was it no great matter for Hassan Bassa to doe what Amurath, his great lord and master had commaunded, for the disturbing of the peace betwixt him and the Christian emperor: the Turkes leagues with their neighbour princes beinge seldome so religiously kept, but that as well their souldiours in garrison vpon their frontiers by land, as their adventures by sea, might to keepe themselves doing, vpon a militarie insolencie (as the Turkes tearme it) now and then at their pleasures make incursions for bootie both by sea and land: which answered with the like from their neighbours so molested; there neuer wanted new grieuances and just causes of complaint, to the stirring vp of greater troubles, euen amongst the greatest princes. The Venetians thus wronged at sea; and their merchants robbed; by their embassadours complained at CONSTANTINOPLE of the injuries done them by the Turkes pyrats, requiring to haue them called home, and justice done vpon them. In like manner the emperor also, seeing many things both this yeare and the next attempted by Hassan Bassa in CROATIA, and the other Turkes in HUNGARIE, contrarie to the league, to the great disturbance of his subjects in both those countries, by his embassadour then lying at CONSTANTINOPLE, complained of these outrages, desiring to know whether they were done by the consent and knowledge of Amurath or not; and if not, C then to require that order might be taken for the restraining thereof: which was accordingly done, and those incursions for a while staied; and the former peace continued. Amurath still making shew as if he were willing that the league agreed vpon for eight yeares, should not be in any wise on his part infringed. At which time the Persian kings sonne (the league not long before concluded) died in the Turkes Court; where he lay in hostage: whose dead bodie Amurath caused to be honorably sent home to his father into PERSIA: with an Apologie in defence of himselfe, against the suspicion conceived by some, that he should haue bene the cause of the vntimely death of that young prince; still vrging withall the confirmation of the league, which by the death of the prince was like enough to haue been broken. Whereof Amurath was the more desirous, for that persuaaded by his Bassaes (as is aforesaid) to make warres with the emperor (although he notably dissembled the same) he was in hope thereby to adde vnto his empire the reliques of HUNGARIE, with some good part of the territories of the house of AVSTRIA also, and so to open himselfe a way into the heart of GERMANIE. For which purposes he now caused very great preparation to be made, and a strong armie to be raised: and at the same time put a great fleet of gallies into the Archipelago for the safetie of his islands in that sea.

According to these designments, the Bassa of BOSNIA, by the commandement of Amurath, with an armie of fiftie thousand entred into CROATIA, and without resistance burnt and destroyed the countrey before him, sparing nothing that came in his way. And not so contented, laid siege to the citie of WHITZ, being the metropolitane citie of that countrey, strongly situated as it were in an island, compassed about with the riuer Yna: Which citie, after he had sore battered, and twice assaulted, was by the distressed defendants (now despairing of reliefe, and unable longer to hold it out) yeilded vnto the Bassa vpon composition. That the German souldiours there in garrison, might in safetie with bagge and baggage depart; and that such of the Christian citifens as would, might there still remain without hurt from the Turkes, either in bodie or goods. Which conditions the Bassa faithfully performed to the garrison souldiours, whom in number but foure hundred, he sent with safe conuoy into their owne territorie: but afterwards contrarie to his faith and promise, exercised all manner of Turkish tyrannie vpon the poore citifens. The emperor troubled with this vnexpected inuasion of the Turkes, sent the lord Petzen (whom he had many times employed in embassages to the Turke) to pray aid of the German princes against the common enemy: who according to the greatnesse of the danger, in large tearmes promised their helpe. The first that made head, was Ernestus archduke of AVSTRIA, the emperours brother; who with fife thousand souldiours came from VIENNA to SAVARIA, commonly called GREIS, the Metropolis of STIRIA: to whom repaired daily more strength out of CARINTHIA.

Whitish the Metropolitane citie of Croatia; yeilded to the Turkes.

In the meane time, the Turkes armie daily encreasing in CROATIA, enclosed six thousand footmen, and five hundred horsemen of the Christians, who had taken the mountaines, woods, and strait passages, and so straitly beset them, that of all that number few escaped with life; amongst whom many valiant souldiours and expert captaines were slaine; namely, James Pyant, George Plesbach, and John Weluerdurff. The Bassa after the barbarous manner of the Turkes, to make his victorie more famous, laded six wagons with the heads of the slaine Christians. The Turkes thus raging in CROATIA, brought a generall feare vpon all HUNGARIE, BAVARIA, BOHEMIA, STIRIA, CARINTHIA, SILESIA, and the rest of the prouinces thereabouts. Whereupon the emperour calling together the States of SILESIA and MORAVIA, declared vnto them the imminent danger; perswading them to joyne their forces with the rest; for the repulsing of so dangerous an enemy, and so imminent a danger.

After long delay, Ernestus the archduke (the tenth of August) came to the emperour his brother, with the embassadour of HUNGARIE; and the seauenth day after were called together the embassadours of the kingdomes and prouinces of the empire, where it was thoroughly debated, how the Turkes were to be resisted, and their attempts infringed; as also from whence, forces, money, and other warlike prouision was to be raised. For now it was manifestly seene, that longer to delay the matter was dangerous: and the rather, for that the Beglerbeg (or great commander) of GRACIA, with threecore thousand select souldiours both horse and foot, of long time exercised in the Persian warres, was ere long expected; who joyning with the rest of the Turkes armie, might doe great matters both in HUNGARIE and the places adioyning. For preventing of which so great and manifest dangers, they sat daily in counsell at PRAAG, yea of tentimes euen from morning vntill night: for the Hungarians, and especially the lord Nadasti, a most noble & valiant gentleman amongst them, instantly vrge to haue succours sent into HUNGARIE; for as much as the Turkish emperour, if he should get into his hands the rest of the townes and castles yet holden by the Christians in HUNGARIE, it was to be feared lest he should in short time after endanger the whole State of GERMANIE: the strength whereof the Turke feared not so much, as hee did those poore reliques of HUNGARIE. Others were no lesse carefull of the dangers of CROATIA and STIRIA, as more proper to themselves, the enemy now there raging. In these so great dangers, the Hungarians with the rest of the distressed, cried vpon the emperour for helpe; and he likewise called vpon the princes of the empire. Diuers assemblies were made in BOHEMIA, HUNGARIE, MORAVIA, SILESIA, and the other prouinces of the emperours, and embassadours sent from almost all the Germane princes to the emperour: all was full of consultation, but as for helpe, that came in verie slowly; yet such as was to be had, was forthwith sent into CROATIA, to defend the fortresses there against the farther attempts and proceedings of the furious enemy.

Certaine vaine attempts of the Turkes.

The eighteenth of September, the Turkes with all warlike prouision, vpon the sudden by night assaulted the strong castle of TOCCAY in the vpper HUNGARIE, in hope to haue surprised it: but finding it a matter of more difficultie than they had before imagined, they departed thence, and attempted the lesser COMARA, which standing in a marish ground, was also easily defended. At which time also the Bassa of BVDA, with his power entred into the frontiers of the Christians, but hauing well viewed the cities, townes, castles, and forts vpon those borders, and finding nothing for his purpose, he without any thing doing returned againe to BVDA.

Turopolis spoiled by the Turkes.

The six and twentieth day of September, Hassan the Bassa of BOSNA encamped with his army betwixt the riuers of Kulp and Sauus, and in the darknesse of the night passing ouer part of his armie into TVROPOLIS, with fire and sword most miserably spoiled all that pleasant and fertile island; the lord Bonny to whom the keeping thereof was committed, labouring in vaine to defend the same.

About the end of this moneth, the Bassa of ZIGET, with the Sanzackes of MOHAS, KOPAN, and QVINQVE ECCLESIE, and other Turkes of great name, came with a strong armie, and encamped betwene ZIGET and RODSTO. And shortly after newes was brought to the emperours Court, that KANSIA a citie of STIRIA (not farre from the riuier Zala) was hardly besieged by the enemy, and that the Turkes in comming thither had taken many Christians captiues, whom they had sent to be sold at CONSTANTINOPLE; and that there was in the Turkes armie about an hundred & threecore thousand men. But for as much as the Christian armie daily encreased also, and was now grown to the number of threecore thousand, men began to hope well,

A well, that the enemies rage would be staied from any farther proceeding. About the same time Ernestus the archduke appointed Generall of the armie, with the Marquesse (sonne to Ferdinand the archduke) his lieutenant, came both vnto the armie.

In these preparations, about the beginning of October heauie newes was brought vnto the emperours Court, how that seauen thousand men whom he but a little before had sent into CROATIA, vnder the conduct of Thomas Artelius Beane, George Gleichspacher, and Dionysius Denke, to hinder the course of the Turkes proceedings, being encamped betwixt WHITZ and CAROLSTAT; and hauing the twelfth of September discovered from an high hill certaine companies of the Turkes (which were in deed of purpose come thither to view the armie of the Christians) sent out fiftie horsemen to discover the Turkes armie where it lay, and what it attempted.

B Who finding no mo of the Turkes than those whom they had before seene from the mountaine, returned againe vnto the armie with such simple intelligence: whereunto the Christians giuing credit, became secure in their tents, as men out of feare of the enemy, and so kept but negligent watch. But in this their so great securitie, the enemy on a sudden came vpon them, and with an hundred thousand men brake into their trenches: where the Christian footmen for all that, for the space of foure houres, maintained a notable fight; wherein many were on both sides slaine. But the poore Christians being beset round, and oppressed with the multitude of their enemies, were there slaine almost all: yet the captaines seeing the danger, by speedie flight saued their liues; for which their cowardise and carelesse negligence, they were afterwards apprehended and beheaded. Almost all the common souldiours were there slaine: yea such as fell alieue into the hand of the enemy, were most cruelly cut in pieces. The spoile also of the tents of the Christians, fell vnto the enemy: wherein beside abundance of other things, they found sixtie thousand dollars, brought but two daies before from LINZ for the souldiours pay. The Turkes after their barbarous manner, in ostentation of their victorie, laded foureene wagons with the heads of the slaine Christians, which they sent vnto diuers of their places thereabouts. This was indeed a great victorie, but gained by the Turkes with much blood: for the Christians fighting as men desperat, slew of their enemies aboue twelue thousand, and died themselves as men rather with number oppressed, than with true valour vanquished.

The night following, the Turkes vpon the sudden in the dead time of the night, surprised the castle of S. George, and without respect of age or sex cruelly put to the sword all them that were therein, except an hundred and fiftie persons whom they carried away captiues; and so setting the castle on fire, departed. At the same time, diuers companies of the Turkes were seene about STIRIA, who led away with them about six hundred Christians into most miserable captiuitie. And that nothing might be wanting vnto the calamities of this so miserable a wasted countrey: three hundred wagons charged with all manner of prouision sent out of the prouinces thereby for the reliefe of the garrison souldiours in CROATIA, were all intercepted by the Turkes, and so carried away.

The emperour prayeth aid against the Germane princes.

The emperour considering these proceedings of the Turkes, and that their strength daily encreased, gaue notice by writing to all the princes and states of the empire, what incursions the Turkes had of late made into CROATIA and the frontiers of HUNGARIE, with other places neere vnto them: and that the Beglerbeg of GRACIA, with the Bassaes of BOSNA, BVDA, and TEMESVAR, without regard of the league yet in force, had taken diuers cities, townes, castles, and strong places, and so extended the bounds of their dominion aboue fortie Germane miles, hauing slaine or carried away into captiuitie the poore inhabitants of those countries; and now to be growne to that height of pride, that except their farther proceedings were with like forces repressed, they would in short time set foot into GERMANIE it selfe, and possessing themselves of STIRIA and CARINTHIA, would from thence daily more and more encroach vpon the empire; which to hinder was not in his power onely, but required their helpe in generall: wherefore he requested them now at length, in so publike a danger to open their cofers, and to send out their forces against the common enemy. Which request of the emperours, with the due consideration of so great a danger, moued not only the princes and states of the empire, but others also farther off, to yeeld liberall contribution vnto so necessarie and generall a cause.

The Turkes now hearing of the great preparation of the Christian princes, beside the armie which was already in the field; and that they had made a strong bridge ouer the riuier of DRAUUS, which they had also fortified, thereby in safetie at their pleasure to transport their armie: without without further delay furnished such places as they had gotten with strong garrisons, and so withdrew themselves into their owne territorie: which they did the rather, for that the plague then raged sore in CONSTANTINOPL, insomuch that there died a thousand a day. Which contagion had also taken hold of the Turkish armie: so that the Christians for feare of infection forthwith slew what Turke soever fell into their hands. And thus ended the troubles of this year, being but as it were an introduction for greater to ensue the year following.

Diwers incursions of the Turkes into the frontiers of the Christians in Croatia and Hungarie.

The Turkes together with the beginning of the new year began also their wonted incursions into the frontiers of the Christians. They of the garrison of PATRINIA (a strong fort but lately and contrarie to the league built by the Turkes vpon the river Colapis or Kulp, for the further inuasion of CROATIA) made dayly excursions out of that new fort, and entering into the island TROPOLIS, spoyle and burnt the towne and castle of BACK-VICROVAINA, and hauing made a great slaughter, carried away with them foure hundred prisoners. And in HUNGARIE, the Turkish garrisons to supplie their wants, made diuers rodes vpon the Christians; and did exceeding much harme; of which aduenturers six hundred in passing ouer the frozen lake, were all drowned in the midst thereof. In another place three thousand of them nere vnto NYMVS, deuided themselves into two companies, whereof the one shewed it selfe in the sight of the townesmen, the other still lying close in ambush: They of the towne vpon the sight of these Turkes sallied out, and causing them to retire, followed them so far, that they were past the place where the rest of the Turkes lay: who presently starting vp, ran with all speed toward the towne in hope to haue surpris'd it, and wanted not much of that they desired: for there was scarce an hundred of the Germanes there in garrison left in the towne, who had scarce so much time as to draw vp the bridges: which done, they with the great ordinance from the wals enforced the Turkes to retire and forsake the towne. About the same time also, the Turkes in garrison at PATRINIA sallying out vpon the sudden, tooke the towne of MARTENIZE, which they spoyle; and hauing slaine and taken about seuen hundred persons, set fire on the towne, and so returned, hauing lost in this exploit not past an hundred and fiftie of their owne men. Not long after, the same garrison souldiours of PATRINIA tooke another castle, three miles distant from the river of Kulp, whereinto the Christians dwelling round about, had for feare of the enemy conveyed all their wealth with great store of victuals: all which the Turkes tooke, and hauing slaine six hundred men in the castle, returned with an exceeding rich boorie to PATRINIA: which they bought, with the liues of five hundred of their fellowes, slaine in taking of the castle. With like infolencie did also the other garrisons of the Turkes rage in all the other part of HUNGARIE. About CASSOUIA, in the vpper HUNGARIE, they carried away about three hundred Christian captiues: and in the nether part of HUNGARIE they tooke the strong castle of S. Hedwig vpon the lake of Balaton, which they spoyle and burnt: and so likewise the castle of ISNA: but attempting the lesser COMARA, they were by the garrison souldiours valiantly repulsed. They also fortified the castle of STOK, which they had but a little before taken, that so it might serue for a safe refuge for their aduenturers. Which their manifold outrages, contrarie to the league, euidently declared the desire they had to begin that bloudie warre which presently after ensued: and was indeed the more suspected, for that at the same time the emperours embassadour Fredericke Crocowitz was by the commaundement of Amurath shut vp close in his house at CONSTANTINOPL, and not suffered to speake with any man, neither to write or to send any messenger to the emperour: which caused him the more to suspect some great matter to be by the Turke intended, and therefore began to raise new forces. The Hungarians and Bohemians also seeing their townes and castles thus taken, their prouinces spoyle, infinit numbers of people led away into captiuitie, and the enemy dayly encreasing in strength: at length agreed, vpon their owne charges to maintain a certaine number both of horse and foot, for the repreffing of these the Turkish incursions.

Now although the emperour knew right well all these outrages of the Turkes, contrarie vnto the league, could not be done without the knowledge and good liking al of Amurath: as before enformed thereof by his embassadour from CONSTANTINOPL: yet to shew himselfe willing to haue the league on his behalfe kept, as also to make a further prooffe of Amurath his resolution for peace or warre, he wrote vnto him as followeth:

Rodolph

Rodolph the second, Emperour of the Romanes; vnto Amurath king of the Turkes.

whereas nothing is hitherto on our behalfe omitted, for the preservation and continuance of the league and amitie betwixt your most excellent maiestie and vs, by the renewed capitulations of peace; and that we haue with all sinceritie and loue performed, and are hereafter readie to performe whatsoever is on our part to be performed and done; and as we haue hitherto, so for ever hereafter also make offer of the same: we most assuredly promise vnto our selues on your maiesties behalfe, that you in like manner will not suffer any thing on your part to be wanting; but gladly and willingly to doe all things which shall be meet and needfull for the preservation and keeping of this our mutuall loue and friendship. Vpon which good hope grounding our selues, to declare our plaine meaning and sinceritie indeed, we will cause our honourable Present (which is now readie) to be brought vnto your most royall maiestie, at such time as shall bee agreed vpon betwixt our embassadour and you: vnto whom in all such matters as he by our commaundement shall haue to deale with your most excellent maiestie, your visitors or seruants, we request you to giue full credence. In the meane time your excellencie shall doe well to provide, that as we haue now seuerely commaunded our subiects to keepe the peace vpon our frontiers, so that your souldiours also make no incursions as enemies into our territories, nor doe in them any harme, but to endeuour themselves also to peace and quietnesse: and especially, that all such things as contrarie to the capitulations of the league haue bene there of late taken from our people or otherwise vniuilly possessed, may be againe restored, the losses recompensed, the new fort of PATRINIA demolished, and the Bassa of BOSNA and others the authors of breaking of the league punished and displaced: whereby we shall gather your royall maiesties most noble and kind affection towards vs and our State: which as it shall be a thing most iust, so shall it be a singular confirmation of our league. But concerning these matters, and others to the same belonging, our embassadour is to declare our mind more at large, that so our preft desire for the continuance of our league and friendship with your maiestie, may more plainly be knowne. So wish we all health and prosperitie vnto your most royall maiestie. From PRAGE the eight of March, 1593.

The emperour also at the same time and to the same purpose writ to Sinan Bassa in this sort.

Rodolph the second, Emperour of the Romanes; to Sinan Bassa the chiefe Visier, greeting.

We write at this present vnto your most excellent Emperour, our most honoured friend and neighbour, concerning such matters as we thought fit for the preservation of the peace and league betwixt vs, least happily otherwise we might seeme to haue forgotten our dutie. Now it shall well beseeeme your vprightnesse and good will, which we haue at other times proued, for the high place and authoritie which you hold (and which we reioice to be againe restored vnto you) to giue vnto these things such easie passage before his maiestie, as that we may acknowledge your kindnesse and fauour, and haue occasion therefore to shew our selues vnto you thankfull. First we offer our selues most readie to continue the peace, & to performe whatsoever is according to the conuentions of the renewed peace on our part to be performed: as also to send the honourable Present (which is not as yet by vs sent) when as our embassadour shall haue with you appointed any certaine time wherein it may be sent. And we also assuredly hope so to preuaile with your Emperour, that on your part the places within our territories, by surely hope so to preuaile with your Emperour, together with all such things as haue bene wrongfully taken away, may your people forcibly possessed, and the fort of PATRINIA raised. The Bassa of BOSNA also (who we think would haue bene kept within the compasse of dutie, if you had at that time held the place of the chiefe Visier) haue bene kept within the compasse of dutie, if you had at that time held the place of the chiefe Visier) and whosoever els, guiltie of the wicked breach of the league, to be worthily according to their deserts do punished and displaced, and your souldiours seuerely charged not to make any further incursions, nor to do any thing that may tend to the breach of the league: as we likewise shall with new and straight commandments most carefully restraine our garrison souldiours vpon our frontiers from all such excursions and enemies actions. But of these things our embassadour is more fully and at large to entreat with you: vnto whose speech we desire such credence to be giuen, as vnto our owne; and we will so provide, that you shall haue good prooffe of our great good will towards you. From PRAGE the eight of March 1593.

Vnto which the emperours letters Sinan returned answer as followeth.

Sinan

Hassan Bassa.*

fortresse of TRANSCHIN, which with continuall batterie and often assaults he at length tooke, sacked the towne, slew most part of the inhabitants, except eight hundred or thereabouts of the younger sort, whom he carried away with him into captiuitie. And being proude of this victorie, remoued thence by a bridge which he had made, passed ouer the riuer, and so the twelfth of Iune came and encamped before the monasterie of SISEG: and after vaine summons giuen to the same, the next day caused his great ordinance to be planted, and with great furie thundring against the wals, in short time ouerthrew the new tower, in the fall whereof two of the Christian canoniars perished. This furious batterie he maintained by the space of ten daies without intermission, giuing no time of rest vnto the besieged; so that it seemed not possible for the monasterie to be any long time defended, if it were not with speed relieved. The bishop of ZAGARIA, and Rupertus Eggenberg Generall of the emperours forces that then were at ZAGARIA, gaue knowledge thereof to Andrew lord Auersberg Gouverneur of CAROLSTAT, craving his aid and counsell: who calling together his owne forces, raised a good number both of horse and foot, and called also vnto him the bordering horsemen of KARNIA and CRANIA; who the seuenteenth day of Iune met all together not far from INSTAVVITZ, and there taried that night. The next day passing ouer the riuer Sauus neere vnto ZAGARIA, they joynted themselves with the emperours forces, and marched the nineteenth day in good order to SCHELINE, where they expected the coming of Countie Serinus. The twentieth day Peter Herdelius with his Hussars, and the lord Stephen Graswein came into the campe, with many of those light horsemen whom the Hungarians call Vscocchi. The one and twentieth day they lodged at GRADIVM, still expecting the coming of the Countie Serinus, who otherwise busied, could not come. The next day after, a souldior sent out from the besieged, came into the campe, who gaue the capitaines to vnderstand, that except they made hast that day to relieue the distressed monasterie, it would vndoubtedly be lost: for that the enemie had made it faultable, and would that night giue the assault; and the defendants, doubting how they should be able to maintaine the place, began before his departure thence to thinke of composition with the enemie. Vpon which newes the capitaines forthwith began to consult among themselves, what course to take in so doubtfull and dangerous a case: where Auersberg was of opinion, That it were best to march on, & to giue the enemie battell; with whom also agreed the lord Rederen: The rest of the captains being of a contrarie mind, for that the strength of the Christians compared to the Turkes, was too weake; and therefore they thought it better in time to retire whiles they yet might, than to hazard vnto most manifest perill the liues of so many valiant men, at so great ods. At which counsell Auersberg was at the first much moued, but afterwards (as he was a man of great eloquence) plainly set before them the necessitie of the cause, and with liuely reasons cheered vp the fearefull Croats; notably perswading them all in generall, to put their whole trust and confidence in God, to whom it was as easie to giue victorie by few as by many: and to fight like valiant men, for their religion, their countrey, their liues, their wiues, their children and friends, and whatsoever else they held deare; against that cowardly enemie, whose valour neuer brought him into the field, but onely the vaine trust he had in his multitude; and would therefore no doubt easily be put to flight, if he should contrarie to his expectation find himselfe but a little hardly laid vnto. With these and other like reasons hee preuailed so much, that they all yeelded vnto his opinion, and with one consent resolved to go against the enemie, and to doe what they might to relieue their besieged friends. So vpon a signe giuen, the whole armie (in number not about foure thousand) forthwith remoued, and with great speed hasted towards the enemie; and being come within a mile of the campe, put themselves in order of battell. The Turkes by their espials vnderstanding of the approach of the Christians, brought all their horsemen ouer the riuer of Kulp, by a bridge which they had made, and hauing put themselves in order, came on to joyne battell with the Christians: who had in their vaungard placed the Croats and Hussars; in the left wing them of CAROLSTAT, and the harquebusiers of KARNIA; in the right wing the borderers of CRANIA, all horsemen; in the maine battell the rest of the souldiors, with the horsemen of SILBIA, vnder the conduct of Sigismund Paradise; the rearward was enclosed with three companies of the emperours souldiors. The Croats and Hussars in the vaungard gaue the first charge vpon the enemie: but hauing for a good space made a great fight, they were about to haue retired, and discouraged with the multitude of the enemies, were euen vpon the point to haue fled: when Auersberg (Generall of the Christian armie) came on with his Squadron, and not onely restored the

Christians.*

A the battell, but so resolutely charged the maine battell of the Turkes, that the Bassa was constrained at the first to retire, and afterwards to flie, after whom all the rest of the armie followed. The Christians still keeping their array, pursued them with great speed, and comming to the new made bridge before them, tooke from them that passage, to the great discomfite of the Turkes, who seeing the miserable slaughter of themselves, and no way to escape, ran headlong some into the riuer Odera, some into Kulp, and were there for most part drowned; the rest were all slaine by the Christians, before determined not to take any prisoners. In the meane time, the Turkes that remained at the siege, vnderstanding of the ouerthrow of their fellowes, set fire on their powder and other prouision, and so in great feare betooke themselves to flight. Whose tents the Christians immediately after tooke, and in them nine great pieces of artillerie; and good store of great shot of 44 and 45 pound waight a piece, with the sumptuous paviilion of the Bassa, and much other rich spoile, which was all carried into the monasterie of SISEG. The number of the Turkes slaine in this battell, and drowned in the riuers, is of diuers diuersly reported, but most agree vpon eighteene thousand. And amongst them was Hassan Bassa himselfe, found in the riuer neere vnto the bridge, knowne by his most rich and sumptuous apparell; and neere vnto him Mahomet-Beg, and Achmet-Beg. In other places were also found the dead bodies of Saffer-Beg the Bassa's brother, of Memi-beg, Haramatan-Beg, Curti-Beg, Operd-Beg, and Gofchus, the Bassa's chiefe counsellour and master of his household. But of all others, the vntimely death of Sinan-Beg Amurath his nephew, his sisters onely sonne, sent thither to haue learned the feats of armes vnder Hassan the great Bassa, was of the Turkes most lamented. Of twentie thousand Turkes that came ouer the riuer Kulp, scarcely two thousand escaped. This so great a victorie obtained, all the armie of the Christians went thrise about the monasterie, and euerie time falling all downe vpon their knees, gaue vnto God most heartie thanks for the same, as by him miraculously giuen, and not by themselves wooed; and afterwards made all the shew of joy and gladnesse they could possibly deuise.

Sifeg relieved.

*Eighteene thousand
slaine.*

SISEG thus deliuered, and the Turkes armie ouerthrowne, the Christians with all speed laid siege to PETRINIA the strong new fort of the Turkes, which they for the space of five daies most furiously battered: but hearing that the great Gouverneur of GRACIA (whom the Turkes call the Beglerbeg of ROMANIA) was with a great power comming to the reliefe of the fort, they raised their siege, brake vp their armie, and returned euerie man to his wonted charge.

D Whilest these things were in doing at PETRINIA, a post came from CONSTANTINOPLE News of the ouerthrow of the Turkes at Sifeg, brought to Buda, to BUDA, who brought thither the first newes of the ouerthrow of SISEG; for the report thereof was not as yet come to BUDA. Wherefore the Bassa called vnto him the messenger, author of so bad newes, and diligently examined him of the truth thereof: who told him, That at his departure from CONSTANTINOPLE, nothing was there knowne of that losse, but that vpon the way as he came he met with diuers horsemen but lately escaped from the slaughter, who told him of a certaintie, that the Bassa was slaine and his armie destroied. Wherevnto the Bassa of BUDA replied, That he was happie in his death, for that if he had by chance escaped, he should for his indiscretion vndoubtedly haue suffered some other more shamefull death at the Court.

E When newes of the aforesaid victorie was brought to the emperour at PRAGA, he commanded publike prayers, with thanksgiuing to almighty God to be made in all churches: and sent a messenger with letters to Amurath, to know of him how he vnderstood these insolent proceedings of his souldiors, and especially this late expedition of the Bassa of BOSNA and his complices, contrarie to the league yet in force betwixt them. After which messenger he sent also the lord Popelins, with the yearely Present (or rather tribute) he vsed to send vnto the Turkish emperour at CONSTANTINOPLE; yet with this charge, that when he was come as farre as COMARA in the borders of HUNGARIE, he should there stay vntill the returne of the aforesaid messenger: who if he brought tidings of peace from Amurath, then to proceed on his journey to the Turkes Court; otherwise, to returne againe with his present: as he afterwards did. For Amurath enraged with the notable losse received at SISEG, and prickt forward with the teares and prayers of his sister (desirous of nothing more than to be reuenged for the death of her sonne) at the seauenth of August caused open war to be proclaimed against the Christian emperour, both at the CONSTANTINOPLE and BUDA. The manning whereof he committed to Sinan Bassa the old enemie of the Christians, his lieutenant generall, and perswader of this warre: who departing from CONSTANTINOPLE with an armie of fortie thousand, wherein were 5600 Janizaries, was by Amurath himselfe and the great men of the Court brought a mile on his way: having in charge from the great Sultan, by the assistance of the Beglerbeg of Greece, the Bassaes of Bvda and Temesvare, and other his Sanzackes and commanders in that part of his empire, to revenge the death of his nephew, and the dishonour received at Siso.

This warre Amurath with great pride denounced vnto the Christian Emperour and the rest of the princes his confederats in this sort.

Amurath the third, by the grace of the great God in heauen, the onely Monarch of the World, a great and mightie God on earth, an invincible Caesar, King of all Kings from the East vnto the West, Sultan of Babilon, Soueraigne of the most noble families of PERSIA and ARMENIA, triumphant victor of Hierusalem, Lord possessour of the Sepulchre of the crucified God, subuerter and sworn enemy of the Christians, and of all them that call vpon the name of Christ.

The proud and blasphemous denunciation of warre given out by Amurath against Rodolph the Christian Emperour.

We denounce vnto thee Rodolph the Emperour, and to all the Germane nation taking part with thee, vnto the great Bishop also, all the Cardinals and Bishops, to all your sonnes and subjects: we earnestly (I say) by our crowne and empire denounce vnto you open warre. And giue you to understand, that our purpose is, with the power of thirtene kingdomes, and certaine hundred thousands of men, horse and foot, with our Turkes and Turkish armes, yea with all our strength and power (such as neither thou nor any of thine hath euer yet seene or heard of, much lesse had any proofe of) to besiege you in your cheefe and metropolitall cities, and with fire and sword to persecute you and all yours, and whoeuer shall giue you helpe, to burne, destroy, and kill, and with most exquisite torments we can devise to torture vnto death and slay such Christian captiues as shall fall into our hands, or els to keepe them as dogs, captiues in perpetuall miserie; to empale vpon stakes your fairest sonnes and daughters: and to the further shame and reproch of you and yours; to kill like dogs your women great with child, and the children in their bellies: for now we are fully resolved to bring into our subietion you which rule but in a small cuntry, and by strong hand and force of armes to take from you your kingdome, as also to oppresse, root up and destroy the keyes and See of Rome, together with the golden scepter thereof: and we will prouue whether your crucified Iesus will helpe you and doe for you as yours perswade you. Beleue him still, and trust in him, and see how he hath holpen his messengers which haue put their confidence in him: for we neither beleue, neither can we endure to heare such incomprehensible things, that he can helpe, which is dead so many worldes of yeares agoe, which could not helpe himselfe, nor deliuer his owne cuntry and inheritance from our power, ouer which we haue so long time reigned. These things & yee poore and miserable of the world, we thought good to signifie vnto you, that you with your princes and confederats may know what you haue to doe and to looke for. Giuen in our most mightie and imperiall citie of Constantinople, which our auncestours by force of armes tooke from yours, and hauing slaine or taken prisoners all their citisens, reserved such of their wines and children as they pleased vnto their lust, to your perpetuall infamie and shame.

Sig taken by the Turkes.

Sinan with his armie thus setting forward, kept still on his way towards Bvda, but the Beglerbeg of Greece with a farre greater power marched towards Croacia, as well to relieue the forts distressed by the Christians, as againe to besiege the strong castle or monastrie of Siseg: which he with his huge armie at his first arriuall compassed about without resistance, and with continuall batterrie ouerthrew the wals thereof, giuing no time of rest vnto the defendants. Which breaches they for all that valiantly defended, and with restlesse labour notably repaired, the very fearefull women bringing tables, stooles, and whatsoeuer els came to hand, that might any wise helpe to keepe the enemy out, of whom a great number was in the breaches slaine. But what was that handfull against such a multitude? At length the third day of September the Turkes by maine force entered the Monastrie, and put to sword all the soldiours therein: amongst whom were two hundred Germanes, of whom the Turkes cut some in pieces, and the rest they threw into the riuer Kulp. One religious man there found among the rest, they did flea quicke in detestation of his profession, and afterward cutting him in small pieces, burnt them to ashes. So taking the spoyle of all that was there to bee had; and leauing a strong garrison for the keeping of the place, they passed ouer Sauus, burning the cuntry before them, and carried away with them about

A about a thousand poore Christians into perpetuall captiuitie. These inuasions of the Turkes caused the Emperour to craue aid both of the states of the empire, and other forraigne princes farther off, which was by some easily graunted, but not so speedily performed.

About this time Peter surnamed le Hussar (for that hee commaunded ouer those horsemen whom the Hungarians call Hussars) capitaine of Pappa, by the appointment of Ferdinand countie Hardeck gouernour of Rab, lay in wait for the Turkes Treasurer in Hungary, who had the commaund of five thousand Turkes: him this Hungarian tooke at aduantage, as he was mustering and paying certaine companies of his souldiours, mistrusting no such danger, and desperately charging him, slew him with diuers of his men, and put the rest to flight, and so with the spoyle and some few prisoners he returned againe to his castle, carrying with him the Treasurer.

B Now Sinan the Generall being come with his armie to Bvda, resolved with himselfe to begin his warres in that part of Hungary, with the siege of Vesprim. This episcopall citie was by Solyman the great Turke taken from the Christians in the yeare 1552, and againe by them recouered about foureteene yeares after, about the yeare 1566, since which time vntill now it had remained in the hands of the Christians. Sinan without delay marching with his armie to Vesprim, compassed the citie round, and encamping as he saw good, planted his batterrie wherewith he continually thundered against the citie. The Christians there in garrison easily perceiving that the citie was not long to be holden against so great a power, placed diuers barrels of gunpowder in certaine mines they had made vnder the wals and bulwarkes of the towne, with traines that should at a certaine time take fire. Which done, they departed secretly out of the citie in the dead time of the night, hoping so in the darke to haue escaped the hands of the enemies: which they did not so secretly, but that they were by the Turkes descied, and most of them slaine. Ferdinand Samaria Gouernor of the citie, after he had for a space valiantly defended himselfe, fell at last into the enemies hand, and so was taken aliue, together with one Hofkirke a Germane capitaine. The Turkes entered the citie the sixt of October, striuing who should get first in, for greediness of the prey, when suddenly the powder in the mines tooke fire, and blowing vp the very foundations of the wals and bulwarkes, slew a number of the Turkes that were within the danger thereof, and wonderfully defaced the citie.

From Vesprim the Bassa remoued with his armie to Palotta, and gaue summons to the castle: but receiuing such answer as pleased him not, hee layed siege vnto it with all his power. Which at the first Peter Ormand capitaine of the castle chearefully receiued: but being afterward without any great cause discouraged (the castle as yet being but little shaken, and but one man slaine, and the rest of the souldiours readie to spend their liues in defence thereof) he sent vnto the Bassa, offering to yeeld the castle vnto him, so that he with his souldiours might with bag and baggage in safetie depart. Of which his offer the Bassa accepted, and graunted his request. But he was no sooner come out of the castle with his souldiours, and readie to depart, but the faithlesse Turke contrarie to his oath and promise caused them all to be cruelly slaine, except only the capitaine and two other. After that the Bassa without any great labour tooke in all the cuntry thereabouts neere vnto the lake of Balaton.

Now at last, though long first, about the middle of October the Christians began to muster their armie, in number about eightene thousand, all good and expert souldiours: with which power they shortly after passing ouer Danubius, at the first encounter with the Turkes put them to the worke, slew a great number of them, and rescued a number of poore Christian captiues.

In the latter end of this moneth countie Hardeck Gouernour of Rab, and Generall of the Christian armie in that part of Hungary, departing from Komara with all his power, came in and layed siege to the strong citie of Alba Regalis, which by the force of his artillerie hee in short time made faultable; but in assaunting the breaches, was by the Turkes there in garrison notably repulsed. So hauing made sufficient proofe both of the strength and courage of the defendants, and perceiving no good could be done without a long siege, for which hee was not as then provided; after consultation had with the rest of the captains, he resolved to raise his siege: which he did the second of Nouember, remouing that day but halfe a mile from the citie, because he would be sure of all his armie. But as he was about the next day to remoue, news was brought him by his espials, that the enemies power was at hand, and euen now almost in sight, which he proued to be so indeed. For the Bassa of Bvda by the commaundement of Sinan Bassa the General, was come forth with thirtene Sanzackes and twentie thousand souldiours, thirtie field pinnerall, was come forth with thirtene ces, and five hundred wagons laded with victuall and other warlike prouision, to raise the siege, and to relieue the citie; and was now euen at hand, comming directly vpon the Christians: whereupon the countie, assisted by the countie Serinus, the lord Palsi, the lord Nadasti, Peter le Huffer, and other valiant captaines of great experience, with wonderfull celeritie put his armie in order of battell, and so courageously set forward to encounter the enemy. The Bassa seeing the Christians marching towards him, tooke the aduantage of the higher ground, and from thence discharged his field pieces vpon them; which mounted too high, by good hap did them little or no hurt at all. The Christians for all that desirous of battell, and nothing regarding the disadvantage of the ground, but calling vpon the name of the Almighty, mounted the hill, and joyning battell with the Turkes, by plaine force constrained them to flie. In this armie of the Turkes, being for most part horsemen, were about five thousand foot, and many of them Ianizaries, who in flying, oftentimes made stands, and wounded many, and yet neuerthelesse were almost all there slaine, with many others: amongst whom were three great men, the Sanzacks of STRIGONIVM, SECHINE, and NOVIORAD; seven Chiaus, and many other men of marke, the most valiant captaines of the Turkes borderers. The lord Nadasti with some others taking view of the Turkes that were slaine and lost in this battell, deemed them to haue bene at the least in number eight thousand: few prisoners were saued, all being put to the sword, which caused Sinan to sweare by his Mahomet neuer more to spare any Christian. All the Turkes artillerie, wagons, and prouision became a prey vnto the Christians: many ensignes were there found, and weapons of great value. It is hard to be beleued, how much this victorie encouraged the Christians, & daunted the Turkes. Whereupon the countie with great joy brought backe his armie to ALBA REGALIS, and encamped neere the bulwarke called STOPASCH, where the Turkes most feared to be assaulted. Palsi, Nadasti, and some others, earnestly perswaded with the countie, not to depart from the citie before he had woon it: But he considering the hard time of the yeare, the strength of the citie (which was now full of souldiours, by reason of them that were fled in thither from the late ouerthrow) with the want of things necessarie in his armie to maintaine a longer siege; and fearing also after long lying to be enforced with dishonour to forsake it, would not hearken to their perswasions, but calling a counsell, resolved to raise his siege, and to content himselfe with the victorie he had already gotten, which was afterward imputed vnto him for more than an ouerfight. So setting fire vpon the suburbs of the citie, he rose with his armie, and departed thence the first of Nouember, and returned to RAE.

Sabatza taken by the lord Teuffenbach.

Not long after, Christopher lord Teuffenbach, the Emperours lieutenant in the vpper part of HUNGARIE, who lay encamped at CASSOVIA with his armie of foureteene thousand souldiours, remooued thence, and marching along the countrey two dayes, came and layed siege to SABATZKA, one of the Turkes strongest castles in those quarters, out of which they vsually did much harme among the Christians. This castle Teuffenbach battered in three places; and hauing at length made it faultable, tooke it by force the nineteenth of Nouember, and put to the sword all the Turkes there in garrison, in number about two hundred and fiftie, and instead of them left a strong garrison of his owne: whereby all the countrey thereabouts was restored to great quietnesse.

Filek besieged by the Christians.

SABATZKA thus taken, the Christian Generall remoued with all speed to FILEK, a strong citie of the higher HUNGARIE, which Solyman the Turkish emperour tooke from the Christians in the yeare 1560, and placed therein a Sanzacke, vnder the commaund of the Bassa of BUDA. The Generall encamping before this citie, the next day after planted his batterie, and in most terrible manner without intermission thundered against the wals and gates of the citie. The Sanzacke Governour thereof, considering the power of the Christians, got out secretly by night with a few souldiours, to acquaint the other Turkish Sanzackes his neighbours with the comming of the Christians, and the number of their armie; and further to consult with them how the citie might bee relieved. The Bassa of TMBESVARE, with the Sanzackes of GIVLA, HADVVAN, SCANTZAG, and SIRME, vnderooke the matter: and therupon the Bassa sent for eight hundred Ianizaries, of late left by Sinan Bassa in garrison at BUDA and ALBA REGALIS; who all flatly refused to goe to this seruice, saying, That they would not be led as beasts to the slaughter, as were their fellows but a little before at ALBA REGALIS: neuerthelesse they enforced the Armenians, whom Sinan and his sonne had brought thither, to goe; but of BUDA, ALBA REGALIS, and SCAMBOTH, were sent onely fifteene hundred common souldiours. For all that, the Bassa

- A Bassa with the Sanzackes his followers, firme in their former resolution for the reliefe of the distressed citie, hauing made great preparation, and raised an armie of eightene thousand strong; with many field pieces, by night drew neere vnto FILEK, and staid within two miles of the citie. But the Generall of the Christians, with Stephen Bathor and the other captaines, vnderstanding of their comming, with seauen thousand good souldiours chosen out of the whole armie, went out presently against them; and the one and twentieth of Nouember suddenly assailing them in their tents, ouerthrew them and put them all to flight; whom the Christians fiercely pursued with a most terrible execution. In this fight and flight there was slaine six thousand Turkes, and but few or none taken. The Bassa himselfe, with the Sanzacke of FILEK and many others of great name, were found amongst the bodies of the slaine Turkes. This victorie gained B with little or no losse, yeelded vnto the Christians a rich prey, many gorgeous tents, and faire ensignes, much cattell, and nine and twentie field pieces, with two hundred wagons laded with victuall and other prouision; all which they carried into the campe at FILEK; and so more straightly besieged the citie than before. The same day the lord Palsi and Martin Lassa came to the campe with six thousand souldiours: and forthwith three trumpeters were sent to tell them of the citie, That if without farther resistance they would forthwith yeeld the citie, they should haue leaue in safetie to depart with life and goods, although the Turkes had of late in like case broken their faith with the Christians at PALOTTA: but if they refused his grace, and would needs hold it out to the vttermost, then to denounce vnto them all extremities. For all this, the Turkes nothing dismayed, refused to yeeld: whereupon the batterie began afresh, and in more terrible manner C than before: so that though the citie was most strongly fortified both with wals and rampiers, yet had the Christians in three daies space, with continuall batterie made a faire breach into it, whereby they in despite of the enemy entred without any notable losse the fouthe and twentieth of Nouember, ransacked the citie, and burnt a great part thereof. The same day they also tooke the vttermost castle, wherein the Sanzackes pallace stood: this castle standeth vpon a verie high hill, strengthened both by art and nature, and had in it a strong garrison of valiant souldiours, who spared not lustily to bestow their shot amongst their enemies, of whom they slew a great number. Neuerthelesse, the Christians after they had for the space of two daies and two nights with a most furious batterie shaken the wals, by plaine force entred the castle the six and twentieth of Nouember, and put to sword all the garrison souldiours; except such as had in good time forsaken this castle, and retired themselves into another more inward. Who being in number eight hundred, with their wiues and children, without hope of reliefe, and seeing the cannon now bent vpon them, set out a white ensigne in token of parley: which granted, it was agreed that they should depart with life, and so much of their goods as euerie one of them could carrie. Vpon which agreement, the castle was yeelded the eight and twentieth day of Nouember, and the Turkes D with a safe conuoy brought vnto the place they desired. In this castle was found a great bootie, many pieces of artillerie, with much other warlike prouision, but of victualls small store. The Generall with the rest of the captaines entering the castle, fell downe vpon their knees, and with their hearts and hands cast vp towards heauen, thanked God for their victorie, and for the recoverie of that strong citie; but especially for the deliuerie of so many Christians out of the E Turkish rhdome: For it is reported, that there are about eight hundred countrey villages subject to the iurisdiction of FILEK, the poore inhabitants whereof were now all freed from the Turkish seruitude, by the taking of this only citie. The Christians forthwith repaired the wals, bulwarks, and trenches, and strongly fortified euerie place against the enemy: and so leauing a sufficient garrison in the citie and castles, departed with their armie, now in number about twentie thousand, towards SODOCH, six miles from FILEK. But as they were vpon the way, newes F was brought vnto the Generall, how that the Turkes had for feare abandoned the castles of DRI, VIN and SOMOSKE: whereupon he sent out certaine companies of souldiours to take in both those places; who comming thither, found them in deed forsaken of the enemy, but yet many pieces of artillerie and other warlike prouision there still left.
- In the latter end of Nouember the Generall marched with his armie towards SATSCHEIN, a strong towne in the diocesse of AGRIA, but the Turkes in that place had two or three daies before prepared themselves to flie, and sent their wiues, their children, and the best of their substance, some to HATVVAN, some to BUDA: and now hearing of the approach of the Christian armie, set fire on the towne and fled. The Christians immediately entering, did what they could pitching their tents, and encamping themselves: yet before night they had planted certaine great G pieces vpon a high hill, from whence they might see into the castle; whereof the master of the ordinance caused three of the greatest (about the going downe of the Sunne) to be discharged against the castle, to giue the Turke to vnderstand that they wanted nothing for the siege. The same night also the Christians cast vp a great mount in the valley, from whence they presently sent six great shot into the castle: but early in the morning the Sunne being yet scarce vp, and all things now in readinesse, they began to batter the castle, and that day out of ten great pieces discharged three hundred great shot against the castle; but to small purpose, for the castle was built vpon a most strong rocke, fortified with high and thicke wals, and a deepe ditch hewen out of the maine rocke, which compassed the castle round; and for the more strength thereof was so fortified with pallisadoes made of strong timber, as that there was no acceffe vnto the wals: yet by the H commaundement of the General, certaine companies of the Christians prepared themselves to assault the breach, such as it was; who besides their weapons, carrying with them drie faggots, and setting them on fire, burnt the pallisado in diuers places, and so opened the way vnto the wals; and encouraged with the successe, approached uicer, and slew diuers of the Turkes vpon their rampiers: who discouraged with their owne weakenesse and the forwardnesse of the enemy, faintly defended themselves, and yet slew diuers of them, beating them downe from the wals with stones, timber, fire-workes, and such like. This assault giuen in the night, was continued vntill foure a clocke in the morning, and so giuen ouer. Shortly after came the Archduke with a thousand horse into the campe, and caused the batterie to be againe renewed: whereby it chanced, that the chiefe canonier in the castle being a renegade Germane, was taken with a great shot, and slaine; whose death so dismayed the rest of the defendants, that they presently set forth three white ensignes in signe of parle: which for all that the Christians seemed not to regard, but still continued their batterie. The Turkes then pitifully crying out, named two capitaines, whom they desired to haue sent vnto them, with whom they might fall to some reasonable composition. So for a while the batterie ceased, and those capitaines being sent into the towne, brought nine of the best of the Turkes in the citie with them vnto the Archduke: who by their interpreter declared, That they well considering the force of the Christians, and seeing no reliefe to come from the Bassa of BUDA, as he had promised, thought themselves to haue already discharged the parts of good souldiours, and seeing no other remedie, were contented to yeeld the castle, yet so, as that with bag and baggage they might in safetie depart. Whereunto the lord Passi taking vpon him the person of the Archduke (for that he himselfe would not be knowne) answered, That for as much as they had not yeelded at the first summons, but holden it out to the losse of many of his mens liues, and his great charge, they were vnworthie any fauour, yet of his owne clemencie he would receiue them, if they would absolutely without any further condition yeeld themselves to his mercie. This answer being reported to the Sanzacke, gouernour of the towne, pleased him not, and therefore said he would still stand vpon his defence. Whereupon the Christians were about to haue begun a fresh assault. But after a new parley it was at last agreed, That the Turkes yeelding the towne vnto the Archduke, should in safetie depart with their apparrell and scimitars onely. With which agreement two of the Turkes were sent backe into the castle, and the rest detained. Foure houres the Turkes in the castle delayed the time, as men doubtfull what to doe: but being earnestly called vpon by the lord Passi for a resolute answer, and seeing the Christians ready againe to assault them, they for feare yeelded: and so foure hundred and fiftie of them came forth, amongst whom was the Sanzacke gouernour of the towne, with his wife and daughter, the Sanzacke of SLENDRE, sent thither to haue aided him, and one Chiaus lately come from the Court. These great men brauely mounted, were commaunded to alight from their gallant horses, and had in their steads other bad jades giuen them to ride vpon: and as they passed by, as well the women as the men were searched, that they carried with them nothing more than their clothes: if any thing els were found, it fell vnto the souldiours share for good bootie. This strong towne of NOVI GRAD, had continued in the possession of the Turkes about threescore yeares, and serued as it were for a bulwarke to PESTH and BUDA, which now recovered out of their hands, opened a way vnto their further harmes. The keeping of this towne was by the Archduke committed to the lord Rebei, a noble man of HUNGARIE, and kinsman to Passi, with a strong garrison and certaine troupes of Hussars.

The Sanzacke of NOVI GRAD, after he had lost the towne, comming to BUDA, was presently apprehen-

Nowigrad yeelded vnto the archduke.

A apprehended by the Bassa, and layed in prison: who although he excused himselfe, by alledging that the towne was not possibly to bee holden with so small a garrison against so great a power; and that if any fault were, it was to be imputed to them of BUDA, for not sending reliefe in time; and therefore appealed vnto the further hearing of Amurath himselfe: yet all serued him not, but was by the Bassas commandement in the night hanged vpon a tree nere vnto the gate of the citie; and afterwards cut in pieces.

Whilest these things were in doing, the Emperour sent his embassadours to the great duke of MVS COVIA, the king of POLONIA, and the prince of TRANSYLVANIA, to proue how they stood affected towards those his warres against the Turke, and what aid he might procure from them. Into MVS COVIA was sent one Warkusich a gentleman of SILESIA, who comming to B MVS CO, found in that Court the embassadours of the Tartar, the Turke, the Persian, the Polonian, and the Dane. Of all these, the embassadours of the Tartar and the Turke could haue no audience, but were with contumelious words rejected, as miscreants. The emperours embassadour was honourably entertained, and after the manner of that countrey, a large proportion of wine, meade, aquauita, flesh, fish, and foule of sundrie sorts allowed him daily all the time of his abode. At length hauing audience, he declared vnto the great duke the cause of his comming, and in the name of his master requested his aid against the Turke. Whereunto the duke answered, That he would giue the emperour towards the maintenance of his warres against the common enemy, five hundred thousand ducats, and allow him yearely foure hundred thousand, during the time of that warre; requesting him not to make any peace with the Turke, and promising to send him aid also of men in this warre, if he should so need. The Persian embassadour also notably feasted the emperours embassadour, and had with him great conference concerning the warres of the Christians with the Turkes; and in his masters name promised the continuation of his wars against the Turke, so that the emperour would likewise promise not to haue any league with him, so to giue him leisure to turne all his forces againe into PERSIA. This embassadour after he had almost foure moneths tarried in MVS COVIA, returned to the emperour. At which time doctor Wacker, the emperours embassadour into POLONIA, returned also with joyfull newes, how that the Polonians with an armie of eight and twentie thousand had stopped the passage of an hundred thousand Tartars, whom the Turke had sent for against the emperour; and that if he needed, he should be aided with the Polonian Cossackes: But vnto the rest of his requests he could haue no answer of the states of that kingdome, for that the king was then absent in SVEDEN, and was therefore referred to be further answered at his returne.

At the same time countie Serinus with three hundred harquebusiers and certaine troupes of Cerraine castles of the Turkes vpon the borders of Sirlia taken by the countie Serinus. horsemen, and the footmen of SIRTIA and the countries thereabout assembled, to the number of ten thousand, departed from CANISIA, to besiege BRESENZA, a castle of the Turkes: but they vnderstanding before of his comming, conveyed away the best of their substance, and setting the castle on fire, departed the three and twentieth of March. The earle comming thither, tooke the forsaken castle, and put thereinto a garrison of his owne souldiours. In like manner he tooke also SIGESTA, forsaken by the Turkes, where he also placed a garrison of the Christians. And so going on to BABOTSCHA, besieged it: which castle although it was strongly situated in a marish, and could not easily haue beene woon, was for all that for feare abandoned by the E Turkes, and so taken by the countie: by recouerie of which places there was a safe and easie way layed open euen to ZIGERT, the Bassa whereof stood in no small doubt to haue beene euen then besieged.

Amurath intending by all meanes he could to vex the Emperour, had determined to send his fleet into the Adriaticke, to besiege ZEGNA, a citie of the Emperours, situate vpon the sea coast in the bay QVERNERO, called in auncient time FLANATICVS SINVS. Which the better to effect, he sent one of his Chiaus embassadour to the Venetians, to request them, That his fleet might by their leaue passe alongst the Adriaticke, and haue the vse of their ports and harbours, as need should require. Which his request the Venetians hearing, refused in any case to yeeld thereunto: fearing (and not without cause) the vnfaithfulnesse and trecherie of the Turkes, whose oathes and promises are no longer strong, or by them regarded, than standeth with their owne good and profit: neuertheless, they most honourably vsed the embassadour, and so sent him away, without obtaining of that he was especially sent for.

Havnan besieged by the Christians

uing gathered an armie of twentie thousand souldiours, the sixteenth of Aprill laid siegeto HATVVAN, a strong towne, six miles from BVD, fortified with a triple ditch, and bulwarkes of exceeding strength. Against which although the Christians could not doe much either by mines or mounts, by reason it was so enuironed with water: yet they so shut vp all the passages therunto, that nothing could be brought or caried in or out of the towne. They of the towne seeing themselves thus blockt vp, by secret messengers certified the Bassa of BVD, in what case they stood, praying him of aid: who with ten thousand chosen souldiours, which he had then in readinesse, and the Sanzackes of SERNAH, GIVLA, LIPPA, LERVVOG, and TSCHANGRAD, with five thousand moe, forthwith set forward toward HATVVAN to raise the siege: and the last of Aprill being come within sight of the Christian armie, about one of the clocke in the afternoon, encamped on the side of the river Sagijwa: but when he could not or els durst not for the deepnesse of the way, the abundance of the water, and needenesse of the enemye, adventure to passe the river, he retired backe againe, to passe ouer at Iasperin, (otherwise called Iasbrin) where the river was joynted with a bridge, and not farre off a good fount also to passe ouer at: thinking so, to haue come vpon the backs of the Christians, and with more safetie to haue relieued the besieged towne. But Teuffenbach perceiuing his purpose, forthwith after his departure passed the river with much difficultie, and ouertaking him with his armie the next day, being the first of May, about one of the clocke in the afternoon, between ZARHA and FVCSALVA, with his great ordinance disordered the rereward of the enemies battell; and coming on courageously with his whole armie, began a most cruell fight: which the Turkes a great while endured with wonderfull resolution: but now destitute of their wonted multitude (their greatest confidence) and hardly layed vnto by the Christians, they in the end turned their backs and fled; whom six thousand Hungarians and Germanes fiercely pursued, and had the killing of them almost to BVD. In this battell the Christians tooke all the enemies great ordinance, with seuentene ensigs, and also the cattle of Iasperin, which the Turkes had for feare abandoned; wherein was found good store of vituals, certaine great pieces, with much other warlike prouision. Of this notable victorie Teuffenbach by letters presently aduertised the Archduke, after he was againe returned to the siege of HATVVAN. Which letters because they containe many particularities and circumstances of this battell, I haue thought it not amisse here to insert.

letters of the lord Teuffenbach to Matthias the Archduke, Generall of the emperours armie against the Turke

Although (sayth he) I haue by a speedie messenger vpon the very kalends of May certified your excellence of the notable victorie, which God of his great goodnesse gaue vnto vs the same day ouer our hereditarie enemye: yet afterward vpon diligent inquisition we vnderstood many particularities, as well of the captiues themselves, as of the inhabitants about ZOINOCK, PESTH, and BVD, whereof I thought good to aduertise you. The captiues themselves confesse, That the Bassa of BVD, with the Sanzackes of ZOINOC, ZARVACE, GIVLA, and TSCHANGRAD, CIPPAIO, GENNE, and others, had with great celeritie raised an armie of thirteene thousand souldiours, amongst whom were many Tartars, with purpose to haue relieued the besieged towne of HATVVAN, and vpon the sudden to haue oppressed vs in our tents: Filled with which hope, they in great hast came with all their power the last of Aprill towards HATVVAN: but for as much as they could not passe ouer the river Zaggiwa, by reason of the height of the water, they were the next day, being the first of May, conducted by the captaine of Iasperin to a more commodious passage, so to come the neerer vnto vs, and the next day in the morning to haue surprised vs in our tents. But our most mercifull God hath auerted this so great a mischiese from vs, and turned it vpon their owne heads. For as it is most constantly reported from ZOINOC, PESTH, and BVD, and confirmed by the inhabitants of the same places, there are two thousand five hundred of the Turkes slaine, and as many wounded, of whom many perished, and are found dead vpon the high wayes leading to PESTH and ZOINOC: of these wee haue sent a thousand heads to CASSOVIA, and caused many of the Turkes to be buried for feare of infection in this so great heat. Verely it was a bloudie battell, so that the old souldiours say, they haue not remembered or seene the Turkes (no moe in number) to haue stood so long in battell, and to haue so fought it out without flying. Many men of great name & place there perished and fell, amongst whom are reckoned the Sanzackes of PESTH, NOVIORAD, & TEMESKE: GENNE, ALAVUS, BOGSTE, ALVSTAF, MARIELAVS, and certain Chiaus lately sent from the Court, with the Bassa his guard, wherein were eight hundred right valiant soldiours, of whom few escaped with life. Many fell that would haue yeilded great ranfome; but it was agreed vpon betwene the Germanes and the Hungarians, not

A to spare any of the enemies, but to put them all to sword; and that whosoever did otherwise, it should be imputed vnto him for dishonour. So that more than sixteene common souldiours, none were taken prisoners; of whom we might learne how things went amongst the Turkes, with other circumstances of the battell. We tooke thirteene field pieces, whereof foure were greater than the rest; which they called organes; and foure and twentie of the enemies ensiges. The Bassa of BVD (beside other three wounds by him received) was grievously wounded in the side. Of our men were lost about an hundred, and many of them most expert souldiours: and about six hundred others grievously wounded, of whom there is small hope, many of them being already dead. Neither is the losse small we haue receiued in our horses and armour, for there be few amongst the Germanes horsemen, which haue not lost one, two, or three of their horses or seruants, whereby our horsemen are wonderfully weakened. Yet B was the victorie great, to God be the praise, to him be the glorie and thanks therefor. Let vs in the meane time prosecute the siege begun. The last night I commaunded the water to be drawne another way, so that now our trenches may be aduanced many paces; and bulwarks raised within two hundred paces of the wall. We haue already planted five great pieces of artillerie in one bulwarke, and hope the next night to place fise moe vpon a mount fast by; and will doe what shall bee needfull for a strong siege: and when time shall serue, undertake the towne with all our power; God graunt vs therein good successe and victorie.

The Turkes in garrison at ZAROLA, a fort thereby, discouraged with the overthrow of their friends, forooke the fort; which for strength and greatnesse was comparable with TOCLA or C ERLA. Which strong place the Christians without any losse now recovered.

Whilest this valiant captaine the lord Teuffenbach thus lay at the siege of HATVVAN, Matthias Strigonium be-Sieged by the Christians.
thias the archduke Generall of the Christian armie in HVNGARIE, encouraged with the good successe he had at NOVIORAD, came with his armie (being 44000 strong) before STRIGONIVM (sometime the Metropolitall cite of HVNGARIE, but now of long a sure receptacle of the Turkes) and the sixt of May encamped his armie about a quarter of a mile from the castle in a most pleasant meadow, from whence both the cite and the castle were plainly to be seene. Vpon whom the Turkes out of the castle, and three gallies that lay vpon the river, discharged certaine great pieces without any great harme doing: but after that the Christian fleet was a litle before night come downe the river, and with their great ordinance began to answer D them againe, the crierie ceased shooting, and lay still that night. In the meane time it fortuned; that a Turkish youth taken in a garden thereby, and brought into the campe and examined; confessed that there was no garrison in the cite, more than foure hundred Ianizaries, and that a new supply was daily expected from BVD. The Christians labouring that night, were by the breacking of the day, come with their trenches to a hill ouer against the castle, where they placed their batterie; and forthwith began to batter the cite. The same day (being the seauenth of May) two and twentie Turkes heads were presented to the archduke, and foure men taken alite, newly sent out of the cite to haue viewed the Christian campe. About night certaine bales of wild fire were shot into the cite, whereof one fell vpon the tower called S. Adelbert, and set it on fire; wherewith first the church, and afterward a great part of the towne fell on fire. The Sanzackes E house, with all his horses and armour, and a great quantitie of powder was then burnt, and inestimable hurt done in the cite. The next day, the Christians had with continuall batterie made a breach in the castle wall: but adjoyning vnto the wall was an high and broad sandie rampier, which could hardly be battered; for all that the Germanes gaue a fierce assault vnto the breach, hoping to haue entred by the ruines of the wall, but being not able to get ouer the sandie rampier; were enforced with losse to retire. The day following they began againe the batterie with eightene great pieces; when about eight a clocke in the morning, the Rascians that were in the old cite gaue the Generall to vnderstand, That if he would at a place by them appointed, assault the greater cite to draw the Turkes thither, they would in the meane time deliuer vnto the Christians certaine litle posternes, and receiue them into the old cite; vpon condition, that no violence should be done vnto them or theirs. Which being so agreed vpon, the Christians accordingly gaue the assault the eleuenth of May in the euening, and by the helpe of the Rascians F tooke the cite; who according to promise were all taken to mercie, and the Turkes slaine; except such as by their good hap recovered the new towne. The keeping of this cite was committed to the charge of two companies of Germane footmen, and six hundred Hungarians, with three hundred Rascians and other townesmen. Thus was the old citie of STRIGONIUM gained by the Christians; the suburbs whereof they presently burnt; neuertheless the new towne with the castle was still holden by the Turkes. Wherefore the Christians hauing cast vp certaine trenches and mounts, and placed their artillerie as they thought most conuenient, began againe to batter the castle, and after they had by the force of the cannon made it faultable, with great courage assailed the breach, which the Turkes valiantly defended: so that the Christians were glad to retire, leauing behind them about an hundred and thirtie of their fellows slain in the breach. The Turkes a little before the coming of the Christians, had fortified an hill, whereunto the castle was something subject, called of the Christians S. Nicholas his hill; this hill so fortified, the Christians with continuall batterie and assault gained the 17. of May, and put all the Turkes left aloue therein to the sword, and turning the ordinance, from thence also battered the castle. The two and twentieth of May, a little before the going downe of the Sunne, certaine ensignes of footmen were drawne out of the campe, to haue the next day assaulted the lower towne; who taking the benefit of the night, attempting to haue entered the towne in the dead time of the night, were notably encountered by the Turkes falling out of the towne vpon them. The Christians for all that hauing enforced them to retire, persecuted their former resolution, and with much adoe got ouer the vttermost wall: but finding there, contrarie to their expectation, such a deepe and broad countermure as was not possible to be passed, they stood as men dismayed; neither could they in the darknesse of the night, well see how to get backe againe ouer the towne ditch, but disorderly retiring, flucke fast many of them in the deepe mud, and there perished. In this assault there were about a thousand of the Christians wounded and slaine: and albeit that they twice or thrise renewed the assault, yet preuailed they nothing, but were still repulsed with losse. Many also of the Turkish garrison were likewise slaine; yea the Sanzacke himselfe hurt with a great shot, with many other wounded men sent downe the riuier to BYDA, brought thither true newes of the aforesaid assaults, and of the state of the besieged.

The Rascians rise up against the Turkes.

In the meane time newes was brought to the campe, That Sinan Bassa the old enimie of the Christians, and the Turkes great lieutenant, coming towards HUNGARIE with a great armie, and hauing by boats conuayed ouer part thereof, was set vpon by the Rascians (these are poore oppressed Christians dwelling on both sides of Danubius, who weary of the Turkish thraldome, and desirous of their auncient libertie, haue oftentimes taken vp armes against the Turkes, as they now did, encouraged by the good successe of the Christians on the other side of HUNGARIE) and that after diuers skirmishes, they had taken thirteene of the Turkes vessels, wherein beside victuals and certaine great pieces of artillerie, they found about 2400 waight of powder, 447 hundred of lead, 46454 bundles of match, 1200 great shot, whereof 1005 were of 66 pound waight, and of small shot for harquebusiers 48500, with much other warlike prouision: a great part whereof was brought into the campe at STRIGONIUM, and the rest referred to future vses. This losse so troubled the great Bassa, that he altered his purpose before intended for CASSOUIA.

The fourth of Iune, about five hundred Turkes sent vp the riuier from BYDA, conducted by two Sanzackes vnder two red and white ensignes, landed neere to GOKARA on the farther side of Danubius, ouer against STRIGONIUM: where after they had a while refreshed themselves, and left some few for the more assurance of the place, all the rest were conuayed ouer the riuier into STRIGONIUM, where they had been long looked for, the old garrison being now sore weakened by the former assaults. Foure daies after, the Turkes encouraged with this supply, sallied out vpon a sudden, and had entered one of the forts of the Christians; but were forthwith againe repulsed, hauing lost six and twentie of their men, and two of their ensignes: not farre off lay a troupe of hostemen, who if they had in time come in, not one of the Turkes had escaped. Long it were to tell, how often and in what manner the Christians assaulted this citie, but were by the Turkes so receiued, that in five assaults they lost five thousand of their men, amongst whom were diuers captaines, lieutenants, auncients, and others of good account: three and twentie canoniours were also slaine, and ten great pieces of artillerie so spoiled, as that they were no more seruiceable. The garrison of this citie consisted for most part of the Ianizaries (the Turkes best fouldiours) whose notable valour in holding out of this siege, was both of their owne people and their enemies much commended: whatsoeuer was beaten downe by day, that they againe repaired by night; and still relieved with victuall and things necessarie from BYDA, did what was possible

A possible to be done for defence of the citie. About the same time certaine Turkes chainging vpon a troupe of Germane horsemen, in fight slew about fiftie of them, and put the rest to flight: whereupon an alarm being raised in the campe, many ran out to the rescue of their fellowes, taking with them certaine small field pieces. Which the Turkes perceiuing, began to flie: whom the Christians eagerly pursuing, were suddenly assailed by other Turkes, falling out of a fort fast by, and enforced shamefully to retire, and to leaue their field pieces behind them. Which the Turkes ceizing vpon, cloyed them, brake their carriages, and made them altogether vseruiceable.

All this while the lord Teuffenbach lying at the siege of HATVAN, about this time requested aid of the Archduke, for that his power was with often conflicts, hunger, and other difficulties B alwayes attending long sieges, so much weakened, as that he had scarcely six thousand found men in his campe, to whom the Archduke forthwith sent twelue hundred footmen, being loth to spare any moe, for too much weakening of his owne armie.

Amurath disdainig to see the frontiers of his empire in so many places impugned by the Christians, and dayly to receiue from them so great harmes, fought by all meanes to bee reuenged: wherefore beside the great power of his owne, which he was now about to send with Sinan Bassa into HUNGARIE, he had also procured from the great Tartar a wonderfull number of those rough and sauage people, to be sent into HUNGARIE, there to ioyne with his armie. These wild people to the number of seuentie thousand, according to direction giuen, breaking into PODOLIA, WALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, gathered together an incredible number of oxen and C kine; to this end and purpose, that driuing them before them, they might both be assured of victuals, and the safer trauell through a part of POLONIA. But when they were come vnto the borders of that countrey, and there found the power of Samocheie the great Chancellour and the Polonian Cossacks in armes, they easily perceiued that they could not that way passe without great losse. Wherefore they placed the aforesaid herds of cattell, some before, some behind, and some on each side of the armie, and so enclosed round about with those cattell as with a trench, marched on. But when they were come neere vnto the Polonians, this rude deuice serued them to no other purpose than the ouerthrow of themselves: for the Polonians discharging their great ordinance, so terrified the cattell, that they turned vpon the Tartars, and ouerthrowing whomsoeuer came in their way, did exceeding much harme: whom the Polonians immediatly D following, and hardly charging the confused armie, armed onely with bow and arrowes, after some small fight put them at last to flight, and obtained of them a notable victorie, with an exceeding rich prey. Of the Polonians were lost about eightene hundred, but of the Tartars were slaine thirtie thousand. The rest retiring into PODOLIA, and passing the riuier Nester by the way of TRANSYLAVANIA, where they did exceeding much harme, came to THAMESVARA, and so afterwards further into HUNGARIE: vnto whom the Turkes sent seuen hundred horsemen, to conduct them to the armie.

But to returne againe to the siege of STRIGONIUM. The fourteenth day of Iune the Christians betweene eight and nine of the clocke in the morning with great furie assaulted the towne in three places: which assault they most notably maintained, vntill it was almost three a clocke in the afternoon. Neuertheless, the Turkes so valiantly defended themselves, that at last the Christians were glad to giue ouer the assault, and with losse to retire. The Archduke from an high place beholding the assault, had one of his footmen slaine fast by him with a small shot. Many of the Turkes were also slaine in this assault, and amongst them one of the three Sanzackes that defended the citie. The night following there arose a most horrible tempest, with such raging wind, and abundance of raine, that many thought they should neuer haue seene day: with the violence whereof the Archdukes tent was ouerthrowne, and diuers others blowne downe or rent in sunder, were in the aire carried from place to place. About the same time the lord Palfi within the sight of the castle cast vp a notable fort, with high mounts and strong trenches (euen in the selfesame place where Solyman lay about fiftie yeares before, when he besieged and woon STRIGONIUM) by which fort so built, the enimie was embarrat to conuey any thing vp the riuier. For F reliefe of the citie, to the great discomfiture of the besieged: for to haue hindered the which worke, the enimie oftentimes sallied out, but to no purpose. This fort being brought to perfecti- on, the Christians tooke also another fort in an island on the further side of the riuier, which the Turkes had but a few dayes before taken from the Christians, and cloyed the great pieces there- T t t t ij in of such souldiors as he thought meetest for the assault, was in the performing thereof so notably repulsed by the Turkes, that he was glad to retire. with the losse of his best and most resolute souldiors: which put him out of all hope of taking the towne by force. For beside the losse of these good men, he had scarce so many sound men left, as might suffice to furnish his garrisons for defence of those frontiers: by reason that the Hungarians were almost all shrunke home, and of the Germanes were left scarce two thousand. Besides that he had oftentimes craued new supplies of the archduke, but all in vaine: for which causes he was glad to abandon two strong forts he had built before HATVAN, and to leaue the towne now brought to great extremitie. Thus two notable cities, which were now as it were in the hands of the Christians, and by the recovery whereof the broken state of the afflicted Christians in HUNGARY had been much strengthened, were as it were againe restored vnto the barbarous and cruell enemies.

Whilest the Christians thus lay at the siege of STRIGONIVM and HATVAN, the Rascians (of whom we haue before spoken) struing still more and more to rid themselves from the Turkish thraldome, gathered themselves together to the number of fifteene thousand, betwene BVDA and BELGRADE, vnder a Generall of their owne chusing. For feare of whom, the Bassa of TEMESVAR with an armie of foureteene thousand, went to fortifie and victuall LIPPA, doubting least it should by them be surpris'd: but hauing done that he went for, in his returne he was met with by the same Rascians, and twise fought withall in one day, and both times put to the worke, with the losse of the greatest part of his armie. After which victorie the Rascians tooke BACSKA a strong towne, standing in a marsh foure miles from BELGRADE, and slew all the Turks they found therein. After that they tooke a castle called OTTADT, and dealt with the Turks in like manner. From thence they went and besieged BACHA, a castle standing vpon the riuier Tibiscus or Teise, where the towne adjoyning vnto it yeelded presently; but they in the castle standing a while vpon their guard, offered at last to yeeld also vpon certaine conditions. But the Rascians knowing that the Turkes thereabouts had conuaid into that castle the best part of their wealth, and withall that it was but weakly manned, would accept of no conditions, but needs haue it absolutely deliuered vnto their pleasure. In the meane time the old Bassa of TEMESVAR and his sonne, knowing it to tend to their dishonour to suffer this base people so to rage at their pleasure about them, gathered together 11000 Turkes, and so in great hast came to relieue the besieged castle. Vpon whom the Rascians turned themselves, and in plaine battell ouerthrew the Bassa, and so pursued the victorie, that of those 11000 Turkes scarcely escaped 1000: the Bassa himselfe being there slaine, and with him three Sanzacks, his sonne escaped by flight. In this battell the Rascians tooke 18 great picces of artillerie: and not long after tooke also WARSZTA and LUTZ, two strong places. After which so happie successe, they sent vnto the archduke Matthias for aid, but especially for canonicers, professing themselves now vnto enemies vnto the Turkes. The Rascians also about TEMESVAR sent word vnto the other in the campe, that they would come and joyne with them. And they which inhabite the country betwene the riuers Danubius and Tibiscus, by messengers sent of purpose vnto the lord Teuffenbach (the archdukes lieutenant in the vpper part of HUNGARY) offered in short time to send him ten or twelue thousand men, so that he would receiue them and their country into the emperours protection; which he easily granted them, and thereof assured them by writing. And to the archduke himselfe they sent also their trustie messengers, requesting him to send them a Generall to lead them, promising vnto him all obedience: which messengers departing from them the fourteenth of Iune, shortly after returned with such answer as was thought most conuenient for their present state. Thus against the coming of Sinan, was HUNGARY almost all on a broile.

The emperour long before distrusting the Turkes purpose for warre, and well considering what a difficultie it would be for him with his owne forces only to withstand so puissant an enemy as was Amurath; had by his embassadours praied aid of diuers Christian princes, but especially of them of the empire, as those whom this warre concerned most. Wherefore he after the ancient and wonted manner of his state in so common and imminent a danger, appointed a generall assembly of the Princes and States of the empire, to be holden at RATISBONE, in the latter end of Februarie: which for sundrie vrgent causes was put off vntill March, and againe vntill Aprill, and so afterward vntill May. At which time the emperour in person himselfe, with the Princes Electors, and other the great States of the empire, being met together with great pompe

The emperour graciously complaineth vnto the Princes Electors, and States of the empire, of the infidelity of the Turke, and craueth their aid.

A ponipe at RATISBONE, and solemnly assembled into the bishops pallace, began there to sit in counsell the 2 of Iune. Vnto the which Princes and States so assembled, after that the emperour had first by the mouth of Phillip Countie Palatine of RHENIA, giuen great thanks for their ready appurance, & briefly declared the cause of their assembly; he himselfe after some complaint made of the Turkish infidelity, in expresse words declared vnto them, how that he by his embassadour then lying at CONSTANTINOPLE, had in the yeare 1591 made a league for eight years, with the present Turkish Sultan Amurath: which league Amurath himselfe had approued and confirmed, and thereof sent him publike and solemne instruments: wherein it was prouided, That no hostilitie should be on either side during that time attempted. And yet notwithstanding that he, contrarie to his faith giuen, as an hereditarie enemy of the Christians, had violated this league, and by sundrie incursions barbarously spoiled and wasted, not HUNGARY onely, but other of his imperiall prouinces also: But especially by Hassan Bassa of BOSNA, who first with a strong armie besieged, battered, and tooke RABITZ, an ancient frontier castle, and after that WHITZ, DRESNIK, CRASSOVITZ, with other places of name: And had in his dominion and territorie built PETRINIA a most strong fort, hurtfull to all that countrey, out of which he had done incredible mischiefe in CROATIA, WINDISMARCH, and the most fruitful island TYROPOLE; and had out of those places carried away aboue fife and thirtie thousand Christians into most miserable captiuitie. Of which shamefull injuries and breach of faith, he had many times by his embassadours complained vnto the Turkish Sultan at CONSTANTINOPLE, and requested, that all hostilitie set apart, due restitution might haue been made, but to haue therein preuailed nothing: and that the same Bassa in stead of condigne punishment, had been for the doing thereof honoured by the Great Sultan his lord with honourable gifts, the sure tokens of his fauour: Whereby he was so confirmed in his barbarous proceedings, that he began to make open warre, and hauing raised a full armie, and strengthened also with certaine companies of Ianizaries sent from the Court, had passed ouer the riuier of Kulp, and besieged the castle of SISEG: but by the iust judgement of God the reuenger of wrongs, had there receiued the reward of his faithlesse and cruell dealing, being there slaine, and almost all his armie vtterly destroyed by his small forces, raised in hast for his owne lawfull defence. Neuerthelesse the faithlesse Turke (as if he had beene highly wronged himselfe) to haue made this his breach both of league and faith forthwith knowne to all the world, by commanding open warre to be solemnly proclaimed against the kingdom of HUNGARY, both in CONSTANTINOPLE and BVDA: and by the Beglerbeg of GRACIA, to haue againe besieged and taken the strong fortresse of SISEG. Whereas on the other side (because nothing should on his part be wanting, which might make his desire of peace more knowne) he had againe, and oftentimes by his embassadour put the Turke in remembrance of his league made, and confirmed by his faith: who for all that had changed nothing of his purpose, but sent his great Visier Sinan Bassa with the Beglerbeg of GRACIA, and many inferior Bassas and Sanzacks into HUNGARY, who with fire and sword enforced the inhabitants and countrey people (such as they left aliue) to sweare vnto the Turke obedience, and to become his subjects: and at the same time tooke VESPRINIVM and PALOTTA, two famous fortresses of that kingdom. And that the same Bassa by commandement from his lord and master, had contrarie to the law of nations imprisoned Frederik Kreckowitz his embassadour, first at CONSTANTINOPLE, and caused the greater part of his followers to be thrust into the gallies; and afterwards to haue sent him with a few of his seruants to BELGRADE, and there to haue kept him so long in prison, that he there miserably died. In reuenge of which so great and open wrong, and for the defence and comfort of his afflicted subjects so neere the enemy, he had raised a good strength both of horse and foot, by whose helpe and the assistance of almightie God, the Bassa of BOSNA had reaped the fruit of his perfidious dealing: as had also the Bassa of BVDA, with many thousands of their great souldiors; ouerthrowne neere vnto ALBA REGALIS; besides many of their castles and townes taken or rased. Yet for all that was it easie to be seene, these so great victories by the goodnesse of God had and obtained against so mightie and cruell an enemy, not to suffice; but that there was still need of a perseverant and continuall supply for the maintenance of a perpetuall warre: and that it was daily to be expected, rather euen now presently to be desired, That the Turke in his quarrell which he deemeth alwaies just against the Christians, and in reuenge of these ouerthrowes, would draw forth all his forces, and aduenture his whole strength. For which causes he had by the knowledge and consent sent of the Princes electors of the sacred empire, appointed that present Diet of the empire; and not for the aforesaid causes only, but for diuers others both necessarie and waighthe also: as the generall peace of the empire, the pacification of the Low countries, the reformation of justice, and amendment of the coine: but especially and aboue all other things, to make it knowne vnto the world, how much it concerned to haue the Turkes pride betime abated, and some effectuell defence for HUNGARIE (now in danger) at length provided; being the most sure defence and strongest bulwarke of that part of Christendome. And that whereas his owne hereditarie prouinces were not of themselves alone sufficient to maintaine so chargeable a warre, he therefore requested the Electors, Princes, and States both present and absent, not to grudge to be present with their helpe, their counsell, and whatsoever else should be needfull against so puissant and dangerous an enemy. So ending his speech, he caused all his demands before conceived into writing to be read, and so deliuered vnto them. For answering whereunto, the Princes electors and others there present required time; which granted, after many sittings & long consultations, they at last with one consent answered, That it was a hard matter by reason of the late death, and other like occasions, for them to grant such helpe and aid as the emperor had in writing required: yet hauing before their eyes the great and imminent danger wherein the Christian common weale then stood, they not regarding their owne proper and neere difficulties, had in regard of his sacred and imperiall maiestie, for the comfort and defence of the endangered Christians, and for the represing of the Turkish furie, of their owne free will and meere compassion, granted beside their accustomed contribution, such farther reliefe for the space of six yeares, as they thought sufficient for the maintenance of a defensiu warre, both for the present and the time to come. What was by them farther decreed concerning the emperours other demands, as not pertinent to our purpose, we willingly passe ouer.

an armie of 150 thousand be-
Alba Regalis.*

Of all these things, as also whatsoever else had happened at STRIGONIVM, HATVAN, or other places of HUNGARIE, was not Sinan Bassa ignorant: who now euen vpon the departure of the Christians from STRIGONIVM, was come with an huge armie betwene BUDA and ALBA REGALIS: vnto whom also fortie thousand Tartars, that by force had made themselves way through PODOLIA and the vpper part of HUNGARIE, had now joyned themselves: so that in his armie were reckoned aboue an hundred and fiftie thousand fighting men; to the great terrour, not onely of HUNGARIE, AVSTRIA, STIRIA, CROATIA, BOHEMIA, and the prouinces therabout, but also of the whole State of GERMANIE. With this great armie the old Bassa had purposed to haue ouerwhelmed the Christians in their campe at STRIGONIVM: but now that they were before his comming departed ouer the riuier towards KOMARA, he resolved to keepe on his way, and to besiege the strong citie IAVRINVM, now called RAB. And to make all sure before him, he thought it best to take in his way DOTIS, a strong towne of the Christians, in the mid way betwene STRIGONIVM and RAB, about fise Hungarian miles short of RAB. The Christian armie but newly passed ouer Danubius, in marching towards KOMARA, might see the mountaines and fields on the other side the riuier all couered with the multitude of the Turkes armie: who though they were in deed many, yet marching dispersedly, made show of more than in truth they were. So both armies marching in sight the one of the other, and seperated onely with the riuier, held on their way: the Christians to KOMARA, where they encamped vnder the verie wals of the citie, yet in such sort, as that they might a farre off well descie one another; and the Turkes towards DOTIS, where the Bassa with all his armie encamped the 21 day of Iuly. The night following, hauing planted his batterie, he began in furious manner to batter the castle, the chiefe strength of the towne; the Christian armie looking on, but not daring at so great ods to relieue their distressed friends. So whiles the Bassa granteth no breathing time vnto the besieged, but tireth them out with continuall batterie and alarums, they of the towne despairing of their owne strength, and to be able for any long time to hold out against so mightie an enemy, within three daies after yeilded the towne, being in that short time fore battered, and also in diuers places vndermined: yet with this condition, That it should be lawful for the garrison souldiours and townesmen, with their wiues and children in safetie to depart. Which was vnto them by the Bassa frankly granted, but not so faithfully performed: for at their departure many of their wiues and children were staid by the Turkes, and the lord Baxi Gouvernour of the towne foully entreated. Immediately after, the Bassa without much adoe tooke S. Martins castle also, not far from DOTIS, being by the captaine yeilded vnto him.

*Dotis and Sain
to the Turkes.*

In the meane time the countrey villages round about forsaken of the poore Christians, were by the Turkes most miserably burnt, and all the countrey laied wast. Yea some of the foretunn-ers of the Turkes armie passing ouer the riuier Rabiniz, ran into the countrey as farre as ALTENBURG, within fise miles of VIENNA, burning the countrey villages as they went, and killing the poore people, or that worse was, carrying them away into perpetuall captiuitie: yet not without some losse, foure hundred of these roaming forragers being cut off by the lord Nadaszi. Palfi also, and Brun Gouvernour of KOMARA following in the taile of the Turkes armie, set vpon them that had the charge of the victuals; of whom they slew a great number, tooke 120 of them prisoners, and 150 camels and 30 mules laded with meale and rice, which they carried away with them to KOMARA.

DOTIS and S. Martins thus taken, Sinan Bassa constant in his former determination, set forward againe towards RAB, and being come within a mile of the citie, there encamped; the Christian armie then lying not far off on the other side of the riuier. This citie of RAB is a strong Christian citie, honoured with a bishops See, and was worthily accounted the strongest bulwarke of VIENNA, from whence it is distant about twelue Germane miles, standing vpon the South side of Danubius, where the riuier diuiding it selfe, maketh a most fertile island called SCHVT; in the East point whereof standeth the strong citie of KOMARA. The defence of this citie of RAB was committed to Countie Hardeck, a man of greater courage than fidelitie, with a garrison of twelue hundred choise souldiours, vnto whom a little before the comming of the Bassa were certaine companies of Italians joyned, who together with the citicens made vp the number of fise thousand able men: a strength in all mens judgement sufficient for the long defence of that place. The last of Iuly (Matthias the archduke about the going downe of the Sunne departing out of the citie of RAB, ouer the riuier into the island ouer against it) came Sinan Bassa with his huge armie and beset it round, casting vp trenches and mounts, whereon he skillfully placed his gabions and great artilerie, and whatsoever else was necessarie for so great a siege: and that with such celeritie, as was to the beholders thought most strange. The second of August, he with great furie battered the citie, and brought his trenches within musket shot of the wals. At which time foure thousand Tartarian horsemen swam ouer the Danubius between RAB and KOMARA; after whom followed six thousand Turkes, who being with much adoe got ouer to the farther side, suddenly surprised a fort of the Christians next vnto the riuier; and forthwith turning fise great pieces of ordinance which they found therein, discharged them vpon the campe of the Christians: who terrified with the sudden accident, rise vp all in armes, and hardly charging those desperat aduēturers, slew many of them; especially such as seeking after bootie had dispersed themselves from their fellowes, and forced the rest againe to take the riuier, wherein most of them perished. About fise daies after, the Tartarians (liuing for most part vpon prey) swam againe ouer the riuier, and vpon the sudden burnt a village in the island, and slew certaine Christians in their tents, but being quickly encountered by the Christian horsemen, they were easily ouerthrowne, and many of them slain: the rest casting away their weapons and forsaking their horses, ran headlong into the riuier, trusting more to their swimming than to their fighting; whom the Christians hardly pursuing, in the verie riuier slew about two thousand of them: and by this victorie obtained many of the Tartarian swift horses, with their scimitars, their bowes and arrowes, and such ensignes as they had. All this while Sinan Bassa without intermission, lay thundering with threecore great pieces of batterie against the citie: but to little or small purpose, for as yet he had made no breach whereby to enter, but the harme that was done was vpon the towers or high built houses, or in the campe, by such rondon shot as flying ouer the towne fell by chance among the tents of the Christians. And the Ianizaries intentiue to all opportunities, in a great raine furiously and with a most horrible crie (as their manner is) assaulted the viter bulwarke of the Christians, which they for feare forooke, and retired themselves into the citie; vpon which bulwarke so taken, the Ianizaries had set vp three of their ensignes: When the Christians ashamed of that they had done, and better aduised, taking courage vnto them, forthwith sallied out againe, and couragiously charging the Ianizaries but now entred, slew many of them, and recouered againe the bulwarke.

Sinan Bassa leauing nothing vnattempted that might further his desire for the winning of the citie, was now casting vp a great mount against the citie: which whilest he dayly surueyed, he chanced to fall sicke, and therefore appointed one of the Bassas in his owne stead to ouersee the worke;

*The Turke and

worke; who whilst he was walking too and fro, hastening the worke, and commaunding this G and that thing to be done, he was taken with a shot out of the towne and slaine.

The fifteenth of August certaine Turkes before the rising of the Sunne getting ouer Danubius in boats, assailed a fort of the Christians: which the souldiours that had the keeping of it, presently forooke, and left it to the enemye. Which John de Medicis, lately come into the campe with two thousand Italians, perceiuing, forthwith came to the rescue of the fort, draue out the Turks, and hauing slaine diuers of them, forced the rest into the riuier, where they were all drowned. At which time five thousand Tartars in another place, passing ouer the riuier into the island, were encountered by the lord Palsi and the Hussars his followers, and without any great resistance put to flight, wherein many of them were slaine: the rest taking the riuier, were in good hope to haue got ouer, and so to haue saued themselves. But other Turks meeting them in the riuier, would with their weapons haue beaten them backe, and stayed their flight: against whom the Tartars opposing themselves, made with them in the very riuier a most cruell fight, but with such losse vnto the Tartars, that of the five thousand which aduentured ouer, few returned to carrie newes vnto their fellowes how they had sped. Now began great scarcitie of victuals in the Turks campe, so that the souldiours were faine to feed vpon vnripe fruit and such other vnwholesome things: whereof ensued the bloudie flux, with many other dangerous diseases: which raging amongst them, did wonderfully consume the Bassas armie. Beside that, they of the cite with continuall shot had slaine many, and among them a sonne in law of the great Bassas, whose death he is reported to haue taken to vnpatiently, that he fell sicke for griefe, but in short time after passed it ouer, and recouered againe.

The Tartars not yet warned by their often losses, but passing againe ouer the riuier into the island the nineteenth of this moneth, were there three thousand of them slaine. In the mean time certaine companies also of the Turks hauing secretly passed the riuier, in another quarter assailed the Christians in their campe: in which hurlyburly other of the Tartars got ouer the riuier not farre from KOMARA, hoping now at length to performe some great matter, which they had before so often to their cost vainly attempted. But finding the Turkes ouerthrowne before their coming, and the Christians (contrarie to their expectation) in armes readie to receive them, they were easily discomfited, and two thousand of them slaine. In this conflict the Sanzacke of STRIGONIVM, with two others, and many moe of great account among the Turkes perished. Shortly after the Christians fallying out of the cite, slew a great number of the Turkes, and so retired with small losse. Thus was the Turkes armie daily diminished, besides that the want of victuals with the bloudie flux so encreased, that many perswaded the Bassa to haue raised his siege, and to haue remooued with his armie to some other more wholesome place, and of greater plentie: but he resolutely set downe not to depart before he had either woon the towne, or enforced them therein to yeeld, would not hearken to any persuasions to the contrarie.

Whilest Sinan thus lay at the siege of RAB, Maximilian the emperours brother tooke Cra-Howitz, a fortreffe of the Turkes vpon the borders of CROATIA, and put to sword all the Turkes there in garrison. After that he layed siege to PETRINIA, a strong fortreffe of the Turkes, which they but a few yeares before had contrarie to the league built in the emperours territorie, for the annoying of CROATIA, and for the exceeding strength thereof was thought almost impregnable. Yet such was the indutrie of Maximilian and his souldiours, that what with continuall batterie and mines they so terrified the Turkes there in garrison, that they for feare set fire on the fort, and flying away by night, made shift euery man for himselfe, as he might. Which they in the castle of SISEG hearing, set fire also vpon it, and so left it to the Christians: whose example they also of GARA followed: by which so prosperous and happie successe of Maximilians, not the frontiers only, but euen the whole countrey of CROATIA was for that time deliuered of a wonderfull trouble and no lesse danger.

The eight and twentieth day of August twentie thousand of the Christians passing ouer the riuier by a bridge out of the island, and joyning with them of the towne, sallied out vpon the Turkes campe. The Hungarian Heidons in the foreward at the first onset tooke two of the Turkes M bulwarkes; and hauing beaten out the enemies, cloyed certaine of their great pieces: but the Turkes returning with greater power, enforced the Christians to retire, and recouered again their lost bulwarkes. In this conflict many were slaine, as well Christians as Turkes. In the meane while Thonhause a great captaine of the Christians, and Geitzhofer, countie Hardecke his lieutenant,

A nant, with fifteene hundred Hungarian and Germane footmen came in great boats to haue holpen their fellowes; but landing somewhat too late, they were by the enemye beaten backe, and enforced with such speed to retire, that many of them being not able to recouer the boats, were drowned in the riuier, amongst whom Geitzhofer himselfe perished, and Thonhause was deadly wounded in his breast. Yet the Christians not discouraged with this losse, but gathering themselves together vnder the very wals of the cite, gaue a second assault vnto the enemye. In the foreward were the footmen, who were by the enemies horsemen easily repulsed: but by the coming in of the lord Rinsberg (who was at the first onset slaine) the Turkes were enforced into their trenches, except some few, which deuided from the rest hid themselves in the vineyards, but being found out by the Christians, were there all slaine: In this skirmish the lord Palsi was grievously wounded in his thigh. Of the Christians were slaine foure hundred, and of the Turkes about two thousand. These conflicts endured from seven a clock in the morning vntill twelue, at which time the Christians returning into the cite, and so into the campe, amongst other spoiles carried away with them seuentene of the enemies ensignes.

No day now passing without some skirmish, at length the ninth of September ten thousand Turkes, some in boats, some by other meanes, hauing got ouer the riuier of Danubius into the island of SCHVR, suddenly set vpon the Christians, all sleeping in securitie, and little fearing any such danger: of whom they slew about two thousand, and after some small fight put the rest to most shamefull flight, in such sort, that Matthias the Archduke himselfe with the other noble men and captaines had much adoe by flight to escape. Thus whilst euery man surprised with C feare, made what shift he could for himselfe; the enemye in the meane time entered the trenches, tooke their tents, the great ordinance, the shot and powder, and all the money which but a little before was brought for the souldiours pay; besides about a thousand waggons, and two hundred boats well loaded with prouision for the campe; and ten gallies, wherein were an hundred and twentie pieces of great ordinance. The losse received this day was valued at five hundred thousand duckats. And albeit that this victorie cost the Turkes two thousand and five hundred of their liues, yet thereby they gained the masterie both vpon the riuier and the land, so that now roming farre and neere without resistance, they spoyle the countrey all about, and burnt certain countrey villages not farre from VIENNA: so that for many miles space the countrey townes were for feare of the enemye forsaken by the inhabitants; of whom some were taken and slaine, D some carried into captiuitie, and some others (referred to a better fortune) with such things as they had, got themselves farther off into places of more securitie. And the more to encrease these calamities, the Tartars shortly after passing ouer Danubius neere vnto ALTENBURG, first sacked WBISENBURG, and after burnt it, with certaine townes thereabout: but aduenturing to haue gone further into the countrey, they were with losse enforced to returne.

Whilest the Turkes thus preuaile in HUNGARIE, Cicula Bassa the Turkes Admirall then at sea with a fleet of gallies, landing his men in diuers places of ITALIE, did exceeding much harme but especially in CALABRIA, where he vpon the sudden surprised RHEGIVM, rased the towne, and afterwards burnt it. From thence taking his course towards SICILIA, he in the sight of MESSANA landed certaine of his men; who aduenturing too farre ashore, were by the countrey E people ouerthrowne and put to flight. So the Turkes returning againe to RHEGIVM, vnto the towne, sed what they had before left of that towne. In the meane time not farre from MESSANA, euen in the sight of the garrison of the towne, they tooke a certaine ship coming out of the East into the East, they changed some few shot with them, but to no great purpose. And so turning their course, and sailing alongst the coast of CALABRIA, they oftentimes landed certaine companies, and which skirmishing with the Calabrians, had sometime the better and sometime the worse, and so with such fortune as befell them, were againe receiued into the gallies. They of MESSANA, vnto whose eyes these dangers were dayly presented both by letters and speedie messengers, gaue the Viceroy knowledge thereof (who then for his pleasure lay at PALERMO) requesting his pre- F sent aid: but he dallying of the time, they for the more safegard of the cite and of the sea coast, of themselves raised five hundred horsemen, whom they committed to the leading of Philip Cicula, the renegade Turke: Admirals brother; and beside stored the cite with all such things as they thought necessarie for the enduring of a siege, if it should chance the Turke to haue any such purpose: of all which they certified the king of SPAIN, as also of the negligence of the Viceroy, Viceroy, requesting his speedie aid against these terrours of the Turks. In the meane while the Neapolitanes for safegard of their coast put to sea thirtie gallies vnto whom the Pope, the duke of FLORENCE, the Genowayes, and the knights of MALTA, joyned also theirs; in all to the number of about fourescore gallies, vnder the conduct of ANTONIO. The prouident Venetians also although they were as then in league with the Turke; yet for the more safetie of their itate, put to sea a fleet of about an hundred saile, some ships, some gallies, vnder the leading of PASARIN their Admirall. Which two fleets sayling vp and downe those seas, deliuered TRALLI, STERIE, DALMATIA, with many other prouinces and islands of the Christians of a great feare.

Rab assaulted by the Turke.

Turke thousand
Turke slain.

Siman Bassa hauing before encouraged his soldiours with great hope and large promises, commaunded an assault to be giuen to the citie of RAB, which was accordingly by them begun the three and twentieth day of September, the Sunne being as yet scarce vp, and furiously maintained all that day from morning vntill night. But they of the towne so valiantly defended themselves, that at last the Turkes were glad to giue over the assault and with losse to retire. Neuerthelesse the next day the assault was again renewed, and most desperately continued by the space of two daies; wherein about twelue thousand of the Turkes there lost their liues, the other with shame retiring themselves into their trenches. In few dayes after, the Turkes by a mine blew vp one of the bulwarkes of the towne, with the fall whereof the towne ditch was in that place somewhat filled: whereby the Turkes with all their power attempted thrice the next day to haue entered, but were by the valour of the defendants still notably with losse repulsed. Yet notwithstanding all this chearefulnesse and couragiousnesse of them in the towne, the puissant enemy ceased not with continuall batterie and furious assaults to attempt the citie; vntill that at length he had gained two of the bulwarkes, from whence he might to his great aduantage, by the rubbish and earth fallen out of the battered bulwarkes and rampiers, haue acceffe vnto the towne, to the great terrour of the defendants. Whereupon countie Hardeck the Gouvernor (who corrupted by the Turke, had of purpose many times before said that the towne could not possibly be long defended) now tooke occasion to enter into counsell with the other capitaines of the towne (diuers of whom he had already framed to his purpose) what course were best to take for the yeelding of it vp. And so after a little consultation, holden more for fashion sake, than for that he doubted what to doe; resolved to send a messenger vnto the Bassa, for a truce to be graunted for a while, to see if happily in the meane time some reasonable composition might be agreed vpon. Yet the Gouverneur considering vnto what scorne and danger he should expose himselfe, by yeelding vp of so strong a towne; to colour the matter, and to excuse his doings vnto the rest of the nobilitie and garrisons of HUNGARIE, caused a publicke instrument to be in his and all the rest of the capitaines names conceiued in writing, wherein they solemnly protested vnto the world, That for as much as it was impossible (by reason of the weakenesse of the garrison) for them longer to defend the towne against so mightie an enemy, without new supplies in stead of them that were slain, which they had oftentimes in vaine requested, they were therefore of necessitie enforced to come to composition with the enemy. Which protestation so made, the Gouverneur with the chiefe capitaines confirmed with their hands and seales. So after a truce granted, and pledges giuen on both sides, at length it was agreed vpon, That all the garrison souldiours, together with the countie and other capitaines should in armes with ensignes displayed with bag and baggage depart in safetie; and with a safe conuoy be brought to ALTENEVRG. Which agreement though by oath confirmed, was not on the Turkes part altogether performed: for when the countie had the 29 day of September, at ten a clock in the forenoone deliuered vp the citie vnto the Bassa, and the Christian garrison was all come out, the countie himselfe with a few of his friends was with a conuoy of Turkes brought in safetie to the appointed place: but the Italians and other garrison souldiours that came behind, and ought to haue bene by the Gouverneur protected, were contrary to the Turkes promise spoyled of all that they had, and hardly escaping with life, came that night to HONSTRATE, and the next day to ALTENEVRG. Thus was RAB, one of the strongest bulwarkes of Christendome, traiterously deliuered vnto the most mortall enemy of the Christian religion; being euen then when it was giuen vp, vidualled for a yeare, and sufficiently furnished with all things necessarie for defence: all which prouision together with the citie fell into the hands of the faithlesse enemy. A losse neuer to haue bene sufficiently lamented, had it not bene about foure yeares after, euen as it were miraculously againe recovered, to the great reioysing of all that side of Christendome, as in the proceffe of this Historie shall appeare.

Siman

A Siman glad of this victorie, as of the greatest trophie of his masters glorie ouer the Christians, gaue him speedie knowledge thereof, both by letters and messengers. Of whom he was for that good seruice highly commended; and afterward bountifullly rewarded: for now had Amurath already in hope deuoured all AVSTRIA, with the prouinces thereabout. The great Rab repaired the rent citie, new fortified the battered bulwarkes, enlarged the ditches, and filled the cathedrall church with earth, in manner of a strong bulwarke, where vpon he planted great store of great ordinance: and with exceeding speed dispatched all things necessarie for the holding of the place. In the meane time he sent certaine Tartars to summon the towne and castile of PARAB; which castile and little towne subject therunto, the Christians the night following set on fire, because it should not stand the enemy in any stead for the farther troubling of the countrey, and so fled.

The Bassa hauing at his pleasure disposed of all things in RAB, and leading there foure thousand Ianizaries, and two thousand horsemen in garrison; departed thence with his armie and laid siege to KOMARA, a strong towne of that most fertile island, which the Hungarians call SCHUT; which situated in the verie point thereof about foure miles from RAB, is on the East, South; and North enclosed with the two armes of Danubius. All these waies Siman with his fleet (which he had there notably well appointed) laid hard siege vnto the towne, and gaue thereunto diuers assaults: and by land, the Beglerbeg of GRACIA ceased not both by continuall batterie and mines, to shake the wals and bulwarkes thereof. Thus was the citie on all sides both by water and by land hardily laid vnto. But the Christians within, with no lesse courage defended themselves and the citie, than did the Turkes assault them; shewing indeed, that the libertie of their religion and countrey, was vnto them dearer than their liues. Matthias the archduke in the meane time, not ignorant how much it concerned the emperour his brother to haue this citie defended, hauing after his late ouerthrow gathered together a good armie of Germanes, Bohemians, and Hungarians, resolved to go and raise the siege: and so marching forward with his armie, came and encamped the 28 day of October at NITRIA, about fife miles from KOMARA. Now were the Tartars a little before departed from the campe, with purpose to returne home: yea the Turkes themselves wearie of the siege, and wanting victuall both for themselves and their horses, began also as men discouraged to shrink away. Which the Bassa well considering, thought it not best with his heartlesse souldiours and armie now fore weakened, to abide the coming of the Christians: and therefore vpon their approach he forthwith forooke the citie, which he had by the space of three weekes hardily besieged, and by a bridge made of boats transported his armie and artillerie ouer Danubius to DORTS, where the next day after he brake vp his armie. Immediately after the Turkes were thus departed, the breaches to be repaired, the mines to be filled vp, and new bulwarkes and rampiers to be made in diuers places for the more strength of the citie, leaving the charge thereof still vnto the lord BRAUN the old Gouverneur, who in the defence thereof had receiued a grievous wound in his right knee: of whom also this notable fact is reported. The Bassa in time of the late siege of KOMARA, vnder the colour of a parley, had sent fife Turkes into the citie to the Gouverneur, but in deed to prone if he were by any means to be wooon to yeeld vp the citie, and not to hold it out to the last: The faithfull Gouverneur, hauing giuen them the hearing vntill they had discharged their whole treacherie, presently caused foure of their heads to be stricken off, and to be set vpon long pikes vpon one of the bulwarkes for the Bassa to looke vpon; but the fift (the beholder of this tragedie) he sent backe vnto the Bassa, to tell him, That although he had found one in RAB to serue his turne, he was much deceiued if he thought to find Countie Hardeck; and that he wished rather to die the emperours faithfull seruant in the blood of the Turkes, than to betray the citie committed to his charge.

F Countie Hardeck late Gouverneur of RAB, generally before suspected to haue treacherously betrayed that strong towne vnto the Bassa, was therefore sent for to VIENNA, and there by the emperours commaundement committed to prison. Where among many things laid to his charge, as that he should in the beginning of the siege negligently haue suffered many things to be done by the enemy, which afterwards turned to the great danger of the towne: and that in the time of the siege, he had caused some of the canoniers to discharge certain great peeces against the enemy, with powder onely without shot: and that seeing one peiece among the rest to do the

enemie much harme, he had caused the same to be remooued, and so placed, as that it serued to little or no vse: beside that, he (as it should seeme) making small reckoning of the towne, should oftentimes say, That if the Turkes should win it, he should be but one towne the richer: with diuers other such things, giuing just cause of suspition. The thing that lay most heauie vpon him, was the testimonie of one of Sinan Bassa his chamber, who being taken young by the Turkes, and seruing in the Bassas chamber, was now fled from the Turkes, and comming to the Archduke in the time of his siege, declared vnto him, that there was treason in his campe: and that he but three daies before by the commaundement of his master, had deliuered two bags full of duckats vnto two Christians, of whom the one had a notable scarre in his face, and was afterwards known to haue bin one of the Counties seruants. Vpon this and such like proofs, the Countie was after many daies hearing, in open court by the judgement of seauen and fortie noblemen and captaines of name, condemned of treason, and adjudged to be hanged, his dead bodie to remaine vpon the gallowes by the space of three daies, and all his lands and goods to be confiscated: The rigour of which sentence was afterward by the emperor mitigated, and the traitour by him adjudged to haue his right hand (by him before giuen to the emperor, in pawne of his faith) and his head struck off vpon a scaffold at VIBENNA, and so buried. Which seuer sentence was afterwards accordingly put in execution: for the tenth of Iune following, the traitour being brought to the scaffold built of purpose in the hie street of VIBENNA, after the sentence of his condemnation there solemnly read, commending himselfe vpon his knees to the mercie of God, with his eyes couered, & his right hand laid vpon a blocke couered with blacke, had both his hand and head so suddenly struck off by the executioners, as that the beholders could hardly judge which of them was first off. His dead bodie with his head and hand, was presently by his seruant wrapped in a blacke cloth and laid in his coach, which stood there by of purpose couered with blacke, and was afterwards buried amongst his aunccestors.

The Tartars but lately before departed from Sinans campe, passing ouer Danubius at STRIGONIVM, had purposed through the vpper part of HUNGARIE, and by the borders of TRANSYLVANIA and MOLDAVIA, to haue againe returned into their countrey: of whom two companies falling into the hands of the lord Palfi, were by him cut off and vterly defeated: the rest comming vnto the borders of TRANSYLVANIA, and finding the passages so beset by the Prince and the Vayuod of VALACHIA, as that they could not without most manifest danger passe that way, returned againe the same way they came: and hauing rifled and burnt certaine towns and villages in the vpper HUNGARIE about TOCKAIE, passed the riuer againe at STRIGONIVM, and wintering at VESPRINIVM, PALOTTA, and other places in the countrey about RAB, liued vpon the spoile of the poore Christians, vpon the frontiers of AVSTRIA, euen as far as MEINERSDORF.

These Tartars (of whom we haue so often spoken) at their first comming to the aid of Sinan, by direction from the Turkish Sultan, staid vpon the frontiers of TRANSYLVANIA, of purpose to haue surpris'd that countrey, and either to haue thrust Sigismund Bator the young prince out of the government thereof, or else to haue sent him in bonds to CONSTANTINOPLE: For it was commonly reported, That he wearie of the heauie tribute which he yearly paid vnto the Turke, and had now after their greedie manner been diuers times enhaunfed: had purposed to reuolt from the Turkish Sultan, and to enter into confederation with the Christian emperor. Which innouation and change, certaine of the nobilitie and chiefe States of TRANSYLVANIA, sought by all meanes to hinder: and acquainting Amurath with the matter, and entering into conspiracie with the Tartars, vnderooke to deliuer the whole countrey into their hands, and to send the Prince prisoner to HVSZ, where the Tartars then lay vpon the borders encamped. Wherefore dissembling this their purpose, they cunningly perswaded the Prince, that Samosche the great Chancellor of POLONIA, in the confines of his countrey lay with a great power expecting his comming, to consult with him of matters of great importance. And the better to colour this their treacherie, they had counterfeited letters to that effect from the Chancellor to the Prince, and had wrought so effectually, that the Prince not suspecting any such treason, gaue credit to their perswasions, and so put himselfe vpon his way towards the Chancellor (as he supposed: but by the way, he was aduised by some of his friends which had got some suspition of the matter, not to go any farther, for that his comming was not attended by the Polonians his friends (as he was perswaded) but by the Tartars his enemies, who lay in wait for him at HVSZ, to be

A reace him of his life and government. The Prince astonished with the noueltie of the matter, listned vnto their perswasion, and retired with his traine to the strong fort of KEHVVERE; where he staid foureteen daies, as if it had been onely for feare of the Tartars. In the meane time, hee gaue notice to the nobilitie and gouernours of the countrey; his friends, of the imminent and common danger; who forthwith repaired vnto him in armes. But the traitors proceeding in their purpose, ceased not to perswade Bornemissa, who had the leading of the princes armie, that to fight with the Tartars was a matter of no small danger: and that therefore if he wished well to his countrey, he should not haue to doe with them, but onely shew himselfe neere vnto them, and that he was not vnprovided for them: which was accordingly done, and the Transylvanian army brought so nigh vnto the Tartars, as that they might heare the noise of their drums and trumpets. Whereby the Tartars as by the watchword, perceiuing themselves discovered, and nothing to fall out according to their expectation, & as had been vnto them promised for the betraying of the prince: they removed thence, and by another way breaking through the midst of TRANSYLVANIA, and so into HUNGARIE, rifled and burnt fise hundred villages, slew all the males that were aboute twelue yeares of age, and carried away the rest vnto the Turkish army then lying at the siege of RAB. In the meane time the traitours (when as this first plot serued them not) conspired to set vp one Balthazar Bator, the young princes nigh kinsman, and with the good fauour of Amurath to preferre him to the soueraigne government of their countrey. Which their purpose the Prince perceiuing, and doubting altogether to trust vnto the fidelitie of his owne subjects; writ to his neighbours the Rascians, and other his confederats, praying their aid in this so dangerous and doubtfull estate. Which after he had receiued, he appointed a generall assembly of all his States to be holden at CLAUSENBURG, and that vpon a great paine to be inflicted vpon all such as should not there personally appeare: so at the prefixed day all came, except the Cardinal Bator and Stephen his brother, who guiltie of so foule a treason against their owne bloud, were now before fled into POLONIA. Being all thus met together, the Prince commaunded the gates of the citie to be shut, and diligent watch and ward to be kept, forbidding by open proclamation, that any man vpon paine of death should so much as speake of any imagined treason. And at the same time politickly caused to be published in writing, how that the Germanes, had in the farther side of HUNGARIE got a notable victorie ouer the Turkes; for joy whereof he commaunded benefices to be made, and the great ordinance to be in triumph shot off, with many other signes of joy and gladnesse: and withall caused a notable banquet to be prepared, whereunto together with others, were inuited also all the chiefe of the conspirators: Of whom, euen as they were at dinner & least feared any such matter, he commaunded foureteen to be apprehended and committed to prison: and the next morning caused fise of them to be executed in the open market place. The principall of whom, who had vnderaken to haue himselfe slaine the Prince, after three or foure light cuts in the necke, he caused to be drawne in pickeles with foure horses: the other foure, namely Alexander, and Gabriell Gendi, Gregorie Diato, and Ladislaus Sallentz, were beheaded, and their dead bodies all that day left in the market place for the people to behold: the rest were also afterwards worthely executed; and Balthazar Bator, whom the conspirators had intended to haue exalted, strangled. Hauing thus reuenged himselfe vpon his enemies, he by a publike edict divulged through all his dominion, gaue leaue to all his subjects in generall, of their owne charge to take vp armes against the Turkes, and whatsoever they could take from them, to haue it to themselves, as good prize gotten from their lawfull enemies. By which vnwonted libertie, the Transylvanians encouraged as with a great bountie, armed themselves on all hands to the number of fortie thousand, who being mustered and sworn to hold together against the Turkes, made their first expedition towards Danubius; where at their first arriual, by good hap they light vpon certaine of the Turkes ships laded with prouision for the campe, and merchandise of all sorts, and much treasure: of which rich ships, they at the first onser tooke seuen, but the eighth (being in deed the Admirall) escaped their hands. In these ships they tooke an exceeding rich bootie, slew many of the Turkes, and in token of the victorie carried backe vnto the Prince seauen of the Turkish ensignes. This victorie caused great joy in TRANSYLVANIA; euerie man of so prosperous a beginning, conceiuing good hope of most happie successe. It is reported, that Sinan Bassa hearing of this losse, should say, That if this prouision had come to him in safetie, he could with that treasure more easily haue bought VIBENNA in AVSTRIA, than he had RAB in HUNGARIE. After this victorie the Prince laied siege

in a tumult at Constantinople.

Not long after, about the two and twentieth of December a tumult rise among the Janizaries of the Court at C O N S T A N T I N O P L E, which grew to such an height, that in the heat thereof one of the Bassaes was by them slaine, with some others of good account, and one of Amuraths sonnes sore wounded, and with much adoe layed. Vpon conceit whereof, Amurath for anger and griefe fell into a fit of the falling sicknesse (whereunto he was much subject) and was therewith for the space of three dayes and three nights so grievously vexed, as if he should haue presently giuen vp the ghost: so that the citie was filled with heauinesse and feare, and the great men of the Court were euen readie to thinke vpon a new lord. This tumult of the insolent Janizaries many supposed to haue bene the cause of Amurath his death, which shortly after ensued: his griefe and maladie encreasing daily by the euill newes still brought vnto him both by messengers and letters, especially out of T R A N S Y L V A N I A, where the prince waiting vpon euery occasion, was still at hand with the Turkes, cutting them short in euery place; and in sundrie rodes which he made vpon them this moneth, tooke many of their castles and forts from them. He had at that time in the field in diuers places three armies: one vnder the conduct of Gesty Fereis, in the countrey of L V O A Z neere vnto T E M E S V V A R: another vnder the leading of Michael Horvat, on the side of Danubius, to intercept the Turkes comming to B V D A: and the third commanded by Caspar Cornoyse in the countrey neere to G I V L A, vnto whom came shortly after fiftene hundred horsemen out of the vpper H V N G A R I E.

1595

The Transylvanian prince Sigismund Bator thus lately revolted from the Turk, for the strengthening of his state thought it best betime to enter into confederation with his neighbors of V A L A C H I A and M O L D A V I A (who moued by his example, shortly after in like manner also cast off the seruile yoke of the Turke) but especially with the Christian emperor Rodolph. For which purpose he sent his embassadours honourably accompanied: who comming to C O S S O V I A in H V N G A R I E the foureteenth of December, arrived at P R A G E the twelfth of Ianuarie, with twentie waggons, and an hundred and fiftie horse, where they were by the emperours appointment most honourably receiued and royally entertained: and after a few dayes hauing deliuered vnto the emperor the summe of their embassage, which was for a confederation to be made betweene the emperor and the prince: after much graue consultation and serious discourse it was fully concluded and agreed vpon: the chiefe points whereof I thought it not amisse here in briefe to set downe, for the satisfying of such as desire to know in what termes that worthie prince next neighbour vnto the Turke then stood with the Christian emperor.

The capitulation of the league between the emperor and the Transylvanian
Prince.

First it was agreed vpon, That the emperor for himselfe and for the states of H V N G A R I E should promise to proceed in his wars begun against the common enemy, and not to conclude any peace with him, without the knowledge and good liking of the prince. And that in all conclusions of peace to be made betwixt him and the Turke, the countreys of T R A N S Y L V A N I A, V A L A C H I A, and M O L D A V I A, should be alwayes comprised: in regard whereof, the prince likewise promised for himselfe and the states of T R A N S Y L V A N I A, to prosecute the commenced warre, and not to enter into any league with the Turke, without the knowledge and consent of the emperor and the nobilitie of H V N G A R I E, and this to be confirmed by solemne oath on both sides.

Secondly, that the prouince of T R A N S Y L V A N I A with all the parts and confines thereof hitherto possessed by the prince in H V N G A R I E, should remaine vnto the said prince Sigismund and his heires male, with all the profits arising thereof, in such sort as they had done in the time of Iohn, Stephen, and Christopher, his predecessors, to haue therein a most free and absolute authoritie: yet so, as that they should acknowledge his imperiall maiestie and his lawfull successors for their lawfull souldaignes; vnto whom they should alwayes sweare their fealtie, but without any homage doing: and that to be performed by his successors at the time of the change, but by the prince himselfe, presently after the confirming of this league. But that for lacke of heires male, the countrey of T R A N S Y L V A N I A with all the territories thereunto annexed, should descend vnto his sacred maiestie and his successors, the kings of H V N G A R I E, as a true and inseparable member thereof: whereunto the prince and all the states of T R A N S Y L V A N I A should bind themselues by solemne oath. But yet that at such time as the heires male should faile in the line

A line of the present prince, and that the countrey of T R A N S Y L V A N I A should according to these present conditions be deuolued to the crowne of H V N G A R I E, as well his present imperiall and royall maiestie as his successors, should keepe inuiolate the auncient lawes, priuiledges, and customes of that countrey, and alwayes appoint one of the nobilitie of T R A N S Y L V A N I A to be Gouvernour or Vayoud of the same, and no other stranger.

Thirdly, that his maiestie should acknowledge the prince of T R A N S Y L V A N I A for an absolute prince, and by speciall charter confirme vnto him the title of Most excellent.

Fourthly, that his imperiall maiestie should procure one of the daughters of the late Archduke Charles his vncl, for a wife for the prince, that as they were now to be joyned in league, so they might be joyned in affinitie also.

B Fifthly, that the emperor should procure him to bee made one of the order of the Golden Fleecce.

Sixtly, that the prince might with more cheerefulnesse and securitie make warre against the common enemy, his imperiall and royall maiestie should not at any time, howsoeuer things fell out, forsake the said prince or any of the countreys subject vnto him: and euen now presently to aid him according as the present occasion required, and afterward (if greater need should be) with greater helpe, whether it were by his Generall of C A S S O V I A, or others: and this giuing of aid to be on both sides mutuall and reciprocall, according as the necessitie of the one or other part should require: and that where most need was, thither should most helpe be conuerted.

C Seuenthly, that the sacred Romane empire should take vpon it the protection and defence of the prince and his territories. And that his imperiall maiestie should create the said prince and the princes his successors, princes of the empire: yet so, as that they should haue neither voice nor place among the said princes.

Eighthly, that whatsoever castles, towns, cities, or other places of strength should by their common forces be taken or recouered from the common enemy, at such time as his imperiall maiestie should send into the field a full armie, should be all his maiesties: But such places as the prince should by his owne forces or policie gaine from the enemy, should remaine vnto the prince himselfe. Yet that what places soeuer the prince should recouer, which at any time before belonged to the kingdome of H V N G A R I E, before it was taken by the Turke, those he should forthwith deliuer to his maiestie, as soone as reasonable recompence were by him therefore made vnto the prince.

Ninthly, his sacred maiestie should promise of his owne bountie to giue vnto his excellencie sufficient aid for the fortifying and defence of such places as should be thought necessarie for the behoofe of the Christians: as again the said prince should likewise promise not to spare his own cofers or forces, that the same places should be thoroughly fortified and defended, for the behoofe of his maiestie and the common good of the Christian commonweale.

Lastly, that for as much as the euents of warre are vncertaine, and many things suddenly happen contrarie to mens expectation, if such necessitie should chance vnto his excellencie or his successors (which mishap God forbid) that hauing spent themselues, they should not be able longer to defend their state and countrey, but that the mightie enemy preuailing, they should at last be enforced to forsake the same: in this their extremitie, his imperiall & royall maiestie should promise both for himselfe and his successors, within the space of one moneth to assigne some certaine place in some other of his dominions, where the said prince and his successors might honourably liue. And the like regard to be had also of other such principall men, as should together with the prince aduenture their liues and liuings in defence of the Christian commonweale.

Which articles of confederation agreed vpon, and solemly confirmed, the same embassadours were with all kindnesse, bountie, and magnificence dismissed and sent back again vnto the prince: who was not himselfe in the meane time idle, but labouring by all the meanes he could to draw vnto him Michael the Vayoud of V A L A C H I A, a man of no lesse worth than himselfe, and Aaron the Palatine of M O L D A V I A, both of them then the Turkes tributaries: and by them to alienate from the Turke both those countreys, that so with their combined forces they might the better defend their libertie, and withstand their common enemy: wherein he did so much, and preuailed so farre with them both, that casting off the Turkes obeisance, they shortly after to the great benefit of the Christian commonweale, and no lesse hinderance of the Turkes proceedings in H V N G A R I E, joined hands both together with him for the recouerie of their lost libertie. Which ning the poore remainders of HUNGARIE, the Vayuod not a little moued, began more deeply to consider of his owne estate. And as he was a man of a great spirit and no lesse zeale towards his country, grieuing to see his subjects committed to his charge, to be so daily by the insolent Turkes still more and more oppressed: he (as he had before promised to the Transylvanian) called an assembly of all the States of VALACHIA; to consult with them what were best to be done for the remedie of so great euils, as also for the preuenting of greater, not without cause then to be feared. Where by the generall consent of them all it was agreed, rather to joyne with the emperor and the other Christian princes in confederation (as they had been oftentimes by them requested) than longer to endure that heauie yoke of the Turkish thraldome and slaueerie. Whereupon the Vayuod taking vnto him two thousand of the Hungarian garrison souldiors, now before for that purpose secretly laid vpon the frontiers of his country; and calling vpon the name of Christ Iesus, in one day to begin withall, slew about two thousand of the Ianizaries (who without his leaue had in that country proudly feared themselves) with all the rest of the Turkes (in the midst of their insolencie) together with the traitorous Iewes, not leauing one of them that he could come by, aliue in all the open country. And purposing to driue them out of their strong holds also, and so to make a cleane riddance of them, he within foureteene daies after set vpon Dziwrozw, a great towne of the Turkes vpon the banke of Danubius, which he burnt all sauing the castle: and hauing there made a great slaughter, and loded with the spoile of the Turkes, returned to Bucaresta the chiefe seat of his Palatinat.

But long it was not after this his so great presumption, but that he perceiued the Turkes in reuenge thereof to seeke after his life: although he yet seemed to yeeld his obedience vnto Amurath, and to haue done that he did, as enforced thereunto by the insolencie of the Turkes, and for the necessarie reliefe both of himselfe and his subjects. For the same moneth, Ras being (as is aforesaid) taken by Sinan: one of the Turkes * Emirs, descended of the great family and stocke of Mahomet their false Prophet, and then Cadilefcher (a man of great account and place amongst the Turkes) accompanied with two thousand chosen souldiors, fiftie of the great Sultans chamber, and many of the Zausij and Spahij, vpon the sudden came to Bucaresta vnder the colour of refreshing themselves after their long trauell, but in deed with purpose to haue taken the Vayuod; where they without controulement committed all kind of ourragious villanie: and taking vp all the chiefe houses in the citie, imperiously demanded of the Vayuod (who then lay at his pallace neere vnto the new monasterie without the citie, built without any castle or defence vpon the riuer Dembowiza) ten thousand Florens for a present, with victuals and other necessarie prouision for his followers. And presently after, being certainly enformed that he lay there but slenderly accompanied, and almost himselfe alone, the Emir himselfe on foot with a thousand of his souldiors, went out of the citie as if it had been but for his pleasure, and in curtesie to haue seene him. Of which so suspicious a guests comming the Vayuod vnderstanding, got him betimes away into the campe of his Hungarian mercenaries, which then lay but fast by: when the Turke thus deceiued of the hope he had before conceived for the taking of him, craftily sent certaine of his followers, to know of him, to what end he in time of peace did entertaine such a number of Hungarian souldiors? Whereunto the Vayuod cunningly answered, That they were at the first entertained for the taking of Peter the sonne of Alexander, sometime Palatine of Moldavia; who although he were now before apprehended, and openly hanged vpon an hooke at Constantinople, yet that those souldiors were for their readie seruice, of necessity still to be billited in the country, vntill such time as their pay might be provided. Which the Turke hearing, commaunded the Vayuod forthwith to discharge them as men vnnecessarie, and to his subjects troublesome, promising the next day to lend him a tunne of gold to pay them their wages. Which fained promise the Vayuod seemed thankfully to take; yet nevertheless commaunded the Hungarians forthwith in armes to stand in readinesse in the campe, for the intercepting of the Turkes, if happily by him distressed they should betake themselves to flight: whilst he in the meane time with his courtiers and other souldiors, secretly assembled into a valley thereby, came suddenly vpon the Turkes (not as then dreaming of any such thing) M compassed about the Innes wherein they lay, and setting fire vpon them in fiue places, notably forced them both with fire and the sword, the two greatest extremities of war; seeking now for nothing more, than the just reuenge of his spoiled citie, his forced virgins, and wronged subjects. Howbeit the Turkes for a space right valiantly defended themselves, and by plaine force (although

Michael the Vayuod of Valachia remoueth from the Turkes.

* The Turkes call all them that are descended of the stocke of their Prophet Mahomet by the name of Emirs or Lords.

A (although in vaine) sought to haue broken through the midst of their enemies, and so to haue fled. Yea many of them by force of the fire driuen out of their lodgings, and tearing off their burning cloathes, fought starke naked: but most of them which could, fled vnto the pallace where their great Emir lay, there with him readie to die or liue. All which their last endeouers of desperation, the Vayuod easily frustrated, with two great pieces of attillerie opening a way for his souldiors vnto them. So that the proud Emir now in despaire (like the hunted Castor) threw downe out of a window a great chest full of gold and precious stones, and other jewels of great valour, if happily he might haue so appeased the Vayuods wrath: humbly now requesting no more, but to haue his life spared; fearfully promising a large ranfome for himselfe, and those few which were yet left aliue with him. Howbeit the Vayuod mindfull of the manifold injuries by them done vnto him and his subjects, and nothing mitigated or moued with the rich spoiles thrust vpon him, or the large promises the Turkes had made him; commaunded all those his enemies now in his power, to be slaine euerie mothers sonne: of whom his souldiors had a wonderfull rich spoile, although much more was lost in the fire: and so giuing thanks vnto God for the victorie, rested with his people a while at quiet. Yet within lesse than a moneth after, he sent Albertus Kirall his lieutenant with an armie to Phlocz (a great open vnwalled towne on the farther side of Danubius, equally distant from Vrosczyk and Nicopolis) from whence the Turkes oftentimes passing ouer that frozen riuer into Valachia, had there done great harme: which towne, not inferiour vnto a good citie, he suddenly surprisid, and sacking it, put to the sword all the inhabitants thereof, except such as were before his comming fled. And shortly after (the more to annoy the Turkes, marching againe ouer the frozen riuer to haue surprisid Hersova a walled citie, but one daies journey from Brailova, he was by the way vpon the ice encountred by the Turkes, whom he there in a great conflict ouerthrew; and hauing slaine many of them and put the rest to flight, holding on his intended journey, tooke that rich citie, which he rifled and burnt downe to the ground, all except the castle, which was yet by the Turkes valiantly defended: and so with the spoile of the citie returned againe ouer the riuer, there to refresh his souldiors, wearied with labour and the extremitie of the Winter weather. And yet not so contented, within six daies after passing againe ouer the riuer, and hauing vpon the side thereof in a great battell ouerthrowne the Turkes garrisons, tooke Silistra a great citie of Macedonia, built by Constantine the Great (being the seat of one of the Turkes D Sanzacks, and well inhabited with rich merchants) which faire citie he ransacked, and hauing slaine most part of the inhabitants, burnt it downe to the ground as he had the other, no lesse terror than grieue vnto the Turkes.

But whilst the aforesaid confederation betwixt the emperour and the Transylvanian Prince was yet in hand, and the troubles in Valachia thus arising; Amurath the great Sultan grievously vexed with the stoan, and attainted with the falling sicknesse, his wonted disease; and inwardly also tormented with the late insolencie of the Ianizaries, and reuolt of the countries of Transylvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, no small hinderance to the proceeding of his warres in Hungarie: as a man both in bodie and soule tormented with great impatience and agonie of mind, departed this life the eighteenth day of Ianuarie, in the yeare of our Lord 1595: when he had liued one and fiftie, or as some say two and fiftie yeares, and thereof reigned E nineteene. At the time of his death arise such a sudden and terrible tempest at Constantinople, that many thought the world should euen presently haue been dissolued. His dead bodie was not long after with great pompe and solemnitie buried by Mahomet his eldest sonne (which now reigneth) in a Moschie which hee himselfe yet liuing had before built at Constantinople.

THAT NAME, SEVENTH EMPEROR OF THE TURKS, HE THAT NOW
SWAYETH THAT MIGHTIE EMPIRE

He death of the late great Sultan Amurath was not forthwith made knowne in the Court, but with wonderfull secrecie concealed, not onely for feare of the Tapizaries, who in time of the vacancie of the empire alwayes doe whatsoeuer pleaseth themselves; but also for that the people hauing in distrust the fierce nature of Mahomet, Amurath his eldest sonne, were generally better affected to Amurath the younger brother, a prince of a more mild spirit and courteous disposition, vnto whom they in heart wished those stately honours, which could by no meanes without the great wrong and prejudice of his elder brother, and danger of the whole state be giuen vnto him. Ten dayes after came Mahomet in post from AMASIA to CONSTANTINOPLE; and was there by the great Baffaes and other his mightie fauourits saluted Emperour: which done, he presently after caused all his brethren to be inuited to a solemne feast in the Court: wherunto they yet ignorant of the death of their father, came chearefully as men fearing no harme, but being come were there all by his commandement most miserably strangled: and at once to rid himselfe of the feare of all competitorrs (the greatest torment of the mightie) he the same day (as is reported) caused ren of his fathers wiues and concubines, such as by whom any issue was to be feared, to be all drowned in the sea.

The Janizaries and other souldiours of the Court not before acquainted with the death of Amurath, either with the choice that the great Bassaes had without their priuitie made of Mahomet, and not a little offended to see themselues so disappointed of such spoyle as they reckon due vnto them in the vacancie of the empire, as men discontented rise vp in a rage, and made such haucke and spoyle in the imperiall citie, as greater they could not well haue made, had there bene as yet no emperour chosen at all; and so to contented, were now euen vpon the point to haue rifled their new emperours Court, and to haue laied violent hands vpon the person of himselfe, in reuenge of the tyrannie by him executed vpon his brethren and fathers wiues (which inhumane crueltie the Turkish emperours easily excuse by the name of, The policie of their state.) For the appeasing of which so dangerous a tumult, Mahomet called vnto him certaine of the chiefe men among these seditious, such as were thought to be able to do most with them, whom he sought by faire perswasions and large promises to win vnto him, and by them to pacifie the rest: Which serned him to litle or no purpose, vntill such time as the great Bassaes themselues came out with their followers, who with many faire perswasions, mixt with most grieuous threats and firme promise of a generall pardon, with much adoe appeased the tumult: yet for the more safetie kept all the chiefe streets of the citie with strong watch and ward. This broile thus ouerblowne, a new tent was by the commendement of the new emperour set vp before the temple of Sophia: wherein on the right hand was placed the dead bodie of the late Sultan Amurath, his father, and on the left hand the bodies of his nineteene strangled brethren, layed forth of purpose,

A poſe, as an heauie ſpectacle for the people to behold: who all not long after were together with their father with great ſolemnitie after the Turkiſh manner buried, and Mahomet himſelfe (being about nine and twentie yeares old) now openly proclaimed great empetour of the Turks, and lord of all, from the riſing of the Sunne to the going downe of the ſame. After that returning to his pallace, he made vnto his Baſſaes and other great men a ſumptuous and ioyall feaſt, as the manner was: but whileſt they were in the middelt of their mirth, vpon the ſudden all the citie was againe in an vprore, and the people in armes, in ſuch ſort, as that it was thought ſcarce one man would haue eſcaped aliue from that banket, had not the chiefe Baſſa with his grauitie and wiſdome and wonderfull labour in good time appeaſed their furie, and withall their greater terrout cauſed all the great ordinance in the citie to be brought forth into the ſtreets, readie charged, to be ſhot off amongſt them.

Whilest these troubles thus passed at CONSTANTINOPLE, vpon the late confederation made betwene the emperor, the Translyuanian prince, the Valachians and Moldauians, diuers fortunate inrodes and skirmishes were by them made in the frontiers of the Turkes dominions, many strong places were surprisid, many rich booties taken, and notable exploits done, which we will but briefly passe ouer, as the precedents of a greater warre. The citie of WILTZE, before taken by the Turkes, was now againe in the beginning of this yeare recovered: and the Christians about SCUTHIA, in number about foure thousand, breaking into the Turks frontiers, carried away an exceeding rich prey, with diuers notable captiues. The like did also the Christians of VIVARIA: at which time also the garrison souldiours of ALTENEVRG making a rode into the country about RAB, encountered with foure thousand Turkes, of whom they slew two hundred, tooke certaine prisoners, whom they sent some to PRESBURG, some to ALTENEVRG: and Sinan Bassa the late Generall returning towards CONSTANTINOPLE with much treasure, which he had greedily scraped together in the late wars in HUNGARIE, was by the Valachians set vpon by the way not farre from BELORADE, and stript of all that he had, hauing much ado to escape himselfe with some few of his followers. The same Valachians, together with the Translyuanians, vnder the conduct of their valiant capitaine Gesius Ferens, entering further vpon the Turkes, tooke from them diuers of their townes and castles, as PONDESIE, NICOPOLISE, KILLA, and REBNICHI, and meeting with twelue thousand Tatars, slew a great number of them, and put the rest to flight. With this insolencie of the Valachians his late tributaries, but now his enemies, the Turkish emperor was highly offended: and therefore sent one Bogdanus a Valachian borne, descended of the Palatines house, with a great power to expulse the old Vayuod, and to possesse himselfe of that honour, as his tributarie; promising vnto him all fauour and kindnesse. Bogdanus thus supported and furnished, came with his power into VALACHIA, yet thought it best before he attempted any great matter, to expect the coming of the Tatars left the last yeare in HUNGARIE by Sinan: of whose comming the Valachians and Translyuanians hauing vnderstanding, met them by the way, and joyning battell with them, slew eight thousand of them, put the rest to flight, and so returned: vnto whom presently after this victorie the Translyuanian prince sent foureteeen thousand souldiours more to aid them against the Turkes. But Bogdanus vnderstanding both of the ouerthrow of the Tatars and the comming of this new supplie, durst not proceed any farther in his enterprise, but kept himselfe still in his trenches. Not long after by the commaundement of the Turkish emperor, Han the Crim Tartar with a great power of his Tartarian horsemen entred into MOLDAVIA, with purpose to haue by fire and sword reduced that country againe vnto the Turkes obeisance: of whose comming Aaron Vayuod of MOLDAVIA hauing knowledge, and aided by his neighbour Michael Vayuod of VALACHIA, so belayed the Tatars, that he in three diuers battels ouerthrew them, and hauing slaine twelue thousand of them, enforced the rest to retire againe out of his country: and following the course of this victorie, presently after tooke BENDAR, SCHNITZ, TIGNA, MACHNITS, with some other castles and fortresses of the Turkes neere vnto the riuer of Danubius; all which he furnished with his owne garrisons; and withall tooke in the rich country of BOBRAGA, the inhabitants thereof willingly submitting themselves vnto him, as men wearie of the Turkish thraldome. With like good fortune, aided by the Polonian Cossackes, he ouerthrew Tanickish thraldome. With like good fortune, aided by the Polonian Cossackes, he ouerthrew Tanickish thraldome. With like good fortune, aided by the Polonian Cossackes, he ouerthrew Tanickish thraldome.

in durance at B V D A and C O N S T A N T I N O P L E, might be restored vnto their wonted libertie, then some good forme of peace, and bounding of their territories might happily be agreed vpon: without which conditions, all talke of peace was but vaine; for that God the just and mightie protectour of such as put their trust in him, would not faile to helpe his imperiall maiestie, with the rest of the confederat princes, in their so just a quarrell, and abate the pride of such as trust in their owne strength and power.

This answer the captiues at BvdA were commaunded to giue vnto the Bassa, either by writing or by word of mouth: and withall earnestly to request him both for their owne libertie and their fellows, wrongfully detained at CONSTANTINOPLE. Which if it could not be obtained, yet to comfort themselues with that, that they should in bounteous manner receiue from the emperour such allowance, as should suffice to provide them all things necessarie: as he had granted to Perling, whom he might haue justly detained and not sent him backe againe, but for his oaths sake, being no lawfull prisoner. Thus were the vnreasonable conditions of peace craftily by the Bassa propounded, by others answered: but by whom he knew not, no mans name being set thereunto.

The Emperour not ignorant with what an enimie he had to doe, and of nothing more carefull than of the kingdome (or more truly to say, of the reliques of the kingdome) of HUNGARIE, lying now as it were in the Lyons mouth; ceased not to pray aid, not of the princes electors onely, but of others also farther off; yea even as far as ITALIE and SPAINIE, but especially of the king of POLONIA, as his neere alliance and neighbour. Vnto whom both he and the States of HUNGARIE sent their embassadours, at such time as he moued with the daily incursions of the Turkes and Tartars into the countreies adjoyning vpon his, had for the safetie of his owne kingdome, called a parliament of all his States in Februarie last, at CRACOVIA. Whereof Mahomet the Great Turke hearing, sent also two of his chiefe Chiaus, his vsuall embassadours vnto the king and his States so assembled, to craue his aid in his warres in HUNGARIE: which if the king should not refuse, then to promise him to want no coine to pay his souldiors; and that Mahomet mindfull of to great a courtesie, would at all times be readie to requite him with like, when his occasions should require. These embassadours, hauing obtained safe conduct from Michael the Vayuod of VALACHIA for their passage through his countrey, comming thither; were by the Vayuod himselfe honourably entertained and welcomed, and so brought into a faire lodging, where they discoursed with him of many matters. But the Vayuods followers, giued to see so great honour done to these their sworne and mortall enemies; with weapons in their hands brake into the tounie where the embassadours were, and without more ado slew them both: and in the same furie setting vpon the rest of the Turkes their followers, cut them all in pieces, so that of them none came into POLONIA to do their Great masters message, either yet returned to CONSTANTINOPLE to carrie newes of the rest, but there altogether perished. Of which outrage Mahomet yet vnderstanding, was therewith wonderfully enraged, threatening all euils both to the Moldauians and Valachians, and forthwith sent out other embassadours to the same purpose, who with better fortune afterwards in safetie arrived in POLONIA.

The Tatars in many places (as is before declared) overthrew, and many strong castles and forts taken from the Turkes by the Transylvanians, Valachians, and Moldauians, the Turkish affaires going to wracke in those quarters, and fore shaken on that side of HUNGARIE; Mahomet the Turkish emperor called home to the Court Sinan Bassa his Generall in HUNGARIE, to confere with him (as it was thought) of some great matters. In whose place hee sent Ferat Bassa, he who sometime had the leading of Amuraths great armies against the Persians: who now departing from CONSTANTINOPLE, came to BELGRADE in Aprill, and there took the charge vpon him. Where at his first comming in the night time, all the ropes and cordes of the tents were suddenly cut in sunder, and so his tent let fall about his eares: which some supposed to haue been done to his disgrace, by the procurement of Cicala Bassa before by him wronged; or as others thought, by the insolent Ianizaries, who disliking of him, did it in despight, wishing rather to haue been led by Mahomet himselfe. Now at his comming, the famine which the last yeare began amongst the Turkes, was growne exceeding great, not at BUDA and BELGRADE onely, but euen generally in most places of HUNGARIE possessed by the Turkes: insomuch, that the Tartar women that followed the campe, were faine to roast their owne children and eat them. This famine was also accompanied with a most terrible plague, whereof great numbers of

A the Turks and Tartars died daily: so that of fourescore five thousand Tartars which came the last year into HUNGARIE, now remained scarce eight thousand; the rest being all deuoured with the sword, famine, and the pestilence.

Great were the harmes the Turkes still daily receiued from the late revolted countries of TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, the Christians of those places seeking by all means to annoy them. Michael Vaiuod of VALACHIA, not contented with that he had already done, but entering into the Turks frontiers, surpris'd Schimble, together with the cattle, wherein he found 14 field pieces, amongst which were two which had vpon them the armes of the emperor Ferdinand, and other two hauing vpon them the armes of Hunniades: which pieces he afterwards sent as a present to the Transylvanian prince. After that he tooke OROSTIE, a famous port towne, the dwelling place of the Turkes great purvey or for butter, cheefe, and hony, and such other prouision for the Court; wherein he found such store of the aforesaid prouision, as might well haue sufficed eight thousand men for a whole yeare: and still prosecuting his good fortune, tooke from the Turkes KILEC and GALEMPE, with the strong cattle of S. George, commonly called GRIGIO, and at length besieged LAGANOC.

With the beginning of the Spring came Matthias the Archduke and Generall of the Christian armie, from the assembly of the nobilitie of HUNGARIE at PRESBURG to VIENNA, and from thence to the emperor his brother at PARIS; who appointed him Generall of the lower HUNGARIE, and Maximilian his brother Generall of the vpper countrey: giuing them for their lieutenants, vnto Maximilian the lord Teuffenbach, and to Matthias the countie Charles Mansfeld, by him sent for out of FLANDERS, and after created one of the princes of the empire. John de Medices, who was yet in HUNGARIE, he made master of the great ordinance, with charge to fortifie KOMARA: which he so well performed, as that it was thought nothing in strength inferior to RAB. All this while the emperor ceased not both by his ambassadors and letters to sollicit the Christian princes, for the repressing of the common enemy to put to their helping hands: and so much preuailed with them, that out of his owne hereditarie prouinces, and from other princes his friends, he had this Spring raised a right puissant and strong armie for the defence of HUNGARIE: which how it was raised, and from whom, it shall not be much from our purpose briefly to remember, as the chiefe strength vnder God, whereby the Christian commonweale was this yeare most notably defended. Out of the higher SAXONIE came a thousand two hundred

D year most notably declined : Out of the Kingdome of SAXONIE six hundred : from FRANCONIA a thousand horsemen, and out of the lower SAXONIE six hundred : from FRANCONIA a thousand horsemen : from SVEVIA foure thousand footmen : out of the countie of TIROL as many : from BAVARIA three thousand : out of BOHEMIA two thousand men at armes, six hundred light horsemen, and six thousand footmen : from SILÉSIA a thousand five hundred horsemen : from LVSATIA five hundred horse and a thousand foot : from MORAVIA a thousand horse, and two thousand foot : out of AVSTRIA two thousand horse and six thousand foot : from HUNGARIE five hundred horsemen and a thousand foot : from the nobilitie of SVEVIA and FRANCONIA foure thousand foot : from the king of SPAINE out of the low countries vnder the conduct of Charles countie Mansfelt, two thousand horsemen and six thousand foot. Vnto thefe the bishop of ROMB added two thousand horsemen and eight thousand foot : the great duke of FLORENCE sent five hundred horse and three thousand foot : the duke of FERRARA a thousand five hundred footmen : the duke of MANTVA a thousand foot : and duke Venturee five hundred horse. All which being put together, fill vp the number of fiftene thousand nine hundred horsemen, and fittie thousand five hundred foot . Which notable armie, raised from the power of diuers Christian princes, and conducted by worthie chiefeaines, had by the goodness of God much better successe this Summer against the auntient enemies of Christendome, than had the like armie the yeare before, as in the proceffe of this Historie shall appeare.

F Among the worthish commanders that were in this puissant armie, Charles countie Mansfelt the sonne of Peter Ernestus the old countie, from his youth brought vp in armes, was by the king of SPAINE at the request of the emperour sent with the aforesaid forces of two thousand horse and six thousand foot out of the Low countries, as a man for his approued valour and direction, fit to manage these dangerous warres against the Turke vnder Matthias the Archduke, as his lieutenant General : who hauing raised the appointed forces, for most part Wallons, deas his lieutenant General : who hauing raised the appointed forces, for most part Wallons, departed from BRUXELLES about the midst of Februarie, and by the way taking his leaue of his aged father at LYXENBURG, and traouelling through GERMANY, came in March to PRAG, where where he was by the Emperour and the Archduke his brother most honorably entertained, and shortly after with great solemnitie created one of the Princes of the empire. His forces following after him were by the way staied, partly by the inundation of waters, the rivers they were to passe ouer (at that time rising to an vnwonted height,) partly by the jealousie of some of the Germane princes, who denied them passage through their territories, vntill such time as that the emperour by his letters had opened vnto him the way: which princes for all that stood vpon their guard, and so gaue them passage.

Now ran great rumours of the wonderfull preparations of the Turkes; as also of the Christians; Fame after her wonted manner, encreasing the report of all things aboue measure: which caused the Turkes with exceeding care to looke to the fortification of their frontier townes, especially of RAS and STRIGONIVM, as did the Christians to the fortification of KOMARA and ALTENBURG. In the meane time many hoat skirmishes passed betwene the Christians and the Turkes, especially in the late reuolted countries of TRANSYLVANIA and VALACHIA, wherein the Turkes were still put to the worke, to the great discontentment of their emperour. Neere vnto TAMESVAR the Bassa of BUDA was ouerthrowne, by the valiant capitaine Gestius Ferentis, and the Transylvanians. And in VALACHIA the Turkes Generall, entring with a great armie was there also by the lord Nadasti and the Valachians aided with the Transylvanians, in a great battell discomfited and ouerthrowne. Eight thousand of the Turkes heads in token of this victorie the lord Nadasti sent to ALBA IULIA to the Transylvanian prince, and certaine ensignes, amongst which one was most richly garnished with pretious stones and pearle, thought to be worth thirtie thousand dollars; which the prince afterward restored againe to Nadasti, offering him great possessions in TRANSYLVANIA, if he could haue bene content there to haue seated himselfe.

All this Spring the Turkes countenanced their warres with greater boasts and threats than true force giuing it out, That they would in short time worke wonders both by sea and land. For the more credit whereof, Murat Rays, a notable pyrat, was sent out with twelue gallies; who landing here and there vpon the coasts of ITALIE, did much harme, causing it to be reported in euery place where he landed, That this was but the beginning of a greater war, and that a wonderfull fleet was to follow him: which raised a great feare, as well in other places as in ITALIE. Howbeit, no such fleet afterwards appeared: for why the Turkish emperor, much troubled with the reuolt of TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, and the great mortallitie then raging both among his souldiors and their horses, was not at leisure to looke into the sea, having his hands full ynough with the troubles of HUNGARIE, where his men of warre enjoyed liue rest in the frontiers of his territories.

Sigismund the Transylvanian prince, had vpon some just causes of late suspected Aaron the Vayud of MOLDAVIA, to haue intelligence not onely with the Polonians, but also with the Cardinall Bator and other his mortall enemies, and secretly to haue bene about to make his peace with Mahomet, and so againe to fall off from him vnto the Turke: Which vehement suspicion growing dayly more and more, was about this time manifestly confirmed by certaine letters intercepted concerning that matter. For the preuenting whereof, the prince caused Aaron to bee apprehended, and with his wife and sonne to be sent as prisoners to PRAGE: in whose rounge he by the consent of the nobilitie of the countrey, placed one Stephen Rozman, a wise and discreet man amongst them, and such an one as had been vnto him alwaies faithfull. So as much as in him was, providing that that countrey should not be rent from him, and the vnion of the other. But against the secret practises of the Polonians, he protested openly by letters vnto the emperour, by the power of God, and aid of his faithfull subjects to redresse those so great injuries himselfe by the sword.

In the midst of these troubles came three Chiaus, embassadours from the Turkish Sultan vnto the prince, to persuaide him againe to put himselfe into his protection, and to giue him passage through his countrey, as in former time into HUNGARIE, promising him, that all the injuries by him or his people done, should bee for cuer forgotten and forgiven: and that hee should haue those three countries of TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, as his owne free inheritance, without paying any tribute, and so to be accounted as the Turkes most louing friend and vassale. What the prince answered thereunto, was not knowne, but by his doings afterwards it was easily to be gathered, that he hearkened not vnto the deceitfull charmes of the faithlesse

Ferentis Bassa over-throwne in Valachia.

Mahomet sends his embassadours to the prince of Transylvania.

A faithlesse tyrant, trusting more vnto the league he had with the Christian Emperour. These embassadours were scarce gone, but that a secret messenger came with letters from the chiefe of the Christians in BULGARIA to the prince, declaring vnto him, That if he did with any good successe prosecute his warres, they would be readie to follow his fortune, and to joyne hands with him against the cruell tyrant, and to shut vp all the passages that way into VALACHIA, MOLDAVIA, and HUNGARIE.

Whilest these trouble some times thus passed in TRANSYLVANIA and HUNGARIE, one of the old Ianizaries; called Wassude Giesi, an old souldior, but a confident bold spoken fellow, moued as should seeme with the discontentments of the time, came vnto Mahomet the great Sultan at CONSTANTINOPLE, and there openly set vpon him with this rough abrupt speech.

B How long at last most mightie Emperour, wilt thou endure thy selfe to be seduced and blinded by the great Bassaes of thy Court, and commaunders of thine armies? How long wilt thou suffer thy selfe to be deceived, to the great danger of thy selfe and hurt of thy subjects? Seest thou not how ouerthwartly, fraudulently, and cunningly, they moued onely with their owne couetous and ambitious humors, haue hitherto dealt with thee and thy father? especially in that, that perswaded by them, thou hast dishonourably broken thy league, and taken vp armes against the Christian emperour. At length open thine eyes, and see their deceit, and how much they abuse thy power. Sinan Bailla, who must haue himselfe honoured and exalted aboue all others, hath not by strong hand honourably wooon RAS, as hath bene the manner of thine aunccestors, but hath craftily bought it with thy money, and thereby cast thee into a most dangerous warre and infinit troubles. O RAS, RAS, now the cause of great triumph and reioycing, as if thereby all Christendome should in short time bee subdued to thy scepter. But thou art therein much deceived, thy barnes, thy store-houses, as are TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, MOLDAVIA, BULGARIA, and other provinces adioyning, from whence this thy imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, with the countrey about it, thy Court, yea thy selfe, art to be relieved, are by this warre shut vp; so that downe the river of Danubius out of the West, or by the Euxine out of the East, thou art not to looke for any prouision. From whence then o mightie Emperour, wilt thou maintaine thy selfe, thy Court, this populous citie, and the countrey herabout? Not to speake in the meane time of thy mightie armie now in HUNGARIE, flesh, fish, corn, all manner of victuall are now at such a price, that the common souldior cannot buy them. In this extreme dearth of all things not men onely, but euen the very beasts and cattell starue for hunger. Thy horses goe fat perhaps into HUNGARIE, but neither thou nor thy select souldiors can liue by grasse and weeds, all that is left in that countrey. This miserie and calamitie of thy people thou seest daily, and yet thou wilt not with sound iudgement lift up thine eyes, to see from whence these harmes come, and how that they by thee put in greatest trust, studie not for thy profit or the profit of the commonweale, but onely how by all means to enrich themselves.

Mahomet much moued with this confident speech of the old Ianizarie, commaunded him to be forthwith committed to ward, and by faire meanes to bee examined, by whose setting on, and for what cause he had so holdly vttered this rude speech vnto his Soueraigne, and what further thing he had intended: but the rest of the Ianizaries hearing thereof, rose presently in a tumult, and by strong hand tooke him out of prison, and by solempne oath combined themselves to defend him, euen to the spending of their owne blood, whereat Mahomet was glad to winke.

The greatest part of the aid promised by the Christian princes for the maintenance of this yeares warres against the Turke being now come to VIENNA in AVSTRIA, countie Mansfelt, lieutenant Generall vnder the Archduke, forthwith called a counsell of the colonels, captaines, and other great commaunders of the armie, to consult with them what course to take for the be- ginning of this great warre: as whether they should presently lay siege to some towne of the enemies, or els to expect him in the plaine field and to giue him battell. All things well considered, and that resolved vpon which was thought most expedient; he removed from VIENNA to ALTENBURG, where he mustered his whole armie: and departing thence with some few of his followers, came to WALKENBURG, a village vpon the side of Danubius, where he made choise of a place to encampe his armie in: which after he had marked out, he returned again with speed to ALTENBURG, and by open proclamation through the campe, gaue straight commaundement, That against a certaine houre euery man should be in readinesse to remoue and to set forward ward toward the enemy. But diuers of the souldiours, and especially the Germanes, began forthwith after their wonted manner to crie out for their pay: before they would stirre any farther: so that the Countie was glad by a second proclamation to commaund them to rise, promising them their pay within eight dayes. But they still standing vpon their former resolution for their pay, refused any further to follow their capitaines; and sent six of the best fort among those mutinous souldiours to the Countie, in the name of all the rest to demand their pay: whom he forthwith commaunded to be all hanged: but three of them hauing reasonably excused themselves, he let them goe, and causing the other three to cast lots for their liues, hanged vp two of them. Which seuer execution so terrified the rest, that vpon the signe giuen they all rose, and with the rest of the armie followed the Countie. The whole armie being come to WALLKENBURGVNT to the place where they were to encampe; the Countie himselfe with others of the nobilitie, began with spades and shouels to dig and cast vp the trenches, and so wrought vntill they sweat againe: with whose example all the rest of the armie, of what degree soeuer, being moued to labour, had in short time cast vp a verie great trench from Danubius vnto the marshes, large enough for four score thousand men to encampe in; the great worke with restlesse labour going forward both night and day, vntill it was fully finished. The Countie lying thus entrenched with his armie, was still carefull by his espials to vnderstand where the enemy lay, and what he did. He was ready still to heare all, but to beleue that which seemed to be most like to be true: what he purposed, he kept most secret; so that the enemy could neuer discouer any of his designs (wherein the Generals of late yeares before him had much erred:) and commonly his most certaine resolutions were shadowed vnder the open shew of some other matter nothing meant: securitie he much abhorred, as neuer free from danger: and although it was by diuers messengers brought vnto him, That the enemy was but of small strength, vnable to meet him, disorderedly encamped, and in great distresse for want of victuals; yet would he giue little credite therunto, as knowing such reports to haue oftentimes been of purpose giuen out by the Turkes to lull the Christians in securitie, the more easly to oppresse them. The Christian armie thus strongly entrenched, and the trenches planted with great ordinance, the Countie himselfe with certaine troupes of horsemen would oftentimes shew himselfe before RAB, and sometime before DORIS, viewing sometime the one place and sometime the other, as if he had verily purposed to haue besieged the one of them: and to giue the greater shew that he had so determined, he caused the ground to be marked out for his armie most conueniently to encampe in, and for the casting vp of his mounts. Which caused the Turkes of STRIGONIVM, VESPRINIVM, PALOTTA, and other places farther off, to send part as well of their watike prouision as of their garrison souldiours, some to RAB, some to DORIS for the defence of those places neere (as they thought) vnto danger. The Countie in the meane time hauing now put all things in readinesse, came with his armie and sat before DORIS, demanding to haue it yielded vnto him. And the more to confirme the Turkes that he would assuredly besiege that place, he began to cast vp his trenches, and to raise his mounts as seemed most conuenient, straitly commaunding euery man of what condition soeuer, to put his hand in some measure to the furtherance of those workes: and the more by his owne example to encourage others, would oftentimes himselfe carrie a fagot or some other thing before him vpon his horse, for the raising of the mount. For all that certaine Hungarian gentlemen, disdainig such base labour (as they deemed it) refused to doe any thing therein: which the Countie perceiuing, straitly charged one of them by his example, to carrie a fagot to the mount, which the Hungarian gentleman refusing, the Countie therewith much moued, laid the fagot he was carrying himselfe, before the Hungarian vpon his horse, charging him to see that he caried it to the appointed place: the Hungarian disdainfully taking it, caried it vntill he thought he was out of the Counties sight, and then in scorne threw it downe: which the Countie (hauing still an eye after him) perceiuing, commaunded him to be taken, and all armed as he rid, to be presently hanged vpon the next tree for his obstinacie. Which wholsome securitie both then and afterwards, caused others more diligently to doe what they were commanded by their superiors.

It happened about this time, that three Turkes being taken prisoners, were brought into the campe: whom the Countie straitly examined of many matters. But the first of the three could neither by faire or foule meanes be induced to answer to any thing that he was asked: and was therefore by the commaundement of the Countie in the sight of the other two, cut into small peeces. Who terrified with his dismembred, confessed many things whereof they were asked: and

A and among others, that the Turkish Sultan had determined to turne his greatest forces into TRANSYLVANIA, MOLDAVIA, and the vpper part of HUNGARIA: and therefore would this Sommer send small forces, or else none at all into those quarters.

Now was DORIS so belaid by the Countie, as that no man doubted, but that he had thereon purposed to haue gaged his whole forces, when suddenly the last of Iune, commaundement was giuen through the campe, that euery man vpon signe giuen, should be in readinesse to follow his leaders, for that the Countie had determined forthwith to remoue: yet whether the armie was to be remoued, few or none knew, more than certaine of the chiefe commaunders. As for to go to STRIGONIVM, few there were that so much as dreamed thereof, all was kept so secret: yet was it the Counties purpose, euen from the beginning to attempt the winning of that citie,

B which the Archduke had in vaine the last yeare besieged. The next night being both darke and foule, the Countie rose with all his armie, and the next day being the first of Iuly, came to STRIGONIVM, they of the citie not hearing of his coming before they saw him vnder their walles: Countie Mansfeld remoueth with the armie from Doris to Strigonium. Wherefore the Turkes in the suburbs called the Racian citie, and they in the fort vnder Saint Thomas hill, despairing of the keeping of those places, setting fire on the houses, and defacing the fort so much as in that sudden feare they possibly could, fled into the lower towne. The next day the Countie with resistance tooke the aforesaid places forsaken by the Turkes, which hee manned with certaine companies of Wallons, and made a bridge of boats ouer Danubius, cast vp certaine mounts, and did many other things for the furtherance of the siege. In three daies he had againe repaired the fort vnder Saint Thomas hill abandoned by the Turkes, and therein

C placed four great peeces of artilerie, wherewith he began to batter the lower towne, and in other places to strait the besieged more than they had been the yeare before. The Bassa of BUDA, not ignorant of the want both of men and munition in the besieged citie (and the rather for that they had but a little before sent part of their garrison with shot and powder to RAB and DORIS) attempted thrise (as he did many times after during the time of the siege) to haue by the riuier put new supplies both of men and munition into the citie: but was still by the diligence of the Christians excluded, and enforced with losse to returne. In short time the Lower towne which they call WASSERSTADT, or the Water towne, was with continuall batterie sore beaten, so that scarcely any house or building was left whole; and a counterescarfe made the last yeare, beaten downe. Whereunto certaine Wallons were sent, only to haue viewed the breadth and

D manner of the ditches, after whom certaine companies of the Hungarian Heidons presently followed, without any commaund from their capitaines, who with great courage got to the top of another high counterescarfe, & there set vp some of their ensignes. Which the Turkes beholding, and coming on close together, by plaine force enforced them with losse to retire. Among these Hungarians were diuers also of the Wallons slaine, with some others of good name and place, to the great griefe of the Countie, being not a little offended with that disordered seruice: yet day and night the batterie ceased not, and the Christians out of their trenches with their musket shot, slew many of the Turkes vpon the wals, receiuing little hurt againe, the Turkes still shooting but sparingly, for feare of wanting shot and powder at their greater need; yet that they spent they bestowed so well, that amongst others they had slaine foure of the Christian canoniers, and one Wallon captaine. About the midst of Iuly, the Countie with continuall batterie had made the Water towne (as he thought) faultable: and therefore sent certaine companies to begin the assault, who hauing passed the counterescarfe, found the ditch full of deepe mud, and but newly cut broader certaine paces by the Turkes, so that it was thought scarce possible to be passed without a bridge; behind which ditch was an high wall, with strong bulwarkes; and within all this was another new cast ditch, and vpon the very brinke thereof a thicke and high parapit: all which for all that, certaine companies of the Wallons with great labour and danger aduentured to passe: but such was the valour of the defendants, and the small number of them that came on to the assault, with the disadvantage of the place wherein they stood, that at length they were glad to retire, with the losse of many of their fellows. The Christians in the beginning of this siege had taken a little island in the riuier before the citie, which was kept with some few companies of the lord Palfi his Heidons; whereof the Turkes hauing intelligence at BUDA, with three galleies and certain other vessels, landed in the island 3000 souldiours, which slew the Heidons, vnto whom no succour could be suddenly sent, and so recovered againe the island: wherein they left a sufficient garrison for the keeping thereof, furnished with all things necessarie, and so departed.

About

About three dayes after the former assault, the Christians in hope of better successe the second time assaulted the VVater towne: in which assault the chiefe leaders were the lord Gris, and Antonie Zinne, a famous capitaine, had he not stained his honor with countie Hardeck at Rab; but being pardoned by the Emperour, did now together with the rest appointed to that seruice, most couragiously assault the breach; but were againe by the Turks notably repulsed, and enforced at last to giue ouer the assault, and so to retire with the losse of an hundred and fiftie men: amongst whom Zinne himselfe was slaine, with one capitaine Ruger, and some of the counties owne guard: the lord Gris was wounded in the head, and the yonger lord Schwend with diuers other captaines grievously hurt. The next day after, six hundred of the mountaine people came into the campe vnto the countie with supplications to request him, Not to giue ouer the siege vntill he had woon the citie, promising in the name of those towne and villages from whence they were sent, of their owne charges to repaire for him what harme sooner he should doe in the citie for the taking thereof, yea though he should lay it euen with the ground: for why the harmes they daily receiued from the garrison of that citie, were wonderfull.

Mahomet care-
um.

At the same time also he was aduertised by his espials (of whom he maintained many for the discouerie of the enemies doings) that Mahomet the Turkish Sultan had writ vnto the Bassa of Bvda, carefully to prouide, that his beloued citie of STRIGONIVM tooke no harme, and not to spare either for men or money betime to relieue it: and therein to do nothing without the aduice and good liking of his old and faithfull seruant Alis Beg, who of long time had gouerned and also defended that citie: and to the intent that nothing should be wanting for the performance hereof, that he had sent Alexander Aga of the Janizaries from the Court (whose seruice he might euill haue spared) whose approued counsell and helpe he might also vse in all things: for that he had rather loose some other whole kingdome than that one citie: And that therefore he should beware that it were not by the enemye woon, or by any composition yielded: wherein if he failed, he threatened vnto him his heauie displeasure, not to be appeased without the price of his head. VVhich so secure a commaundement of the great Sultans, the Bassa sent to them of STRIGONIVM, with most grievous threats from himselfe, if they, terrified with any batterie, vndermining, or assault, should yield the citie, and not hold it out as became valiant souldiours vnto the last man, swearing to empaile them all vpon stakes, that should consent to the yielding vp thereof. The old Gouvernour Alis hauing receiued this so straight a commaund from him that was both able and like ynough to performe what he had threatened, vterly to deterre the souldiours from once thinking of yielding, caused diligent enquire to be made throughout the garrison, if any of them had at any time made any motion of yielding vp the citie, or otherwise murmured against their captaines or commanders, appointing them to any seruice: and such as he found to haue so done, he to the terror of others caused to be presently executed: and after that went down himselfe into the lower towne, to see that nothing were there wanting or amisse where most danger was. But when he would haue againe returned into the vpper towne, he was stayed by the Janizaries, who told him, That seeing he was of so valiant and couragious a mind, and their Gouvernour, he should there stay with them, and take such part as they did, were it better or worse: and so would he or would he not, there needs stay he must.

Now the Bassaes of Bvda and Temesvvar, with diuers Sanzackes as well of those parts of Hungarie which the Turks possessed, as other places, were assembling their forces for the reliefe of the besieged in STRIGONIVM: VVhereof the Transylvanian prince hearing, made shew as if he would forthwith haue besieged Temesvvar, so that the Bassa thereof leauing the intended expedition for STRIGONIVM, was glad to returne for the defence of his own charge. They also of STIRIA, CARINTHIA & CROATIA, with the troupes of countie Serinus, had so stopped all the passages, that twelue thousand Turks which were coming from Zibeth and the places thereabout, could by no meanes come to joyne themselves with their fellowes for the reliefe of the distressed citie.

The higher citie
of Strigonium
battered by the Christians.

The countie leauing nothing vnattempted or vndone: that might helpe for the gaining of STRIGONIVM, had made a notable fort vpon S. Thomas hill, and therein placed siue great culuerines, wherewith he furiously battered the higher citie, and did therein great harme: and thereby also brought to passe, that no man could goe vp or downe the hill, betwixt the vpper towne and the lower, but he was in danger to be set off with those peeces, or the musketiers who defended by those great peeces, lay vpon the side of the hill in caues and bushes, awaiting for such as should

A. should goe vp or downe betwixt the two townes. Thus the Christians at one time battered the vpper towne, the lower towne, and the strong towne and fort of GOKARA, standing on the farther side of Danubius oueragainst STRIGONIVM, besieged by the lord Palfi. But of all these places, GOKARA was with the furie of the great ordinance most shaken: which the countie perceiuing, caused the batterie to be encreased, and so continued, vntill he had beaten downe the counterscarpe, and made certaine faire breaches in the wall. Whereunto the Morauians (vnto whose lot it fell) the one and twentieth of July gaue an assault in siue diuers places, whom the lord Palfi seconded with his Hungarians, of whom certaine were of purpose appointed beside their armes to bring things with them for the firing of the towne, which they in the time of the assault found meanes so well to bestow, that in a while the towne was all on a light fire. The Turks at first made notable resistance; but finding themselves ouerpressed, and seeing the towne now on a fire about their eares, which with the force of the wind so encreased, that it caught hold of the lower towne on the other side of the river, they retired to the riuers side, where some of them by boats got ouer to STRIGONIVM, other some perished in the river, the rest falling into the hands of the Christians, were by them all put to the sword. GOKARA thus taken, and the fire quenched, the Christians repaired the breaches, and storing it with all warlike prouision, left in it a strong garrison. VVithin a night or two after were two hundred of the Turks horsemen desiried in a field fast by, which caused an alarum to be raised in the campe, as if the whole armie of the Turks had bene at hand: howbeit those horsemen retiring, and no other appearing, it was afterwards knowne, that they were onely scouts sent out by the Turkes to take view of the armie of the Christians and in what fort they lay encamped.

The latter end of this moneth it fortuned that a young countrey fellow, secretly sent out of the citie by the Gouvernour, and falling into the hands of Palfi, was by him sent to the countie, by whom he was in friendly manner demanded, From whence he came, whether he was going, and whereabouts: VVhereunto the youth frankly answered, That he was sent from the Gouvernour with letters to the Bassa of Bvda, which he presently drew out of his bosome, and deliuered them vnto the countie; who after he had read them, caused them to be closed vp againe, and so deliuered them to the young man, with some few crownes, commaunding him to carrie them to the Bassa, as he was about, and in his returne to bring him the Bassaes answere, promising for his so doing to reward him bountifullly: which the young man vnderooke to doe, and so departed. D. Now the purport of the Gouvernours letters was, That if the Bassa did not within six or seauen dayes send him aid and relieue him, he should for want of victuals and other things necessarie for the holding out of the siege, be enforced either to abandon the citie, or to yield it vp into the enemies hands. VVhereunto the Bassa returned answere by the aforesaid messenger, That he would within the appointed time bee with him, willing him in the meane while to be mindfull of his wonted valour, and not to be with any thing discouraged: appointing him the day, the houre, the way, the meane, with all the other circumstances how he would relieue him. VVhich letters the young man according to his promise deliuered vnto the countie: who thereupon prouided accordingly for the welcomming of the Bassa. VVithin a day after also, one of the Turkes canoni- E. ers considering the danger the citie lay in, and fearing that it would be lost, fled out of it into the campe: who besides that he aptly declared the state of the citie, and the wants the besieged therein, did also afterwards good seruice during the time of the siege. The Turkes had in this while many times sallied out, to their great losse: yet now vpon hope of better successe they ad- uentured the nine and twentieth of this moneth to sallie out againe, but with like fortune as be- fore, leauing foure score of their men behind them, hauing slaine but siue of the Christians.

Now had the Turks in great wants by the space of a moneth right worthily defended STRIGONIVM, expecting still for reliefe. At length newes was brought into the campe, That the Bassa of Bvda with twentie thousand men was coming to raise the siege: who the second of August came accordingly, and with his armie encamped within foure miles of the Christians: lying so nigh, certaine of the Turkes horsemen seeking after bootie, came very neere vnto the campe of the Christians, and out of the pastures, euen vnder their noses, carried away some few F. horses: against these desperat aduenturers certaine troupes of the Hungarian and Germane horsemen issuing out, had with them an hot skirmish: but the Turkes of purpose retiring as men overcharged, and the Christians still following on, had at length drawne them vnto the place where diuers other troupes of the Turkes lay in ambush for them, who now starting forth on every side, hardly charged them. The Hungarian light horsemen well acquainted with such skirmishes, seeing the danger, presently fled and left the Germans to themselves; who for a while valiantly encountered their enemies, but oppressed with multitude, were glad at last to flee also. In this skirmish of the Christians were lost and grievously wounded about an hundred. The Turkes encouraged with this so prosperous a beginning, came on the next day with all their armie, being before resolved by plaine force to open themselves a way into the citie, and so to relieue the besieged. Of all these things was not the Countie ignorant, as thereof forewarned by the Bassa's letters before deliuered vnto him, and had therefore with his armie strongly belayed all the wayes vnto the citie: neuertheless the enemy came still on betweene the hills S. Thomas and S. George, and nere vnto the suburbs called the Rascian citie, put themselves in order of battell, as did also the Christians, giuing the enemy leaue to come euen to their trenches. In the meane time the lord Palfi with his Hungarian horsemen, fetching a compass about the hill on the one side, and the lord Swartzenburg with his horsemen on the other, had so enclosed the Turkes be- hind, as that they could not without great danger retire. Both armies orderly raunged, and the signall of battell giuen, the Turkes hauing before without any great harme done discharged seenteene field peeces, came on after their wonted manner with a most hideous crie, and at the first onset with their Turkie arrowes, as with a thicke shower, darkened the skie: when on the other side the Germane and Wallon horsemen with their petronels sent their deadly shot as thicke as haile amongst them againe; and the men at armes after them taught the Turks to their cost, how vnfit their light and halfe naked horsemen were in a set battell to meet with men so well appointed: in a trice but not without great slaughter the battell was brought to the sword, and to be tried by true valour: There was to be heard a crie heauens high, the thundering artillerie both great and small, the clattering armour, the glistering weapons, the neighing of the horses, the crying of the wounded, the heauie gronings of the dying, with the noise of the trumpets drums and other warlike instruments, made deafe the eares of the hearers, presenting vnto them nothing but horror and euen present death. It was a most miserable fight to see so many men in so short time flaine: for the battell had yet scarcely endured halfe an houre, when many thou- sands of the Turks lay dead vpon the ground, and the rest seeing the victorie encline to the Christians, betooke themselves to flight, leauing behind them their great ordinance and whatsoever els they brought for the reliefe of the besieged: whom so flying, the lord Palfi and Swartzenburg (who had before taken the straits whereby they were to passe betweene the mountaines) so receiued with their steele horsemen, that of them that came that way, few escaped. The Bassa him- selfe, who stood vpon the hill, seeing the discomfiture of his armie, fled also himselfe: the Bassa of NATOLIA with about an hundred Turkes moe by good fortune got into STRIGONIUM. The number of the Turks flaine in this battell was great, and is of diuers diuersly reported, some saying that there was flaine fourteene thousand; and some, fewer. Besides them that were slaine, many were also taken, and some of them men of great name and place. There were also taken seuen and twentie ensignes, with a multitude of cammels, asses, and mules, laded with mony, shot, powder, and other necessarie prouision: all which, brought thither for the reliefe of the besieged, became a prey vnto the Christians. In the heat of this battell they of the citie fallying out, had entred a fort of the Christians vpon the riuer side, but were againe presently driuen out, and with losse enforced againe to retire. After this victorie the countie sent certaine companies of the Hungarian and Germane horsemen with fiftie hundred waggons to the enemies campe, not farre off in the mountaines; who comming thither, found it vnterly forsaken by the enemy, but well stored with all manner of necessarie prouision, which they carried all away, together with six hundred tents, many whereof were lined with damaske, sattin, and other silke, richly embrode- red or layed with gold lace or twist. The Bassa's rich tent taken by the colonell of the horsemen, was afterwards by him giuen vnto the Countie, as was also the plate and money there found, all which he deuided among the souldiours according to their deserts. In the Turks campe were also found certaine heads of the Christians, with the dead bodie of the lord Brandenstein, slaine in the conflict but the day before; which the Christians caried away with them into the campe, and there honourably buried them. Those that remained of the Turks armie, hid themselves in the mountaines and woods, and so holpen by the darkenesse of the night, made best shift for them- selves that they could. The Bassa himselfe accompanied but with twentie horse, came to BUDA about midnight, and by his comming filled the citie with great heauinesse, every man lamenting

A his lost friends. The Hungarian Heijons best acquainted with the country, pricking vp and downe the mountaines and by waies, for certaine daies after the battell, brought in daily into the campe such prisoners as they tooke, or else the heads of such Turkes as they flew. Of this so no- table a victorie, the Countie by a speedie messenger, certified the Archduke at VIENNA, who rewarded him for his good newes with a chaine worth fiftie hundred ducats, and presently dau- sed the song of thanksgiving to be sung in the Church of the Augustine Friers, and afterward in all the churches of the citie. The Countie also to graffe the emperours sent him by the lord Chalon his nephew vnto PARIS, two of the chiefe prisoners taken in the late battell, with foure horsemen: Guidons cunningly made of horse haires, such as are commonly learned before the greatest commanders of the Turks armies, and fourteene other ensignes of the Turks, with four- teene most goodly horses of the Turks for a present.

B The next day after this battell, the Countie sent the lord Palfi with an interpreter vnto the ci- tie, to demand it to be yeilded: who hauing audience, declared vnto the Turkes in what dan- ger they were, that the helpe they looked for was now quite ouerthrowne, new reliefe could not but in long time be sent vnto them; and that therefore it should be good for them, whilst yet they might, to be well aduised, and besime to bethinke themselves of yeielding: vp the citie, least happily when they would, it then would not be accepted: promising to intreat with the Gene- rall, that they might in safetie depart, and with fiftie shallop be brought vnto such place of safetie as were convenient. Whereunto the besieged Turkes answered, That the Christians had now fiftie weekes lien at the siege, and must yet lie three weekes longer; and that whereas C of late some few of their friends came to haue reiected them, and had failed therein; there was yet an hundred thousand moe to come after them, who if they should not be able to performe that they came for, yet that they would not for that deliuer or forsake the citie, before they were readie to be drawne out of it by the heeles, and that yet they would then take three daies to re- solve thereupon.

Now had the Christians with long and continuall batterie long beaten both the vpper and the lower towne, which batterie they now maintained with greater furie than at any time from the beginning of the siege: and within the citie their wants increased daily, hauing nothing left to liue vpon but a little wheat and barley, with some horseflesh vnto whom thus distressed, the lord Palfi by the commandement of the Countie (to trie what confidence they yet had in them- selves) the ninth of August, sent two Gentlemen to the citie, to doe a message from him to the Gouernour. Who aduertised thereof, being a verie aged and courteous man, accompanied with the Aga of the Ianizaries, came to the wals to heare what they had to say; where one of the said gentlemen in few words deliuered him this short message.

My most gracious Lord the lord Palfi, most worthe Gouernour, greeteth thee well, and knowing thee to be a captaine both valiant and wise, and one that hath alwaies courteously used such as haue by the Lord Palfi as the Gouernour of Strigonium.
fallen into thy hands, hath compassion of thy desperat obstinacie: and therefore, whereas thou art to looke or hope for nothing else but present death and destruction; be as thy neighbour and a lover of thy vertues, aduise and exhorteth thee, if thou wilt saue thy selfe and thine from most vndoub- ted and imminent death and utter confusion, without delay to deliuer up this citie, which thou canst

E not longer hold.

Vnto whom the old Gouernour thus without stay courteously answered.
Thy speech my friend, and thy masters aduise are vnto me both vaine. Tell the lord Palfi in my These words an-name, that I cannot pleasure him with the least stone in this citie. One foot I haue already in the swere of the old Gouernour to the Graue, and will with honour carrie these my grate haire into the same: and am yet comforted with a message sent him most certaine and vndoubted hope, that my most dread and mightie Soueraigne, and my lord Sinan Bassa will not forsake me: yea and that if they should write vnto me, that they could find no meanes or way to relieue me (which I am sure they can) yet would I well, and at leisure consider, whether it were fit for me to deliuer up this citie or not: seeing that of the defense thereof, dependeth all mine honour and credit. Besides that, what reward they haue on both sides, that so easily deliuer over the cities they haue in charge, all the world doth see.

F With this answer he sent them away. All this while the Aga of the Ianizaries standing by, spoke not one word, but sighing in silence and grinding his teeth, declared by his countenance his indignation and inward griefe.

The lower towne being with long and continuall batterie made faultable, was by the Christians the thirteenth of August, in three diuers places at once assaulted. The Bavarians were by lot to giue the first charge, who in the performing thereof, beginning to faint (for that they were notably repulsed by the Turks) but seconded by them of R E I T N A V V and S V A V I A, pluckt downe a great palifado, filled the ditches, remoued whatsoever stood in their way, and so long fought with the Turks in the breaches, that by the coming in of the Marquesse of B V R G A V V with six ensignes of fresh men, they preuailed vpon the enimie, and so altogether brake into the towne. In the midst of this dangerous fight was the Marquesse himselfe, who both with his presence and cheerfull speech so encouraged his souldiors, that they as men fearing no perill, ran headlong into all danger vntill they had entred the towne: There might a man haue heard a most miserable crye, especially of women and children throughout the citie; when as the Christians breaking in on euerie side slew whosoever came in their way, without respect of age or sex, sparing neither women great with child, neither the little children hanging at their mothers breasts. Yet did not all that were entred, so much attend the present execution, as some of them did the spoile and prey; and especially the Hungarians, vnto whom all was good bootie, euen the vertie hinges of the doores and windowes: whereby many escaped into the castle and vpper towne with the Bassa and Alis-Beg the old Gouverneur. The Christians had not many houres possessed the towne, but that diuers fires began to breake out in diuers places, but by what meanes was not at the first knowne. At last it was found out, that the Turks doubting the losse of the towne, had before where they thought best left gunpowder, which taking fire by matches left burning for that purpose, should at a certaine time set all on fire: by which meanes many most horrible fires were raised in the towne, which consumed many goodly buildings and other things which might haue stood the Christians in great stead, and could hardly be in a day or two quenched.

Countie Mans-feld dieth as Ko-mara.

This so joyfull a victorie saw not he, by whose good direction next vnder God it was gained, the worthy Countie: for he a few daies before being fallen sicke of a feauer, taken by drinking too much cold drinke in his heat, with immoderat paines taking in the late battell, and so afterwards falling into a great flux with a feauer, was by the counsell of his physicians (for the better recouering of his health) remoued to K O M A R A, as a place of more quietnesse: hauing before his departure sent for the Archduke to come vnto the campe, and for Blankemier into B A V A R I A to supply his owne rounge. But his disease still encreasing, became at last desperat, so that the physicians themselves now dispaired of his health. Yet lying thus drawing towards his end, he almost euerie houre enquired how the armie did, and whether the citie were yet taken, or what hope there was of the taking thereof. But when it was told him a little before his death, that the lower towne was woon, he thereat greatly rejoyced, and the next day being the fourteenth of August towards night quietly departed this world, to the great losse of the Christian commonweale, and the exceeding griefe of the whole armie. A man euen from his childhood brought vp in armes, of stature great, but of courage greater, and painfull about measure, not the least cause of his vntimely death. All the time of this siege he tooke little rest either by day or night, scarce so much as to lie downe vpon his bed in two or three nights together. The little meat he did eat, he most part eat it standing or walking, yea and sometimes on horsebacke: he was a most seuerer obseruer of martiall discipline, which caused him to be of his souldiors both beloued and feared. His bowels were with due solemnitie buried at K O M A R A where he died, but his bodie was brought backe againe to L V X E N B V R G, there to be honourably entred with his aunccestours.

About this time Theodore the Great duke of M V S C O V I A, hearing of the warres betwixt the emperour and the Turke, sent two embassadours with letters and presents to the emperour: which embassadours comming to P R A G E the sixteenth of August, accompanied with two hundred and fiftie horse, were there by the emperours appointment, honourably receiued and entertained. And afterward hauing audience, first deliuered the letters of credence from the Great duke, reported to haue been of this purport.

The coppie of the great dukers letters vnto the

Your Maieslie hath sent vnto vs your embassadour Nicholas W atkotsie, requesting our brotherly aid against the hereditarie enimie of all Christianitie, the Turkish Sultan. Wherefore we also desiring to liue with you our deare and welbeloued brother in all perpetuall amitie and friendship, send vnto you by our faithfull counsellor and seruant Michael Iwanowitz and Iohn Sohnie, aid out of our treasure against the said enimie: vnto whom we haue also giuen other things in charge to be propounded to your Maieslie, requesting you to giue vnto them in all things full credite. Giuen in the great Court of our power at M V S C O, in the yeare of the world 7103, and from the natiuitie of Christ 1595, in the moneth of Aprill.

What things in particular these embassadours were sent for, was not commonly knowne, but among others it is said, That the Muscouite requested the emperour to send an embassadour vnto the Persian king, to draw him also into the league with them against the Turke: which embassadour should first come into M V S C O V I A, and that way to passe into P E R S I A. The presents which the Great duke sent vnto the emperour were, an hundred and fiftie thousand Florens of gold, great store of most rich furs, and pretious perfumes deemed to be of exceeding valour, two white faulcons, and three leopards aliue. And Iwanowitz the embassadour himselfe, presented vnto the emperour of himselfe, certaine rich Turkie, Persian and Babylonian hangings and carpets, certaine timbers of Sables, with other rich furs no lesse pretious than Sables, so many as eight porters could hardly carrie. These embassadours tarried at P R A G E vntill the seuen and twentieth day of December, and then taking their leaue, returned with the emperours answere to the duke.

But to returne againe vnto S R I G O N I V M. The Christians now possessed of the lower towne, bent their whole batterie vpon the higher towne, where it fortun'd the fourteenth of August that the old Gouverneur Alis-Beg, whilst he was carefully walking from place to place to see where most danger was, had his arme strucke off with a great shot, of which hurt he presently died. He was a man of great grauitie, about the age of eight and twentie yeares, and had of long time notably both gouerned and defended that famous citie, the losse whereof was like enough to haue been vnto him greater griefe than was the losse of his life there. Much about the same time also died the Aga of the Ianizaries, being before mortally wounded. Both the chiefe commanders thus slaine, the Ianizaries with the other souldiors and citicens made choise of the Bassa of N A T O L I A (who as is aforesaid escaped out of the late battell into the citie) for their Gouverneur, who with heauie cheere tooke vpon him that forlorne charge. The Christians not ignorant of the death of these two worthie men, in whose great and approued valour they supposed the chiefe defence of the citie to haue rested, were in good hope that now the rest would the more readily hearken to some good composition; and therefore sent a messenger to demand if they would yet whilst there were some mercie left, yeeld the citie. Who though they had lost their chiefe commanders with the greatest part of the garrison, and were in great wants both of victuals and all things else necessarie for their defence; yet their answere was in few words, That they would hold it out euen to the last man. The greatest cause of which their obstinat resolution, was the strait charge the Bassa of B V D A had giuen them for the defence thereof: besides that, they accounted their citie holy, as woon by their magnificent emperour Solyman, whom the Turkes generally yet haue in a deuout remembrance; and therefore thought it a great impietie to deliuer it vp vnto the Christians. The next day after came Matthias the archduke into the campe; who after he had well viewed the whole armie and the manner of the siege, he called together into his tent the chiefe commanders, namely the Marquesse of B V R G A V V his cousin, John de Medices the Florentine, and the lord Palsi the Hungarian, to consult with them what were farther to be done for the winning of the citie. Shortly after he commanded the citie to be at once in two places assaulted, which was by the V allons and Germanes courageously performed: but such was the valour of the defendants, that when the Christians had done what they could, they were glad at last to giue ouer the assault, and with losse to retire. About this time came the duke of M A N T V A, with the three Counties his brethren to the siege: and now the Turkes began againe to draw together neere vnto B V D A, there to make head for the reliefe of S R I G O N I V M, and to be reuenged of the losse they had there before receiued. Whereof the Archduke hauing intelligence, sent out against them eight thousand chosen souldiors out of the campe, who suddenly setting vpon the Turkes in their campe, before the rising of the Sunne made a great slaughter amongst them, and tooke certaine prisoners,

A Your Maiestie hath sent vnto vs your embassadour Nicholas Warkotfic, requesting our brotherly aid against the hereditarie enemy of all Christianitie, the Turkish Sultan. Wherefore we also desiring to line with you our deare and welbeloued brother in all perpetuall amitie and friendship, send vnto you by our faithfull counsellor and seruant Michael Iwanowitz and John Sohnie, aid out of our treasure against the said enemy: vnto whom we haue also giuen other things in charge to be propounded to your Maiestie, requesting you to giue vnto them in all things full credit. Giuen in the great Court of our power at M V S C O, in the yeare of the world 7103, and from the natinitie of Christ 1595, in the moneth of Aprill.

The copie of the great dukes letters vnto the

What things in particular these embassadours were sent for, was not commonly knowne, but among others it is said, That the Muscouite requested the emperour to send an embassadour vnto the Persian king, to draw him also into the league with them against the Turke: which embassadour should first come into M V S C O V I A, and that way to passe into P E R S I A. The presents which the Great duke sent vnto the emperour were, an hundred and fiftie thousand Florens of gold, great store of most rich furs, and pretious perfumes deemed to be of exceeding valour, two white faulcons, and three leopards alieue. And Iwanowitz the embassadour himselfe, presented vnto the emperour of himselfe, certaine rich Turkie, Persian and Babylonian hangings and carpets, certaine timbers of Sables, with other rich furs no lesse pretious than Sables, so many as eight porters could hardly carrie. These embassadours tarried at P R A G E vntill the seuen and twentieth day of December, and then taking their leaue, returned with the emperours answere to the duke.

C But to returne againe vnto S R I G O N I V M. The Christians now possessed of the lower towne, bent their whole batterie vpon the higher towne, where it fortun'd the fourteenth of August that the old Gouverneur Alis-Beg, whilst he was carefully walking from place to place to see where most danger was, had his arme stricke off with a great shot, of which hurt he presently died. He was a man of great grauitie, about the age of eight and twentie yeares, and had of long time notably both gouerned and defended that famous citie, the losse whereof was like enough to haue been vnto him greater griefe than was the losse of his life there. Much about the same time also died the Aga of the Ianizaries, being before mortally wounded. Both the chiefe commanders thus slaine, the Ianizaries with the other souldiors and citifens made choise of the Bassa of N A T O L I A (who as is aforesaid escaped out of the late battell into the citie) for their Gouverneur, who with heauie cheere tooke vpon him that forlorne charge. The Christians not ignorant of the death of these two worthie men, in whose great and approued valour they supposed the chiefe defence of the citie to haue rested, were in good hope that now the rest would the more readily hearken to some good composition; and therefore sent a messenger to demand if they would yet whilst there were some mercie left, yeeld the citie. Who though they had lost their chiefe commanders with the greatest part of the garrison, and were in great wants both of victuals and all things else necessarie for their defence; yet their answere was in few words, That they would hold it out euen to the last man. The greatest cause of which their obstinat resolution, was the strait charge the Bassa of B V D A had giuen them for the defence thereof: besides that, they accounted their citie holy, as woen by their magnificient emperour Solyman, whom the Turkes generally yet haue in a deuout remembrance; and therefore thought it a great impietie to deliuer it vp vnto the Christians. The next day after came Matthias the arch-duke into the campe; who after he had well viewed the whole armie and the manner of the siege, he called together into his tent the chiefe commanders, namely the Marquesse of B V R G A V V his cousin, John de Medices the Florentine, and the lord Palsi the Hungarian, to consult with them what were farther to be done for the winning of the citie. Shortly after he commanded the citie to be at once in two places assaulted, which was by the Wallons and Germanes courageously performed: but such was the valour of the defendants, that when the Christians had done what they could, they were glad at last to giue ouer the assault, and with losse to retire. About this time came the duke of M A N T V A, with the three Counties his brethren to the siege: and now the Turkes began againe to draw together neere vnto B V D A, there to make head for the reliefe of S R I G O N I V M, and to be reuenged of the losse they had theretofore receiued. Whereof the Archduke hauing intelligence, sent out against them eight thousand chosen souldiors out of the campe, who suddenly setting vpon the Turkes in their campe, before the rising of the Sunne made a great slaughter amongst them, and tooke certaine prisoners, ners, of whom the Sanzacke of COPAN was one: and so with victorie returned to the siege.

The besieged Turkes in STRONG vnderstanding of this ouerthrow of their friends, from whom they expected most speedie reliefe, and beside the terror of the continuall batterie and still feared assaults, pinched also with extreame wants of all things, began now to faint. Wherefore the Bassa with the other capitaines, overcome with the aforesaid difficulties, and the generall outcrie of the fearfull people, resolued with one consent to come now to parley, and vpon reasonable conditions to yeeld vp the citie: whereupon a flag of truce was set vp, and parley craved. Which granted, the Archduke after the going downe of the Sunne came into the lower towne, where nine of the Turkes attended his coming: who entering into parley, required that they might vnder safe conuoy with bag and baggage depart, and so leaue him the citie: which the Archduke would not by any meanes agree vnto. At length with much entreatie, they obtained that they might vpon the same conditions depart that the Christians did at RAB; with their scimitars by their sides, and so much of their goods as they could carrie vpon their backs, vnto such ships as were to be appointed for the carriage of them to BVD A. For the performance whereof, hostages were on both sides giuen: and so the next day (being the second of September) they began to come out of the citie, moe in number than either the prisoners taken in the time of the siege had confessed, or the Christians had thought. Thirtie ships were appointed for the conuaying of them downe the riuier to BVD A, which not fulfilling, many of them tarried in the citie vntill the next day, at which time the Bassa with the sicke and wounded sayled to BVD A, the prisoners and pledges on both sides being before faithfully deliuered. Thus by the goodnesse of God and the good conduct of a few valiants Christians, was STRIGONIVM the Metropolitall citie of HUNGARIE, after it had 52 yeares groaned vnder the miserable yoke of the Turkish feruitude, againe restored vnto the Christian common-weale: which the Christians forthwith repaired and new fortified, as was thought best for the defence thereof against the enemye. All which being done, about the middelt of this moneth the Archduke sent eightene thousand to besiege VICGRAD, otherwise called PLINDENBURG, a strong castle of the Turks vpon the riuier betweene STRIGONIVM and BVD A, which castle they tooke. Vvhich when they of BVD A vnderstood, they were stricken with such a feare, that many of the better sort were readie to forsake the citie, inso much, that the Bassa to stay their flight, was glad to commaund the gates of the citie to be shut vpon them, and no man suffered to passe out. This good successe of the Christians in these wars, caused great reioycing to be made in most parts of Christendome.

All this while the Christians were thus busied at the siege of STRIGONIVM, the Transylvanian prince was not idle, but in diuers places did the Turks exceeding much harme; so that now his name began to be dreadfull vnto them. It fortuned that the same day that the Countie Mansfelt departed at KOMARA, that the prince at ALBA IVLIA with great solemnitie married Maria Christina, the daughter of the late Archduke Gharles the sonne of the emperor Ferdinand, her other sister Anna being before married vnto Sigismund, now king of POLONIA: for so it was agreed for the more assurance of the league betweene the emperor and him, that he should take his wife out of the house of AUSTRIA, which he now did. Of this solemnitie the Turks (his euill neighbors) hauing intelligence, assembling to the number of 30000 or more, thought as vnto welcome guests to haue come vnbidden or vlooked for thereunto: but the vigilant prince vnderstanding of their comming, provided for their entertainment accordingly, and setting his pleasures for a while apart, and comming vpon them when they least looked for him, in a great battell ouerthrew them, and slew most part of them, carrying away with him as a triumphant victour, the whole spoile of his enemies.

About the same time the Transylvanians also besieged FAGIAT, a towne holden by the Turkes, not farre from TEMESVVAR; where after they had lien twelue daies, they of the towne despairing to be able long to hold out, came to parley, and couenanted to depart with bag and baggage, began to go out of the towne. But in their departure, vnderstanding that the Bassa of TEMESVVAR with the Sanzacks of LIPPA and IENNE were comming to their reliefe, they that were yet in the towne began to find delaies, and they that were already gone out began to returne. Wherewith the Transylvanians much moued, by plaine force entred the towne, and put them all to the sword: and afterward turning vpon the Bassa, who with ten thousand Turks and certaine field pieces was comming to haue relieued the town, had with them a cruell bartell; wherein most part of the Turkes fell with small losse of the Transylvanians: who so eagerly pur-

A sued the victorie, that the Bassa himselſe had much adoe with ſiue hundred others to eſcape. The two Sanzackes, with diuers others of good place, were taken and ſent priſoners to the prince. Not long after, about the latter end of Auguſt the Tranſylvanians alſo beſieged LIPPA, a famous citie of HUNGARY, ſtanding vpon the riuer Maracz, not farre from THESSVVAR, which the Turkes being not able longer to hold, fled into the caſtle: where finding themſelues in no great ſafetie, after three dayes ſiege they came to parle, and ſo yielded, vpon condition that they might in ſafetie depart with ſo much of their goods: as they could themſelues carrie. About which time alſo the Baſſa of BOSNA with ten thouſand Turkes and Tartars went forth to haue againe recovered BABOTSCA, a frontier towne, before taken by the Chriſtians: which the Strians and the reſt of the Chriſtians dwelling thereabouts, betweene the two riuers of Sauus B and Draius, vnderſtanding, conducted by the lords Herbenſtein, Lewcowitz, and Eckenberg, that had the charge of thoſe frontiers, ouertooke the ſaid Turkes and Tartars neere vnto BABOTSCA, fought with them, and in the plaine field ouerthrew them.

Mahomet not a little grieved with the good successe of the Christians in every part of HUNGARIE, and about measure offended with Ferat Bassa his Generall, through whose negligence all or at leastwise most part of this had happened (as he was by the envie of Sinan Bassa perswaded) sent for Ferat home, and in his place sent out Sinan. Of which the great Sultans displeasure Ferat was not ignorant, as forewarned thereof by her that best knew, even the Sultans mother, and advised not to come in fight vntill his peace were made. Who neuerthelesse trusting to his owne innocencie (the comfortable, but most dangerous and weake stay of the great) and doubting not to answer whatsoeuer Sinan should be able to charge him with, came to the Court: where he was by the commandment of Mahomet shortly after strangled, and his goods to the value of five hundred thousand duckats confiscated.

to the value of hue hundred thousand duckats Communicated.

Among all the dangerous enemies of the Christian common-weale, was none at this time more cruell than was Sinan, an Epirot borne, a fishers sonne, of a rough and vnciuile disposition, now about fourescore and three yeares old, euen from his youth brought vp in the warres: and yet (as his moit was) breathing nothing but, Bloud and warre. He had many times fortunately led the huge armies of the Turkish Emperours, Solyman, Selymus, and A-murath, and is now sent by the great Sultan Mahomet, as the fittest man to reduce the late revolted countries of TRANSYLVANIA, VALACHIA, and MOLDAVIA, to their former thral-dome; which he before promised vnto Mahomet, vpon perill of his head to doe. He hauing raised a right puissant armie, by a bridge made of boats (after a moneths labour spent therein) passed ouer the great riuer of Danubius into VALACHIA: of whose comming the Transyl-uanians, with the Valachians and Moldanians, hauing knowledge, had before so shut vp the passages of the countrey, as that he could not without much danger haue farre entered; and were also readie with their vniued forces euen at his first entrance to giue him battell. Which hee not refusing, there began a most mortall and cruell fight, with much bloodshed on both sides. Thrice were the Transyluanians enforced to retire, but still relieved with new supplies, and knowing that they then carried in their armes the welfare of their whole countrey, came on afresh againe, and as hardly charged the Turkes, as they had beene by them charged. Thus with doubtfull fortune and great slaughter was the battell maintained, from the morning vntill E night, victorie with doubtfull wings hovering now ouer the one side, now ouer the other: vntill that at length, the Turkes ouercome by true valour, their battailes being quite disor-dered and broken, were now glad to seeke to saue themselves by flight. In this battaile, being fought the eleuenth of September, besides many thousands of the common souldiours, were a flaine also diuers of great account amongst the Turkes: and amongst the rest Haidar Bassa, a man of them much regarded, was found dead euen in the same place where the battaile was fought. Sinan himselfe, in making too much hast to get ouer the bridge, fell into the deepe mud, and in that generall confusion of his armie, was like ynough there to haue perished: but F as the common prouerbe goeth, Seldome lieth the diuell dead in a dike, the old Veliarde was with much adoe drawne out by them of his guard, and so saued to further mischief. Neuerthe-lesse, the danger was so great, that for certaine daies it was commonly reported, that he was there drowned, most of his owyne people nor as yet certainly knowing what was become of him. Al the poyle of the Turkes became a prey vnto the Christians, as did also their great ordinance, and many of their ensignes; amongst which was one greene one, which they accounted religious, a sacred to their prophet Mahomet, whereunto they in time of their greatest distresse fled as vnto their last refuge: there was taken also all their tents, with great abundance of victuals and other warlike prouision.

The old Bassa thus ouerthrowne, full of griefe, and euen mad for despayre, posted himselfe in all hast to the Court, thinking it better himselfe to make the best of that which was indeed nought, than to haue it made worse than nought by the enuious report of others: and withall to fill the mind of the great Sultan with desire of reuenge; which no man so much longed after, as himselfe: wherein he so discreetly vsed the matter, as that the late losse was easily passed ouer, as receiued by the common chance of warre, or any other occasion els whatsoeuer rather than by any default of his; and new commission giuen him for the raising of another armie for the subduing of the late reuolted countries. In the meane time, to shew his hatred vnto the Christians, and to please the eyes of them of the Court with the noueltie of the sight, he caused an hundred and twelue Christian captiues whom he had in prison at BELGRADE; to be brought in chaines like beasts to CONSTANTINOPL; and so being led through the principall streets of the cite, to the vaine contentment of the citizens, to bee brought to the Court gate for the Sultan to looke vpon and the Courtiers to deride: from whence they were after many vnspokeable indignities conveyed to most miserable and loathsome prisons, there to be fed with the bread of tribulation.

About this time the Turks vnder the command of the Bassa of BOSNA, to the number of almost twentie thousand, made a rode into CROATIA, where they were by the Christians vnder the leading of the lord Eckenberg and Leucowitz ouerthrowne and almost all slaine: the Christians following the chase euen into the Turks frontiers, burnt fiftene of their villages, and tooke the castle of VARINAR: immediately after, their forces encreasing by the comming in of the lord Herbensteine, Gouernour of VALERIA and WINDISMARCHE, and certain other troupes of horsemen out of CARINTHIA and the countries therabouts, they returned the thirteenth of September to besiege PETRINIA, otherwise called PETROVINA; which because they were in hope to take by assault, they euen at their first comming courageously assailed. But after two houres hard fight, finding both greater resistance and more difficultie than they had before supposed to haue found, and that without great ordinance (which could not in short time bee got ouer the mountaines) there was no good to be done, they were glad to giue ouer the assault, and with such losse as they had receiued to returne to SISBO, there to consult further of the matter. But the same night a fugitiue horseman fled from the enemy, came to the campe and told the Christians, That Ruffan Beg Gouernour of PETRINIA was in the late assault wounded in the breast with a small shot, and dead: and that the Turkes in the towne discouraged with his death and the late ouerthrow of their friends in CROATIA, would vpon the first sight of them abandon the towne, if they would but againe returne to besiege it. Vpon which good hope the Christians presently rose, and set forward againe towards PETRINIA: which the Turkes hearing of their comming, had before (as the soldior reported) for feare abandoned. So the Christians without resistance entering the towne, found therein some pillage, but better store of shot and powder: and presently sending forth certaine troupes of horsemen to pursue the flying Turks, tooke diuers of them, and among the rest the late Gouernours lieutenant, whom they brought backe againe into the towne. Thus was PETRINIA againe recovered from the Turkes, to the great quiet and safetie of all that side of the country.

Petrinia taken by the Christians

Sigismund the Transylvanian prince not ignorant with what an enemy he had to doe, either of the mallice of old Sinan, who he knew would not be long before he returned, or yet of the secret practise of the Polonians for the withdrawing of the countrey of MOLDAVIA from him, fought now by all means (as it stood him vpon) to make himselfe so strong as he could against so many stormes arising. It fortuned that euen at the same time the Zaculians (better known by the name of Siculi) in former time a free people, but as then tributaries vnto the Turkes, bordering vpon the Northeast part of TRANSYLVANIA, now wearie of the Turkish thraldome, and seeing the good successe of the prince, and the late reuolted countries their neighbours, offered vnto the prince their seruice; promising of their own charge to maintaine fortie thousand men in the field during his warres with the Turke, and yearly to pay him of euery house a dollar, with a certaine measure of wheat, oates, and barley, after the manner of their owne countrey: and further, That if God should bleffe him with a sonne to succeed him in his gouernment, euery hou-

holder

A soldier should giue vnto him a good fat ox. For all which seruice they craued no more, but that they might as his subjects liue vnder his protection: yet so, as to be gouerned by their owne ancient lawes and customes. Of which their offer the prince accepting, it was forthwith by them proclaimed in their campe, and all the people sworne to the performance of the aforesaid agreements. And hauing at that present but fife and twentie thousand in the field; they without delay sent out their officers to presse out fiftene thousand more, for the filling vp of the promised number of fortie thousand, wherewith they came vnto the prince, who taking a view of his armie, found himselfe to be now fourescore thousand men strong, to welcome the Bassa withall when he should come againe into his countrey.

Now had Sinan with great speed raised an armie of seauentie thousand choice souldiours, amongst whom were many whole bands of the Ianizaries, the strength of the Turkish empire. With which power joynd vnto the reliques of his other broken forces, he thought himselfe strong enough for the subduing of the prince: vnto whom came also afterwards Hassan Bassa, the sonne of the great Bassa Muhamet, one of the Turkes most renowned meir of warre; and Bogdanus the late expelled Vayud of VALACHIA, with many others of great name. With this armie the old Bassa by a bridge, which he with exceeding charge had made of boats, passed ouer the greater river of Danubius at a towne called ZORZA or GIORGO (with vs S. George) in VALACHIA, a great way beneath that place where sometime the emperor Traian built his famous bridge of stone, worthily accounted amongst the rare and wonderfull buildings of the world. From ZORZA he marched with his armie to TERGOVISTA (sometime the Vayud his chiefe citie, but then in the power of the Turkes) where is a notable monastirie, which he conuerted into a castle, fortifying it with deepe trenches and strong bulwarks; and good store of great ordinance, purposing to make that the seat of his warre, vntill he had againe restored those late reuolted countries vnto the Turkish empire, which hee vpon paine of his head had vndertaken to performe. The prince both by messengers and letters vnderstanding of the Bassas arrivall there, and hauing his armie in good readinesse, set forward to meet him and to giue him battell. But being come into VALACHIA, and there encamped, it is reported, that a great Eagle descending from an high rocke thereby, called, The Kings rocke; and hovering ouer the Christian armie, flew about the princes tent, and there lighting, was taken and presented to the prince, who commanded her to bee kept as the presage of his good fortune; holding on still his way, and the fiftenth day of October being come within halfe a dayes march of TERGOVISTA, he vnderstood by two Christians lately escaped from the Turkes, That two dayes before the Turkes hearing of his comming, were stricken with such a generall and sudden feare, that Sinan had much adoe either by faire meanes or by foule to stay the Ianizaries from flight; and that when he had done what he could, yet that certaine companies of them were quite fled and gone. But the truth was, that Sinan seeing the generall feare of his armie, and he himselfe no lesse fearefull than the rest, vpon the princes approach fled with all his armie, leauing behind him for haft his tents; his great ordinance, with much victuals, and other warlike prouision, carrying with him onely such things as were of most value. As for the citie of TERGOVISTA, with the castle which he had made of the monastirie, he committed it to the keeping of Hassan Bassa; and Bogdanus the late Vayud, now become a renegade Turke, with a garrison of foure thousand chosen souldiours, promising within a few daies, if need should be, to relieue them, but fled himselfe in all hast with his armie to BUCARESTA, daies journey from TERGOVISTA. From whence he presently writ backe againe to Hassan Bassa, willing him if he could to defend the castle: but if he should thinke it not possible to be kept against the power of the prince, then betime to forsake it and to shift for himselfe. But these letters being intercepted by the Christians, neuer came to the Bassas hands. Not long after the departing of Sinan, the prince comming to TERGOVISTA, entered the forsaken campe, where he found many tents, with some ordinance, and great store of victuals: & without further delay summoned both the citie and the castle, which for all that were both denied him. But the next day assented, Hassan considering the flight of Sinan, the power of the prince, and withall doubting if need should be to be relieved by Sinan, whom he not without cause suspected not to loue him, was about vpon some reasonable composition to haue yielded vp both the citie and the castle: wherunto the garrison souldiours (being most part of them Ianizaries) would not in any case giue their consent, but stood vpon the defence of the place. Whereupon the prince began furiously to batter both the citie and the castle, and after some few houres batterie by assault tooke both, and put Hassan Bassa taken. to sword the whole garrison: onely Hassan Bassa, as taken with his owne hand, he spared, and two other Sanzackes. Bogdanus the renegade was there slaine among the rest. The Christians had there a rich prey, besides 42 great pieces of ordinance, and good store of all manner of warlike prouision. Hassan thus taken, grieuously complained that Sinan had of a malicious purpose exposed him to so manifest danger, for the grudge he bare vnto his dead father the Visier Muhamet, vpon whom because he could neuer be reuenged, he now by sinister meanes had cunningly performed it vpon his sonne; yet he craued of the prince to bee well vsed, offering for his ranome 100000 Hungarian duckats. Whilist the prince yet thus lay at TARGOVISTA, came thither 4000 Turks, whom Sinan had before his departure thence sent forth to spoyle the countrey and to seeke after prey, thinking to haue there found him still: who now falling into the hands of the Christians, were there all slaine, and 60000 head of cattell recovered, which these Turkes had taken out of VALACHIA and MOLDAVIA, and should by Sinans appointment haue been sent to CONSTANTINOPLE. For VALACHIA and MOLDAVIA doe so abound with come and cattell, that they plentifully serue the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE not onely with come and flesh, but also yearly send at the least 150 ships thither by the black sea, laded with other kind of victuals. Of which so great commodities the Turkes were now deprivied by the reuolt of the afore said countries.

The fruitfulness of Valachia and Moldauia.

Bucaresta taken by the prince.

The prince leauing a strong garrison in TARGOVISTA, set forward with his armie towards BVCARESTA, hoping there to haue found Sinan. But he hearing of the losse of TARGOVISTA, and thinking himselfe in no good safetie at BVCARESTA, fled thence also to ZORZA. The prince comming to BVCARESTA, found it abandoned by the Turkes, and so tooke it without resistance, yet had therein certaine field pieces, with good store of shot and powder left there by Sinan. Hauiug there stayed a while for the manning of the place, he set forwards againe towards ZORZA, and that with such speed, that he ouertooke great numbers of the Turkes, whom he put all to the sword: so that the fields betwixt BVCARESTA and ZORZA, were in many places covered with the dead bodies of the Turkes. Neuerthelesse, he could not make so great hast, marching still in good order, but that the fearefull Bassa disorderly hasting, was about some six houres or more before come to the bridge he had with great charge made ouer the riuer of Danubius, the some whereof you may here see.

The picture of the Bridge made ouer Danubius by Sinan Bassa, Anno 1595.

- Sinan flight ouer Danubius.*
- A Ouer the hithermost part of which bridge (being in length about a mile) was Sinan with the greatest part of his armie (before the coming of the prince) got ouer into an island in the midst of the riuer, wherein he had at his comming ouer, encamped: but doubting now there to stay, with all the speed he could got him ouer the other part of the bridge also vnto the farther side of the riuer, with so many of his men as in so short time possibly could. VVhere to stay the farther pursuit of the prince, he brake the bridge on that side, and set fire vpon it: and thereby cut off also many of his owne men that were not as yet come ouer. VVhom the prince enclosing, forced many of them into the riuer, where they perished: the rest flying into the island, were by the Christians fiercely pursuing of them, either there slaine, or seeking by the other part of the bridge to haue got ouer (whereof the farther end before broken downe by Sinan, and B the hither end toward the island now cut off by the Christians) were together with the bridge carried away by the violence of the riuer, and so altogether perished. Other some of the Christians in the meane time tooke the bridge that leadeth vnto the castle of ZORZA, which standeth compassed about with an arme of Danubius, and being not verie great, was kept by a garrison of seuen hundred select souldiors. Vnto which castle the prince presently laid siege (the resolute souldiors being not by any meanes to be perswaded to yeeld it vp, but to hold it out euen vnto the last man) and after he had fore battered it, by plaine force tooke it, and put to the sword all the garrison souldiors he could lay hands vpon. About an hundred of these Turkes seeing they must needs fall into the power of their enemies, desperately leapt from the top of the castle into the riuer; where not one of them escaped; being all either drowned or slaine with small shot. In C the winning of this castle, two hundred and fiftie of the Christians were lost, and many wounded: but of the Turkes and Tatars, betwixt the eighteenth and the last of October perished about six and twentie thousand. In this castle were taken thirtie nine great pieces, with such store of armour and other warlike prouision, as might haue serued for an whole kingdom: and foure thousand Christians beside women and children, whom Sinan had taken out of VALACHIA, restored to their former libertie. With whom the prince after hee had set all things in order, returned in great triumph to TARGOVISTA, and so afterwards to his pallace at ALBA IULIA, where, as also at CLAVDIOPOLIS and other cities through his dominions, he caused publike prayers with thankesgiving to almightie God, to be deuoutly made for so great a victorie: as did also Michael the Vayvood in VALACHIA, who in all these great warres against the D Turkes was nothing inferiour vnto the Transylvanian himselfe. A greater losse than this the Turkish emperour receiued not at land in many yeares before, being by this so happie and victorious a prince, and the reuolt of these three countries, deprivied of so much territorie, as they had not from the Christians of long time gained. It was by some of them of the better sort of the Turkes that were taken, reported, that Sinan Bassa should oftentimes say, That this young Transylvanian prince had bereft him of all the honour and renowne he had with great trauell got in the course of his long life: and that although he had escaped his hands, yet that he feared he would be the cause for him in these his great yeares, euen in the winding vp of all, to loose his life together with his goods and honour. Now was the Transylvanian princes name (after the ouerthrow of this great Bassa) become dreadfull vnto the Turkes, and also famous through E all Christendome: Which as it hath filled the eares of many with admiration, so happily may the liuely representation of his feature by cunning hand set forth, feed the longing eies of some with delight, and serue in better stead than the rude description of his person.

The Prince returned with victorie to Alba Iulia.

R. KNOLL.

Of Christ thou wast a souldior true, inferiour vnto none:
Thy countries joy and glorie great, vnto the world well knowne.
If worthie vertue, that thee raised about the starrie skie,
With stedfast pace had run the race so well begun by thee.

Whilest this worthie Prince was thus busied in this expedition against Sinan, he caused the castle of IENNA (standing vpon the hie way betweene Temesvvar and Givla) to be besieged by certaine of his captaines appointed to that seruice: in which castle lay one of the Turke Sanzackes with a garrison of seuen hundred Turkes, who much troubled such as passed that way. They now brought to some extremitie, and terrified with the successe of the prince, offered to giue vp the castle, so that as souldiors with their scimitars by their sides they might in safetie be brought to Panoda. Which their offer being accepted of, and they now vpon their way, the Hungarian light horsemen that should haue conducted them (enformed that these Turkes now vnder their charge, had secret intelligence with the Turkes in garrison at Givla and Temesvvar, that they should lie in ambush for them neere Panoda, and so cut them off by the way)

A set vpon these Turkes whom they should haue conducted, and cut the throats of foure hundred of them: and yet still holding on their way, met with these Turkes that lay in ambush for them, whom they after a sharpe skirmish ouerthrew, and hauing slaine a great many of them, put the rest to flight. By the taking of IENNA the waies thereabout were quietted, especially for them of WARADEN. The Sanzacke of IENNA reported, that Mahomet had a little before sent word vnto his Bassaes and Sanzackes in HUNGARIE, that such castles and townes as they thought were not to be defended against the Christians, they should betimes as occasion serued yeeld them vp, or forsake them, so to spare the needlesse losse of his good souldiors: of whom he had with so many townes and strong holds lost no small number this yeare in HUNGARIE. IENNA thus taken, diuers of the richer sort in Temesvvar fearing to be euen presently besieged, sent their wiues and children with their treasure and such other things as they made most reckoning of, out of the citie in wagons to be conuaid vnto places of more safetie: of which wagons, seuentie were by the Christians (lying thereabout in garrison) intercepted, and in them an exceeding rich bootie.

Mahomet hauing this yeare fully purposed the vtter ruine of the Transylvanian prince, and the reducing of the countries of TRANSYLVANIA, MOLDAVIA, and VALACHIA, vnto his obedience by the great Bassa Sinan: had for the better effecting thereof, before provided that the Crimean Tartar (readie still at his call) should with his own people (whereof he hath great store) and certaine bands of the Turkes, at the same time invade MOLDAVIA; and possessing himselfe of his countrey, to place one Sidriake Vayuod in stead of Stephen placed by the prince, and to people the C country with his Tartars in reward of his good seruice (as he said) but indeede to haue them alwaies neere at hand to doe his commands in HUNGARIE, POLONIA, TRANSYLVANIA, or the other countries of the Christians thereunto adioyning. The Tartar according to his appointment came with seuentie thousand Tartars, accompanied with their wiues and children, to haue planted themselves in the countrey, at the verie same time that Sinan came to Tergovista: but being come vpon the frontiers of MOLDAVIA, to haue put in execution what he was by Mahomet commaunded, he found there Zamoschie the great Chancellor of POLONIA, readie with a strong armie to oppose himselfe against him, and to stay his farther passage. Whereupon some light skirmishes passed betweene the Tartars and Polonians: where the Tartars were still put to the worke, with the losse of three thousand of their men. The Tartar Cham with Sidriake D the Vayuod appointed by the Turke, finding themselves, though in number more, yet in strength inferiour vnto the Polonian, and that without his good leaue they could not passe; sent vnto the Chancellor to excuse that was alreadye past, as done without their consent by the insolencie of their souldiors, and to tell him, That their coming was not to fight with him, as hauing expressed commaundement from the great Sultan Mahomet, in no case to disturbe the league betwixt him and the Polonians; but quietly to passe by their frontiers into MOLDAVIA, and there to place Sidriake Vayuod his tributarie in stead of Stephen that now vsurped the place, by the appointment of the Transylvanian: which that they might doe, they craued his leaue as friends to passe. Whereunto the Chancellor answered, That he was come thither by the commaundement of the king, to defend those countries from the inuasion of such as had in them no right: and E that there had of long time been an auncient league betwixt the Polonian kings and the Turkish emperours, vpon certaine conditions which he would for his part keepe inuiolat, with the fauor of the Turkish emperour; yet so, as that the kingdome of POLONIA tooke no harme thereby, and that they might quietly liue by him as their good neighbour: which league he protested not to haue been by him, but by them infringed: as for to giue them passage, he said he could not. Messengers passing thus too and fro, and some parley had, at last certaine articles were agreed vpon, to the reasonable contentment both of the Tartar and of the Turkish Sultan, whose pleasure Sidriake, disappointed thereby of his Vayuodship) as also of the Turkish Sultan, whose pleasure they both seemed to haue in speciall regard: Hereupon the Tartar with his multitude presently returned, leauing the Chancellor to his owne designs. Now was it commonly thought, that the F Chancellor had done the Transylvanian prince great seruice by keeping out of the Tartars, and much honour was by many that saw least spoke of him therefore: But farre was it from his thought to doe the Transylvanian therein any such good, at whose glorie he enuid, and had with the Cardinall and his brother, the princes vncles (but most deadly enemies) secretly conspired for much as in them was, his vtter ruine and ouerthrow: wishing those countries rather in the subjection

tion of the Turke, than to see them so honourably at libertie, gouerned by the prince such is G the force of malicious enuie, the insepable companion of worthe vertue. Which the Chancelour (otherwise a man of great fame and honour) began now openly to pour forth: for presently after the departure of the Tartars, he with all his power passing ouer the river Nijette by Tyros into MOLDAVIA, euen at such time as the prince was going against Sinan at Tergovista, first seized vpon the castle of Chotijm, which he furnished with his owne souldiors, and from thence marching to Zozona, the metropolitall citie of that prouince, beset of the Vayuod, had it yielded vnto him: and so proceeding on, had in short time almost the whole countrey delivered vnto him; Stephen the Vayuod placed by the prince, flying from place to place before him from whom he least feared any such thing, hauing made account of no other enemies but of the Turks and Tartars. Stephen the Vayuod thus driuen out, and the Chancelour possessed of the H country, he presently placed one Hieremias Vayuod in stead of Stephen, to hold that honour of the Polonian king as his soueraigne. Yet neuerthelesse, to satisfie the Turke, he sent a messenger to Sinan Bassa, then but newly come to Tergovista, requesting him not to take it in euill part that he had entred into MOLDAVIA, and there placed a new Vayuod, but in the name of the great Sultan Mahomet, to confirme this his doing, and the Vayuod by him placed, promising the countrey of MOLDAVIA to remaine tributarie still vnto the Sultan, and that this new Vayuod should forthwith pay vnto him what tribute was behind, and from thenceforth a farre greater tribute yearely than had the countrey of MOLDAVIA before. Whereunto the haucie Bassa (then fearing nothing lesse than that which immediatly after happened, to be driuen out of those countries by the prince) proudly answered, That it was not the great Sultans mind, that the Polonians should at all inuade MOLDAVIA: for that beside hee could without their helpe reduce those countries to his obedience, he had giuen that countrey vnto the Tartar, in reward of his good seruice already done in HUNGARIE and other places; whose subjects the Tartars would ere long be readie with their wiues and children to take possession thereof. Neuerthelesse the Chancelor proceeded to defend the new Vayuod by him placed: which was no great matter for him to do, Sinan the Turks champion (as is before declared) being presently after ouerthrowne, and driuen quite out of those countries by the prince. Whose he had not then gained the victory, the Chancelour had not now holden MOLDAVIA; but the Turke; whose quarrell he seemed rather to fauour, than the princes. The Chancelour to colour this his inuasion, pretended, That the countrey of MOLDAVIA did of auncient right belong vnto the kingdom of POLONIA: which the K Transylvanians tooke to be no other but meere and open wrong. This supposed title, such as it was, the Chancelor had so fashioned out vnto the king and the states of that kingdom, that they referred it to his discretion to inuade the countrey, and remoouing the Vayuod placed by the prince, to place another in his stead: and the rather to persuaide them, laboured by many forced reasons to shew the power of the Transylvanian prince to be so far inferiour vnto the Turks, that it was to be feared he should at length be thrust out of all his dominions, and so they together with MOLDAVIA become subject to the Turke. Which if it should so come to passe, then should the Polonians haue an vnrutlie and troublesome neighbour. And that therefore it were better that MOLDAVIA were possessed by them that were better able to defend it than was he, that so the Turke might be kept farther off from POLONIA. Which occasion he said was not longer to be delaied, but now betime to be laid hold vpon: persuaading himselfe to find such grace and fauor with the Turkish emperor, as that he should be therewith right well contented: which was like ynough for a time to be, for that the Transylvanian should thereby be much weakened. By these and such like reasons, framed to serue his owne turne, the Chancelour so preuailed with the king and the states of the kingdom, that he receiued from them (as I said) full authoritie to proceed in the matter, as he did, and as is before declared, to the great trouble of the prince, and benefit of the Turke: the late chosen Vayuod not long after opening a way in three places for the Tartars into TRANSYLVANIA, one by the countrey of SICVLIA, another by the way that leadeth to ALBA IULIA, and the third by VALACHIA.

The late chosen Vayuod openeth three waies vnto the Turkes and Tartars into Transylvania.

The Transylvanian prince seeing the countrey of MOLDAVIA by the practise of the Chancelour thus taken from him, and disiectured from the other vniued prouinces; to the great weakening of his state, after the flight of Sinan sent certaine companies both of horse and foot to Stephen the late Vayuod, but now driuen out by the Polonians; to prooue if happily he could by that meanes driue out the Polonians againe, and recouer his former dignities: With this aid sent from

A from the prince and others that fauoured his quarrell, he joynd a bloudie battell with the Polonians: but being therein by them ouercome and taken, and for a space kept (as the prince feared, to haue beene deliuered vnto the Turke) he was by them (as is reported) cruelly afterwards put to death.

This foule dealing of the Polonian in MOLDAVIA much grieued many good Christians, as tending to the generall hurt of the Christian commonweale. For which cause the Emperour by his embassadours sent for that purpose vnto the Polonian king, sought to persuaide him to desist from such inuasion of the Transylvanian prince by his Chancelour, as nothing standing with his honour; and that some good reconciliation might be made betweene the prince and the Cardinal Bator and his brother, the princes vnclcs, authors of all these troubles. To which purpose also B to the Pope sent a messenger with like instructions and letters vnto the king, persuaiding him, not so to prosecute his warres against the prince, but to turne his thoughts vnto a more peaceable and Christianlike course, especially with him with whom he was so neere linked in mariage. To the like effect he writ also vnto the Cardinal Bator, and after many graue admonitions peremptorily cited him to ROME. But for as much as the proceedings of the Polonian against the prince are more plainly to be gathered by the Popes letters vnto the king, it shall not I hope be mistaken, if I here set them downe thus as I find them by others reported.

Pope Clement the eight to our best beloued sonne in Christ, Sigismund, by the grace of God king of POLONIA, with the benediction Apostolicall sendeth greeting. By how much greater affection C of fatherly loue we embrace your maiestie in the Lord, so much the more seruenly we wish all your actions to be adorned with the greatest commendation of true godlinesse and wisdom, both before God and men: Whereof it proceedeth, that we are so much the more vehemently and grievously moved, if we heare any such thing of you, as may seeme not agreeable to your vertue and approved zeale toward the Catholike religion, or tending to the obscuring of the glorie of your name, as is now brought vnto vs concerning the affaires of MOLDAVIA; whereof not without great griefe we wrote vnto you. And to rehearse things a little before past: with what earnestnesse and seruencie dealt I with you, that for Gods cause, and the defence of the health and libertie of the Christian commonweale against the tyrannie of the Turkes, you would combine your selfe with our most dearly beloued sonne Rodolph the Emperour, and diuers other Christian princes? and that you should not let slip so notable an occasion, so worthily to deserue of God, of the Catholike faith, and of the Christian commonweale in general? And albeit we then thought, as well for many your owne priuat respects, as also of your kingdomes, That you were to be borne withall and excused if you did not now openly descend into this confederation of the Christian princes against the most mortall and common enemy, neither apertly ioine your forces, or giue aid for the represseing of his insolencie; yet we alwayes assured our selues, that no let should in any case proceed from you, whereby either the Emperour or the other Christian princes should be the rather hindered, iustly to prosecute their iniuries, or to cast off from their neckes the heauie yoke of the most cruell tyrant: whose desire of soueraignie is not comprised within the compassse of any bounds. But that you should in fauour of the Turkes impugn the Catholike princes and defenders of the Christian faith, and so ioine hands with the enemies of the Crosse of Christ, as that by your helpe their force and furie should be encreased, and ours not only weakened, but in the very course of victorie hindered, and cast into most grievous perils; this we haue not onely not thought of you, but not so much as once suspected: yea and can now scarce be persuaaded to beleene those things to be done by you, which are reported vnto vs as most true and vndoubted. For the report goeth, That you hauing intelligence with the Turkes and Tartars, haue with them conspired, and namely against our beloued sonne Sigismund, prince of TRANSYLVANIA, who with inuincible courage fighteth the battels of the Lord: and lest he should be able to abate the force and attempts of the most proud enemy (which by the singular mercie of God he hath hitherto aboue his owne power performed) but rather be enforced much to feare his owne estate, a new Vayuod and Prince as it were by a triumphant authoritie and compact to be placed in MOLDAVIA, and him by the Turkes, you, and the Tartars together, to be made gouernour of that countrey. Which vnto vs seemed so new and so strange, and contrarie to the good opinion we had alwayes conceived of you, yea and so vnbecoming your zeale and wisdom, that for griefe and admiration I had almost cried out with the Prophet, You heauens be amazed at this, &c. you gates thereof be you exceedingly heauie. For what could be suspected or imagined farther from the expectation of vs and all good men, or more incredible, than that Sigismund

the most religious king of POLONIA and SWEDEN, who had alwaies professed himselfe a most earnest defender of the Catholike religion, who was readie euen with his owne blood to redeeme the victorie of the Christians, and glorie of the Crosse, against the most wicked enemies of the same, to be upon the sudden become so unlike unto himselfe? and (so much as in him was) to cut off the hope and happy successe of that religious warre, and to doe harme to a Christian and Catholike prince, not to refuse to ioyne in league and friendship, euen with the most barbarous nations and the Tartars, the perpetuall enemies of himselfe, and of the kingdome of POLONIA. For which causes our mind is tormented with such bitternesse of griefe, that we could not but by speedie messenger write unto you concerning this matter, that hereby you might the sooner see the greatnesse of our griefe: and wee also without delay might signifie unto you, what our fatherly loue towards you requesteth in so important a matter. For happily wee will send one euen of purpose to you concerning this cause, the care whereof grieueth vs more than can well be expressed. Wherefore most dearly beloued sonne, we exhort you, and in the most effectuall manner we can, aduise you, and beseech you in the Lord more attentively to consider what great displeasure both of God and man this your action and resolution may incurre, what a staine it may bring unto your crowne and dignitie. For beleue vs, that are to you in stead of a father in Christ, who loue you not fainedly, but faithfully, and in deed; who wish for your glorie in this world, and your eternall felicitie in the world to come: beleue vs (I say) this doth much blemish your fame with all Christian kings and princes; all men take it in euill part, and detest it as a thing monstrous, that it should by your meanes be wrought, that the Christian affaires should not prosper, that an hericall prince, who hath vowed himselfe for Christ and his countrey, should not haue prosperous successe in this so religious and necessarie a war against the Infidels, Turkes, and Tartars, no lesse yours, or peraduenture also more yours, and other Christian princes enemies, than his. But what do we say, you to binder the proceedings of the Transylvanian prince, this were happily but a small matter: nay verely, by this means not only a Christian and Catholike prince, and valiant champion of the Christian faith (a vertue both admirable and amiable in the very enemy) but your owne brother in law, bound unto you with so many bonds of affinitie, whose children shall be as it were your childrens brethren, is by this meanes brought into great danger, and exposed unto the furie of the most mercilesse Turkes. What do you then my most dearly beloued sonne? Beware that all men, both now liuing, and hereafter to come, condemne you not of the greatest inhumanitie: But beware yet more, that you seeme not ingratefull not onely to your owne nigh kinsman, but to God himselfe, who hath bountifully blessed you with two great kingdomes, and so many good things: and that you prouoke not him to wrath against your selfe, that reiecteth and confoundeth all euill and wicked deuires: and that this mischiefe that you haue brought upon your brother, by the iust iudgement of God redound not to the greatest destruction of you and your kingdome, which he in mercie forbid. Doe you thinke, that the Transylvanian being overcome, you shall in safetie liue from the trecherie of the Turke? Do you not know him to be a faithlesse man, which meashureth all things by his owne profit, which keepeth faith with none; but as standeth with his owne commoditie, who with an insatiable desire gapeth after euery kingdome, nay thirsteth after the destruction of all Christendome? Thinke also my sonne what wrong you shall doe unto the Emperour your cousin, out of whose imperiall blood you haue begotten sonnes and beires, and by the grace of God shall moe, but also our dignitie, and the dignitie of this Apostolicall seat, which you haue alwaies so deuoutly honoured, is thereby hurt, and your most deare mother (which we know you of all other least would) the Romane Church is offended, which for the maintenance of this sacred warre is at great and wonderfull charges: and our forces, which by you ought to haue beene renewed and increased, being in so unfit a time by these stirres in MOLDAVIA disordered and diminished, and the enemies on the contrarie part increased and strengthened, into what danger and distresse may both our armie of the Church and the Emperours fall? And withall, how greatly all the manner and managing of this whole warre is thereby confounded, there is no man that seeth not. And this moreouer, which no little concerneth the dignitie of vs and of this holy See, we haue undertaken and certainly promised to our most dearly beloued sonnes Rodolph and Sigismund, that your royall maiestie should not in any thing hinder or hurt their affaires: neither did we herofore assure them upon a light occasion, but moved with great reason, not onely for that we deservedly ought so to promise of you in so just a cause, but also for that it was so vnto vs plainly and expressly written by the reuerend father, the Bishop of S. Seuerus, our Apostolicall Nuncio unto you, whom we know to be both vnto vs faithful, and to you dutifull: neither can we by any meanes doubt thereof, because he hath writ vnto vs concerning so weightie a matter, that he receiued it euen from your owne mouth. Which things so standing, seeing

A seeing you of your selfe see the manifold absurdities of this fact on euerie side, not to speake of the truthfulness therof: we request you againe, yea and oftentimes, forthwith to apply the necessarie remedies to these hurts. The Transylvanian prince your brother in law, deuoted to your selfe, and desirous of your fauour, either protect with your defence, or at leastwise hurt him not: yea hurt not the whole state of the Christian common-weale, and relieue not by any meanes the quarrell of the enemies of Christ. If you haue any controuersie with the prince Sigismund, or desire of him any thing, referre it vnto us, that is to say, vnto your most louing father: you know your affaires to be of vs fauoured, and we hope by the power of God that it may easily come to passe that some convenient meanes may be found whereby peace and quietnesse may be conserved betwixt you, and good vnitie grow betwixt you two brethren our sons, and so all the root of bitternesse and displeasure to be utterly pluckt out of your minds. This haue I writ vnto you my sonne, frankly and from a sincere heart, though truly much grieved, because we loue you, and are much carefull of your honour and good: Shew you againe in deed that you take it so, as written from your father; and that you altogether preferre our fatherly and wholesome exhortations before the sinister persuasions of others. Further concerning these matters, you shall vnderstand by the same bishop our Nuncio now with you, to whom you may (as you haue done) giue credit in all things as to our selfe.

These letters dated from ROMA the 8. day of Nouember, were deliuered to the king in December, with others to the Cardinal and Chancellor, whom the Pope sharply reprobued as the authors and contriuer of all these mischiefs.

C The Tartar Cham before stirred vp by the Turkish emperour Mahomet, for the inuasion of MOLDAVIA (as is already before declared) about this time sent his embassadour also vnto the Polonian king, for the confirmation of such articles as he had before agreed vpon with the Chancellor: which because they manifestly declare the ground and purpose of his intended expedition into MOLDAVIA, with the foule collusion of the Chancellor with the Turkes and Tartars against the Transylvanian prince, I thought it not amisse or from our purpose (for the more manifestation of that which is already said) here to set them downe, as they are translated out of the Tartar language.

Cham Kazikiery vnto the king of POLONIA and SWEDEN our brother, one of the great lords among the Christians, humbly boweth his head. First we signifie vnto you, that Aaron Palatine of MOLDAVIA was a forsworne traitour; who hauing gathered a power of the Valachians, and ioyning vnto him the Polonian Cossacks, spoiled the territories of the great Sultan. But afterward dissenting on arising among them, the Hungarian Cossacks liuing in VALACHIA sent Aaron in bonds vnto the king of VIENNA: after him followed another traitour called Rozwan, who also hauing raised certaine companies of souldiours, began in like manner to forrage the countries of the Turkish emperour thereabout: which as soone as he had knowledge of, he writ vnto me his brother, That I should with all possible speed go into VALACHIA to chastise these rebels, to burne their houses and towns; and hauing with the edge of the sword slaine their men, to carrie away with me their wiues and children into captiuitie. Hauing this in charge, I the great Cham of the great territorie of the great Horde Katyk-tety, with my brother Letikerry Galga, and other my brethren and counsellors, warlike and valiant captaines and Murzas; mounting my horse, came with mine armie into VALACHIA vnto the riuer Prut, where it meeteth with another riuer called Cokoza: here we chanced vpon a faithfull seruitour of yours, our brother the Chancellor, who was also come a little before vs into VALACHIA, with whom yours, our brother the Chancellor, who was also come a little before vs into VALACHIA, with whom after some light contention when we began to be more tractable, he declared vnto vs, that he was of purpose come into VALACHIA to place there a new Payuod, which (as he said) of ancient right belonged vnto the Polonians; without any wrong or preiudice therein to be done to the covenants and league they had with the emperour of the Turkes; and farther that his desire was, that one Hieremias whom he had appointed Payuod, might haue the commaund of that prouince: and that the auncient amitie, such as was in the time of Sultan Solymán and Cham Dawlethger, might be faithfully kept. Which when I had for my part faithfully sworn to doe, and he likewise had caused the same to be done by such of his as he had therefore sent vnto me, we decreed together, that the Cossacks on the farther side of Nijester (disordered and rebellious men) should be utterly rooted out, that they should not hereafter doe any harme in the territories of the great Sultan: and that the presents usually sent vnto us of long, euen since the time of Sultan Solymán, should no more be detained, nor any harmes be hereafter therewith, if we should haue preferred the health and welfare of our country (whereunto all good men owe all they haue) before other mens profits? But now these things were so done, as that it was moste provided for the good of the neighbour Christian yeas and happily not the least for ours, who for the same slander this kingdome vnto your Holinesse, wherof Sinan Bassa was by this means repressed, who whilst he feared to be shut up in the straits by our arme now come into Moldavia, and expected the Tatars comming upon almost all the rest of the Summer sides, without any thing doing. The Tatar himselfe was not once turned from the bowels of Christendome, wherinto he had purposed (as the yeare before) to haue entered, we having with our owne breasts received his force and force about being brought vnto conditions, was expressly enioyned in a most shorpe presedment, and without any more harme doing to returne againe into his country by the selfe same way he came, and by no other: whereby it is come to passe, that vntill this day Christendome hath not this yeare yet felt the Tatars weapon. But vnto Transylvania, and Hungary, what a space and power was giuen for them to gather their strength and force together, and out of the same place to oppose them against the enemies, when as our armie kept them safe at their backs, and eased notably Moldavia, but Vlachia and Transylvania, and of that care we were as if the cause of delay had not been objected vnto the Turks first, and afterwards the Tatars, nor to say anything of the Turke, the Tatars at the very selfe same time, that the Transylvanian armie was come into Vlachia, against Sinan, might haue broken into Transylvania before it could haue returned home, or els marching directly towards that armie, might haue met with it out of Transylvania. As for Moldavia, which together with the memory of the Christian name, yet left in it, had utterly perished, was most manifestly preserved by the comming of our armie, which what and it would haue had, if the enemy might at his pleasure haue ragged as he did in the farther Vlachia, those most bitter remembrances in it yet at this day smoking, doe well declare, out of which it is well knowne more thousands of Christian captiues to haue bene carried away into most wofull captiuitie, than almost out of any other prouince in all the time of these miserable warres: which although it be thus, yet haue we not thereof, neither send we any triumphant letters vnto your Holinesse, nor bragge of our good service done for the Christian commonweale, contenting our selues with the conscience of the thing it selfe. In the meane time we are accused vnto your Holinesse: but for what cause? If any man complaine for the taking of Moldavia, I will not say it was by them before willingly forsaken, whilst I was yet in the frontiers thereof; but that this kingdome hath a most ancient right vnto it, and such a right, as when our kings being busied in their warres against the Muscouite, the Crucian Teutonic brethren, or others, some others also troubling the state thereof, it for a time became a prey vnto the Turkish tyrants, yet in all the leagues made or renewed betwixt this kingdome and them, was still excepted, That all such things as the Palatine of Moldavia was of dutie to performe vnto the king, should by him still be performed: which kings of Polonia, and namely Augustus himselfe, the last of the Jagollonian race, appointed diuers of those Palatines themselves. which although they be things most manifest, yet hauing more regard vnto the welfare of that prouince, as a Christian country, than of our right, we restored the same into the same state wherein it hath bene for many yeares before these wars. Wherefore if any man thinke any thing done, whereby the enemies of the crosse of Christ might be eased or strengthened, or the defenders of the faith hindered, it is so farre from any such thing to be done, that rather (as was before declared) the enemies force is repressed and auerted, and greater meanes giuen to the Christians against to impugne them; the enemy being at their backs by vs shut from them. But I feare that they haue not fully enformed your Holinesse how these things were done, who haue reported vnto your said Holinesse not onely the name of the Turke to haue bene proclaimed together with the Polonians in Moldavia, but also the name of the Tatars the proper enemies of the Polonians, and by the power and decrees of them three, as it were confederat together, things to haue bene ordered in Moldavia. Which their complaint if it tend to that end, as if a confederation were made with them, I frankly confesse certain conditions to haue been giuen them, but such as whereby is provided not only for the quiet and securitie of this kingdome, but no lesse also for the whole Christian commonweale, as is before declared. All which things for all that although they were done for the good of this kingdome, and all Christendome in general, yet were they so done, that they were all by me referred vnto the kings maiestie and the states of the kingdome: so that at this present the kingdome is at free libertie either to ioyne in confederation with the rest of the Christian princes; or if that cannot vpon certaine and indifferent conditions be agreed vpon, yet with no mans iniurie or hurt to ratifie this, ioynd with the health and good of a great part of the Christian commonweale:

* viz. to become tributarie vnto the Turke.

A commonweale: only God graunt that the Christian princes may seriously thinke both of this so Christian a confederation against the common enemy, and striue also all together against the enemy with their weapons, and not with misreports and slanders one against another. They are not to assaile the enemies feet, but his throat: neither is the seat of the warre to be placed in the borders of Polonia, where it concerneth themselves much to haue all things rather penetrable behind them: but let the war be undertaken with lesse charge and preparation, than if the enemies royal seat were to be assailed, which standing in an open and plaine country shall alwaies without much adoe be his that being strongest can take it. This haue I written at large as my purpose was, all which I most humbly beseech your Holinesse with your diuine wisdom to consider of, and with your wonted clemencie to accept the same: and so protest at your Holinesse feet, I most humbly commend me to your clemencie: From

B Zamoschie the tenth of Ianuarie 1596. I am yours most humble servant, Sinan Bassa.

Thus much the great Chancellour in defence of himselfe, and of that he had done in Moldavia: which how soeuer it contented the Pope, well I wrote nothing pleased the Emperour, and much lesse the Transylvanian prince, now not a little weakened by the taking away of the country of Moldavia from him.

C And this trouble some yeare withall, many sharpe and bloudie skirmishes yet daily passed in diuers places of those frontier countries; the Turkes almost in every place still going to the warre. In the beginning of November, Zencouli gouernour of Carolsburg, the second time surprised Wirtz in the frontiers of Croatia, where these wars first begun: but being not able to take the citie, contented himselfe as before with the spoile of the citie, and afterward setting it on fire, departed. Maximilian also attempted Zencouli, and the Christians in garison at Strigoniua and Plindenburg now become neere neighbours vnto the Turkes at Buda, did with continuall inuades not a little trouble them both all the latter end of this yeare and the beginning of the next. And the Turkes in Bialla in Vlachia, vpon the side of Danubius, fearing after the flight of Sinan to be besieged by the Vayud, forsooke the citie, and in their hast passed the river; that in that tumultuous passage three hundred of them perished.

D Sinan Bassa, by the Transylvanian prince of late driven out of Vlachia, was not long after sent for to Constantinople, but the craftie old fox not ignorant of the fierce nature of the great Sultan, and warned by the late miserie of Ferat, found occasions to delay the time so long, vntill that he was sent for againe, and after that the third time also. In the meane while he had so wrought by his mightie friends in Court, & by such rewards, mightier than they, that at his comming to the Court he was there honourably receiued, as the chiefe of the Bassas: and being afterwards offered to bee discharged of the warres, as a man of about fourescore yeares old, he refused so to be, saying, That he was borne and brought vp amongst foundiours and martiall men, and so wisht amongst them to die: as not long after he did; dying as was thought of content of the euill successe he had in his warres against the Transylvanian.

Mahomet the Turkish Emperour exceedingly grieved with the losse of so many his cities and strong places this yeare lost, as namely Strigoniua, Vicerade, Siseo, Patrinnia, Lipitz, Tenna, Tergoovista, Bucaresta, Zorza, and many others of lesse name: and both by letters and messengers vnderstanding daily of the slaughter of his people, and waiting of his frontiers, commaunded great preparation to be made against the next Spring, giuing it out, That he would then in person himselfe come down into Hungary with such a power as neuer had any his predeceffours the Othoman kings and emperours, and there take most sharpe reuenge of all his former wrongs. Neuertheless, these his so haiste designs were by the plague and famine, (which then both ragged extreame in most part of his empire) and by other great occurrences of the same time so crossed, that by that time the Spring came, he scarcely well knew which way to the same time the Georgians in the East, a warlike people, moued with the good successe of the Christians in Vlachia and Hungary, had taken vp arms against him: and the old Persian king but a little before dead, had left that great kingdome to his sonne, a man of greater spirit than was like to endure the manifold injuries before done vnto his father by the Turke, to the great dishonour of that kingdome, and prejudice of himselfe. Of which things the Bassa of Tauris gaue him ample intelligence, wishing him betimes to provide for such stormes: which ioynd to the rest, filled his head with many troubled thoughts, wherunto we leaue him vntill the next Spring.

Sinan Bassa sent for to Constantinople.

His death.

Mahomet perplexed.

Mahomet the third,

The Transylvanian prince carefull of his estate, and not a little troubled with the dissevering of MOLDAVIA: thought it not vnfit for his affaires, now after the flight of Sinan and discom-ture of the Turkes, to go in person himselfe vnto the emperour, to declare vnto him the wrong done him by the Polonians; and farther to conferre with him, concerning the manning of the warres against the common enemy. So hauing put all things in readinesse for his journey, he set forward in Ianuarie 1596, and by the way of CASSOVIA the fourth of Februarie, arrived at PRAAG in BOHEMIA, where he was by the emperours appointment most honourably entertained. But immediatly after his comming thither he fell sicke of an ague, which grievously vexed him for the space of three weekes. In the latter end of Februarie hauing somewhat recovered his health, he went to the church: where after his deuotions done, he was by the Deane of the Cathedrall church welcomed with a most eloquent oration, setting forth his worthie praises, H and farther animating him vnto the like exploits against the common enemy of all Christianitie: VV hereunto he forthwith answered, in Latin, so eloquently and so readily, that all men marvelled that heard him: protesting in his speech, That as he and his subjects had not hitherto spared their liues or goods in defence of the common cause; so would they not afterwards spare the same, but adventure all for the benefit of the Christian common-weale; well hoping that the emperour and the other Christian princes would not as occasion should require, be wanting vnto him with their forces, or the cleargie with their prayers: which done, he doubted not (as he said) by the power of God, but to obtaine more notable victories than he had yet against the Turkes the enemies of God.

The Siculi rebell against the prince.

VV hereunto he yet thus lay at the emperours Court, it fortuned that the people called Siculi, I fended to haue their liberties in some part infringed in the late assembly of the States holden in TRANSYLVANIA in December last: rise now vp in armes, in diuers places, refusing to yeele their former obedience vnto the prince. A matter like enough to haue wrought him much trouble, and supposed not to haue been done without the priuie of the Cardinall his vncke, but by the wisdom and courage of such as he had in his absence put in trust with the government of his countrey, diuers of the ringleaders of this rebellion were apprehended, and in diuers sort executed: and three hundred of their complices to the terror of their fellowes, had their noses and eares cut off. By which wholsome feueritie, all those troubles were appeased, and the countrey againe quieted.

At the same time also the Transylvanians obtained of the Turkes a notable victory, with an exceeding rich bootie. Mahomet the Turkish Sultan had about this time sent a new Bassa for the government of TEMESVAR: against whose comming the old Bassa before Gouverneur, had in seuentie five wagons trussed vp a wonderfull deale of wealth, which he had there gotten in the time of his former government, to haue been together with himselfe with a strong conuoy conducted to BELGRADE. Of this his purpose, the Hungarian Heidons lying at LIPPA and LEN-NA hauing intelligence, lay in wait for him vpon the way, and in his passing by set vpon him:
 where in a sharpe conflict they ouerthrew the conuoy, and slew the Bassa, whose head they sent for a present to the princeesse at ALBA IULIA: and tooke the spoile of the Bassas carriages, wherein was taken a wonderfull wealth, for in one of those wagons is reported to haue beene found twentie thousand Hungarian ducats.

In this absence also of the prince, ten thousand of the Rascians reuolting from the Turke, came and offered their seruice vnto the princeesse, whereof she by letters with great speed certified the prince her husband; who thereupon halted to dispatch with the emperour: and hauing procured both from him and the Pope the promise of some aid to be afterward sent him, tooke of him his leaue, and being honourably accompanied, departed from PRAAG to VIENNA: where he arrived the eleuenth of March, sitting in a princely chariot, drawn with six most beautifull horses, the gift of the emperour. At his comming thither he was met by the nobilitie of the countrey, and by Aldobrandinus the Popes nephew, who presented him with three goodly horses for seruice, most richly furnished. Him the prince tooke into his chariot, and so accompanied entered the citie, where he was with all due honour receiued and joyfully entertained, and so brought M vnto the emperours pallace, where by the learned students of that Vniuersitie, was for his pleasure acted before him the notable historie of Iosua. Hauing staid there three daies, and purposing to haue in his returne visited his mother in law at GRABICZ in CROATIA: newes was brought him, that the Turkes and Tartars by the setting on of Stephen Bator his vncke, were about to

seuenth. Emperour. of the Turks.

A to breake into TRANSYLVANIA: VV herefore changing his purpose, he departed thence to PRESBURG, and so with all speed kept on his way towards TRANSYLVANIA: where he to the great joy and comfort of his subjects in generall arrived in safetie in the beginning of Aprill.

In this while many hoat skirmishes passed betwixt the Christians and the Turkes in the frontiers of their territories: and now the plague and famine, which had of long raged in CONSTAN-TINOPLE and other places of the Turkes dominions, began to assuage. Of which so great calamities as had deuoured many thousands of his people, the Turkish emperour finding himselfe somewhat eased, forthwith caused the continuation of his warres against the emperour and the Transylvanian prince, to be three daies together proclaimed in: CONSTANINOPLE and a great armie to be raised to be sent into TRANSYLVANIA and HUNGARIE: giuing it out, that he B would with that so puissant an armie in person himselfe come into HUNGARIE: At which time it was also reported, that he had already sent his tents and other his necessarie prouision before to HADRIANOPLE: for now was nothing more odious in the Turkes court, than the name of the Transylvanian prince.

Of all these things was not the emperour ignorant, as fully thereof certified both by letters and espials; as also by the vniforme confession of such Turkes as were daily taken prisoners. For which cause, he also with as much speed and care as he could; provided for the raising of his armie, as he had the yeare before; as also for the leuying of mony, and prouision of all things necessary, that the enemy at his comming might not find him vnprovided. Neither spared he to pray aid of the other Christian princes his neighbours, especially of the Polonian, whom he had diuerts times sought after to haue drawn him into the confederation with the other Christian princes against the Turke. To which purpose he now also sent vnto him the bishop of PRESLAU C and the lord Poppelius his embassadours: as did the Pope also send vnto him the Cardinall Cate-tane his legat, and the princes electors also their embassadours: vnto whom the Polonian gaue good-yeating and good words, but would not by any meanes be perswaded to breake his league with the Turke, or to afford any aid vnto the Christians; although the Cardinall with many pregnant reasons shewed him what small assurance there was in the Turkes leagues, and how dangerous it might be to his State if the Turke making peace with the emperour should turne his force vpon him, which it was like enough he would, as knowing no man longer for friend than stood with his profit; beside the immortall blemish of his honour by dissevering himselfe

D from the vnion of the Christian princes, to hold friendship with the Turkes and infidels. But all this and much more to no purpose, so resolutely was the Polonian set downe for the keeping of the Turkes fauour; so that of all the Christian princes so neere vnto the deuouring enemy, none stood the Christian common-weale in lesse stead than he: VVhich for all that, most men imputed not so much vnto the king as to others about him, especially to Zamoschie the great Chancelor, by whom that state was most swaied, who was not onely supposed but openly reported to haue secret intelligence both with the Turke and the Tartar.

All this while the lord Palfi Gouverneur of STRIGONIVM, ceased not with continuall inroads to vex the Turkes euen to the gates of BUDA, as did also the other Christian captains in other places of the Turkes frontiers in HUNGARIE. Neere vnto BUDA were two great countrey villages, for most part inhabited by Christians, who hauing giuen their oath of obedience vnto the E Turke, liued a miserable life for the payment of an excessive tribute yearly. These poore Christians, wearie of the Turkish thraldome and the continuall spoile of their labors by them of STRI-GONIVM, by secret messengers requested of the lord Palfi, of mercie to carrie them with their goods and cattell away into some other place of the Christian territorie, that so they might yet liue amongst Christians, as he had but a little before done for them of old BUDA. Vnto which their so reasonable a request, the Christian Gouverneur charitably harkened; willing them against a certaine appointed time, to put themselves with all their things in readinesse. There was of these Christians about 755 families, who with their wiues and children, and such trash as they had, packt vp into eightie wagons drawne with foureene and sixtene oxen apiece, at the ap-F pointed time about midnight committed themselves with all that they had vnto the conduct of them of STRIGONIVM, sent out of purpose for them; by whom they were in safetie brought to STRIGONIVM. Amongst them were many rich men, who brought with them good store of coine, with an exceeding great number of cattell. Vnto these newcome guests, Palfi assigned certaine fields betwixt STRIGONIVM and VIVARIA, on the North side of Danubius; where they so commodiously lived; as was possible in so troubled an estate of a country. G Shortly after, six hundred garrison souldiours of Lippa seeking after bootie, and aduenuuring too farre into the enemies territorie, were discovered by the Turkes scouts: and so beset by the Turkes and Tartars billeted in the countrey about TEMESVAR, that there was no way left for them to escape. Which they well perceiuing, resolved among themselves (as became valiant men, to fight it out euen vnto the last man; and with no lesse resolution performed what they had before determined: for being on euery side beset and hardly charged by their enemies, they as men before resolved to die, although scarce one to twentie, fought most desperately, seeking for nothing else but to sell their liues as deare as they could vnto their enemies: and so fighting were all slaine, except some few which by great fortune escaped, leauing vnto the enemy a right bloudie victorie. Yet by this losse of so great a partie, was the garrison of Lippa greatly weakened, H which the enemy knew right well, and thereupon began forthwith to prepare to besiege the towne. Which Barbelus the Gouernour (a most valiant man) wisely foreseeing, sent in post vnto the Transylvanian prince, to request him with all speed to send him foure or fve thousand good souldiours, with which power he doubted not by the helpe of God, to be able to defend the towne against all the forces the enemy was at that time able to bring against it. Vnto whom the prince without delay sent eight thousand, who all in safetie in good time arrived at Lippa:

for shortly after their arrival, fortie thousand of the Turkes and Tartars came and sat downe before the towne, enclosing it on euery side, and so lay for certaine daies without anything doing worth the speaking of; they of the towne in the meane time doing them all the harme they could with their great shot, which they sent amongst them not sparingly. But they had not thus I long lien, but that newes was brought into the campe, that the Transylvanian prince was with a great power coming thither to relieue the towne: whereupon they presently rose, and retired to the place where they had before encamped, about two miles from Lippa; where certainly vnderstanding that the prince neither was neither could in short time be in such readinesse as was before reported, they forthwith returned, and more straitly besieged the towne than before.
They had now brought with them seenteene pieces of batterie, eight wagons laded with shot and powder, and fortie six others laded with scaling ladders and other warlike prouision: thus appointed they began to batter the towne, and afterwards gaue therunto diuers desperat assaults; which the Christians valiantly received, and still with great slaughter repulsed their enemies. For that strong towne was with towers and bulwarkes flanking one another so fortified, that out of K them the Christians with their murthering pieces made great spoile of their enemies, and still enforced them with losse to retire, no bullet almost flying in vaine. In the heat of one of these assaults, the Gouernour caused one of the gates of the towne to be set open, hauing before within in the towne placed sixteene great pieces, at the verie entrance of the same gate, charged with all kind of murthering shot: vnto which gate, as of meere desperation set open by the defendants, the Turkes and Tartars desirous of reuenge, came thronging as thicke as might be, thinking to haue thereby entred: when suddenly, and as it were in the turning of an hand, they were with the aforesaid murthering pieces cut downe as with a sicke, and so againe, and the third and fourth time, before they could cleare themselves of the danger thereof, their heads, armes, legges, and other rent limbes, flying in the ayre most miserably to behold. Neuertheless the siege was by L them continued, and the often assaults so resolutely maintained, as if they had thereon purposed to haue gaged all their liues. But this so obstinat a resolution, was by an vnexpected accident when they least thought, converted into such a desperat feare and astonishment, that they vpon the sudden (no man forcing them) forooke their trenches wherein they lay encamped, and leauing behind them their tents, their great ordinance, and whatsoever else they had, they betooke themselves to a most disordered flight. The Transylvanians, who by chance were euen then coming thither, pursuing them, slew diuers of them, and tooke some others of them prisoners.
At this siege the Bassa of TEMESVAR himselfe was mortally wounded, and Hamat Sanzacke of GIVLA with diuers others of good place slaine, and foure thousand of the common souldiours.
The cause of the Turkes so great and sudden feare was this: VVhilst the Bassa of TEMESVAR M lay at the siege of Lippa, as is aforesaid, they that were left in the citie fearing no harme, lived in great securitie; in the meane time the Gouernour of LVGAZ sent out six thousand souldiours towards TEMESVAR, now in the absence of the Bassa to seeke after bootie; who coming to TEMESVAR, with great speed rifled the suburbs of the citie, slew all the Turkes they could light vpon,

A vpon, and set at libertie a thousand captiues: and so hauing trussed vp their bootie, set on fire all the suburbs, and departed. VVhich fire grew so great and so terrible, that it was plainly seene into the campe at Lippa, making a shew as if the whole citie had bene on a light fire. Which so daunted the hearts of the Turkes at the siege, that they presently fled (as is before said) leauing all that they had behind them.

The Transylvanian all this while busied in raising of his armie, and prouiding of things necessarie for the maintenance of his warres, was come into the confines of HUNGARIE, towards TEMESVAR, euen as the Turkes fled from Lippa. At which time certaine Hungarian Heidons that serued him, getting ouer Danubius, not farre from NICOPOLIS tooke PLENIA, a little towne of the Turkes, which they rancked and burnt, and hauing slaine in the countrey, B thereabout about three thousand of the Turkes, returned with a rich prey vnto the prince.

Not long before the Christians had surprisid CLISSA, a strong frontier towne of the Turkes in DALMATIA, not far from SPALATO: which towne the Bassa of BOSNA fought now againe to recouer, and thereto layed hard siege: for the reliefe whereof, Leucowitz Gouernour of STIRIA and the other prouinces thereabouts belonging to the house of AVSTRIA, and the gouernour of ZENGO, with a fleet of two and fortie ships, wherein they had embarked foure thousand souldiours well appointed, with all things necessarie set forward toward CLISSA: and by the way lighting vpon a gallee of the Venetians, bound with certain warlike prouision towards the Turkes campe, tooke her as good prize, and rifled her. This fleet with a faire wind arrived at SIBET, neere vnto TRAV, where the gouernour landing his men, marched that night part of his way toward CLISSA, and all the next day lay close. The night following they set forward againe, and C hauing marched fifteene miles, came vnto the enemies campe before day: where setting vpon the Turkes in their trenches, fearing no such perill, they brought such a generall feare vpon the whole campe, that the Turkes as men amazed fled some one way, some another, euery man (as in such sudden feare it commonly happeneth) making shift for himselfe, leauing whatsoever they had in their trenches behind them. The Christians contented so to haue put their enemies to flight, fell presently to the spoile, as more desirous thereof, than by the hastie pursue of their enemies to put themselves in possession of an assured victory. VVhich the Turkes quickly perceiuing, and from the hills with the dawning of the day discouering the small number of the Christians, and how they were disordered, they gathered themselves againe together, and coming downe, D enclosed on euery side the disordered Christians (greedily hunting after the spoile) and slew them downeright. Leucowitz himselfe with the gouernour of ZENGO and some others got into CLIS-SA: where hauing staid two daies, and doubting to be able to keepe the towne, they secretly by night issued out with six hundred men, in hope to haue recouered their fleet: but the Turkes suspecting such a matter, had so beset the passages, that of all that companie Leucowitz had much adoe himselfe with three others to escape. The enemy now againe possessed of his trenches, laid straighter siege to the towne than before: which they of the garrison perceiuing, and now out of hope of reliefe, agreed with the Bassa, that they might with bag and baggage depart; and so yelded vp the towne. Thus CLISSA, one of the strongest townes of DALMATIA, through the greedie couetousnesse of the disordered souldiours, fell againe into the hands of the Turkes.

E About the same time, Passi gouernour of STRIGONIVM vnderstanding of the meeting together of certaine notable aduenturers of the Turkes at SOMBOCK, a castle almost in the mid way betwixt ALBA REGALIS and BVDA, raised the greatest strength he could, and so with certain pieces of artillerie, and other things necessarie for an assault, set forward from STRIGONIVM the two and twentieth of May before the rising of the Sunne, and about three a clocke in the afternoone came to the aforesaid castle, whereunto he presently gaue a most terrible assault; which he neuer gaue ouer vntill he had taken it: For after that he had by the space of three houres together with great danger maintained a most desperate assault, at length hee with much difficultie preuailed, and put to the sword all the Turkes he found therein, man, woman, and child; and with the rest, fiftie Janizaries but that day come thither. This castle was of great beautie, and most F pleasantly situated; whereunto the Bassa of BVDA oftentimes for his pleasure repaired: for which cause Passi was very desirous to haue taken it without spoyling: but the fire hee had therein alreadie raised, so preuailed, that it burnt downe all the goodly buildings thereof, with great store of victuals and other prouision, nothing remaining, but what the Christians had saued for themselves.

ans one day about five a clocke in the afternoone, assaulted the towne in foure places; and after three houres hard fight, by strong hand tooke it, with the great scriching and lamenting of the women and children, and other fearful people, who now gaue themselves all lost and forlorne. Foure houres execution was done vpon all that came to hand, without respect of age, sex, or condition: women were flaine great with child, and yong children hanging at their mothers breasts, it booted not to crie for mercie, the bloudie sword deuouring all. The furie of the VVallons here exceeded, who ript the children out of their mothers wombs, and made thongs and points of the skins of men and women, whom they had flaine quicke. VVhich their crueltie they afterwards excused when they were therefore repproued, by pretending that thereby they did teach the Turkes hereafter not so wickedly to blaspheme against Christ, or with such their wanted and barbarous crueltie to torment the Christians that fell into their hands, for feare of like themselves. In this assault and furie perished of the Turkes about foure thousand, and of the Christians not past three hundred. In this towne beside that which the fire deuoured, was found a verie rich prey. The first that entred the towne was one Terskie, a notable capitaine with his companie: after whom followed Rufwurme, who each of them were thought in their entrance at the breach, to haue flaine with their owne hand eight or ten Turkes.

Malcomes the great Sultan comes to Buda with an armie
of two hundred thousand.

Now in the meane time Mahomet the great Sultan being come to BELGRADE, remoued thence to come downe into the heart of HUNGARIE, sending Cicala Bassa before him; and at length after long looking for, the second of September arriued at BUDA, hauing in his armie about two hundred thousand men, and three hundred field pieces. From thence he presently sent fortie thousand to TIMESVARY; but staied there himselfe with the rest of his armie.

The Christians yet lying at H A T T V A N, and doubting least the Sultan suddenly passing the river should come vpon them not yet readie for battell; departing thence, and retiring backe againe, came and encamped not farr from V A C I A. And albeit that the Archduke before his departure from H A T T V A N, had left a conuenient garrison for the keeping of the towne; yet such was the terrour of the Turkes approach, that the next day after, they that were there left in garrison forooke the towne, and setting it on fire, followed themselves after the campe. This comming of the Turkish Sultan to B V D A, brought also a great feare vpon them at V I E N N A, as much doubting least he should that way haue turned his forces, which caused them both day and night to labour for the better fortification of the citie, and for the prouision of all things, as if it had been for a present siege.

But Mahomet not provided for the undertaking of so strong a place, and not ignorant of the disgrace his great grandfather the victorious Solyman had sometime received under the walls thereof; had no purpose thereto, as having bent his thoughts quite another way. In the vpper part of HUNGARIE is an auncient famous citie, well fortified and honoured with a bishops See called AGRIA, not farre from HATVAN: Vpon this citie, as the chiefe fortresse of the Christians in those quarters, had Mahomet at his comming into HUNGARIE cast his eyes, and began now that way to make head; with purpose by taking of that citie, and placing there of a strong garrison, to hinder the vnitng of the emperours forces with the Transylvanians, for the mutual strengthening of the one the other by the way of the vpper HUNGARIE. VVhich the Archduke perceiuing, sent thither forthwith the valiant Colonell Terskue with a notable companie of Italians and Germanes, and a thousand other harquebusiers, who all arrived there in safetie. At which time also the lord Teuffenbach sent into the citie three thousand footmen, vnder the conduct of countie Turn, with good store of warlike prouision needfull for the defence thereof. The one and twentieth of September, Mahomet attended vpon by the great Bassaces, Ibrahim, Giassar, Hassan, and Cicala, for old Sinan was now dead, with his armie of an hundred and fiftie thousand men, came and encamped betwene the two riuers of Danubius and Tibiscus, covering a great part of the countrey with his tents. Approaching the citie, he with wonderfull celeritie cast vp five great mounts, and from them with such furie battered the wals, that the Christians were glad night and day to stand in armes for the defence thereof. And although that the wals were so great, and in many places so weakly fortified as that they were not but by a greater garrison to be defended against so puissant an enemy; and that therefore the defendants with their honour lawfully might euen the first day haue set the citie on fire, and retired themselves into the castle, which was both faire and strong, and the onely place to be trusted vnto; yet for the space of six daies they worthily defended the whole citie against the furie of the enemies, and out of it did

A them great harme: But seeing the danger daily encreasing, and that the citie was not longer to be holden, they set it on fire; having before consumed all the best of their substance with themselves into the castle: which the Turkes quickly perceiving, brake so suddenly into the citie, as if they would together with the Christians have entered the castle also; but in the attempting thereof they were notably repul'd, and many of them slaine: Adjoyning to the castle was a great and strong bulwarke; against which the Turkes for certaine daies furiously charged with their great ordinance, and that without intermission: and having in diuers places for shakent; in the space of two daies assaulted it twelue times; but not without the wonderfull losse of their men: And yet gaue it not for ouer; but as men with their losse more enrag'd, came on againe with greater furie than before; and so at last by plaine force tooke it: and there put to the sword all them they

B found therein, except such as by good hap got belimes into the cattle. At his bulwarke thus left, the Christians the next day falling out, againe recovered; wherein they slew a great number of the Turkes, with the losse of some thirte men; and as many more wounded. The besieged now diuers times both by letters and messengers craved aid of Maximilian the Generall, giuing him to vnderstand, that they could not long hold out for want of shot and powder; if they were not betimes relieved (whereof the enimie also was not ignorant) yet were they resolu'd to hold it out euen to the last man; although the great Sultan had oftentimes by messengers sent of purpose, willed them to yeeld it vp, with promise that they should in safetie with life and goods depart, otherwise threatening vnto them greater extremities than was of late shewed vnto the Turkes at HATVAN, if they should as obstinate men hold it out vnto the last. Whereunto they neuer

C answered him any thing: for Terskie had forbid them all parley with the enemy; and in the middle of the marker place had caused a paire of gallows to be set vp; threatening to hang him thereon, whoeuer he were that should once make motion of yeelding vp the citie. Alas how long whilest the besieged thus liue in hope of reliefe, the Archduke vpon the comming ouer of the Sultan towards AGRIA, hauing retired with his armie to STRIGONIUM; and there staid somewhat too long expecting the comming of more aid: began now at length to set forward; and to make some shew as if he had indeed purposed to haue relieved his distressed friends: so hardly beset at AGRIA. But such was the foulness of the weather, hindering the passage of his great ordnance (nor to speake of any thing else) that in foureteen daies he marched scarcely twelue miles forward. Whereby the enemy tooke occasion to preuaile as he did in his siege:

D who now hearing of the comming of the Christians, and seeing to how little purpose he had so long battered the castle, concerted all his endeouours to the filling vp of the ditch of the old castle, with fagots, earth, and such like matter: for the hastening of which worke, Mahomet himselfe spared not to ride vp and downe in all places of his armie, with his prefrence and cheerefull speech encouraging his men in that desperat worke. But whilest the Turkes are thus busie in fulfilling his commaund, the Christians falling out vpon them made great slaughter of them, and put to flight Ibrahim the great Bassa with such as were about him: after whom they so eagerly followed, that he in the flight lost his tulipant for hast, and was there verie like to haue been taken. Neuerthelesse the worke went still forward, and was now at length with the restlesse labour of so great a multitude brought to such perfection, that the Turkes thought it now no great matter by assault to enter the castle: and therupon the tenth of October gaue vnto it foure desperat assaults one vpon another, being still with great slaughter of his men repulsed. But coming on againe the fift time with fresh supplies, and greater furie than at the first, they prevailed: and so entring, put to the sword all they found in the castle, in number about eight hundred: four hundred of whose heads, one of the Turkes captaines caused to be carried vnto Mahomet in the campe, in the beholding whereof he is said to haue taken great pleasure, as in the vndoubted signes of his victorie.

The old castle thus taken, nothing remained but the new castle, against which the Turks conducted their whole forces, wherein they reposed not so much hope, although their batterie were verie terrible and their power great, as in the secret mines wherewith they had in foureteen places undermined the castle, and were now almost readie to be blowne vp. Which the besieged perceiuing, and withall considering the state wherein they stood, and not hearing any thing of relief; resolued amongst themselves (without the consent of their chiefe commanders) no longer to hold out, but to yeeld. And thereupon Algari and Terskie; who at the first by all vp in a mutinie against their two Gouvernours, Paul Algari and Terskie; who at the first by all the reasons they could deuise, dissuaded them from such cowardise, putting them in mind of the oath they had taken: which not preuailling, they afterwards vpon their knees requested them as men to hold it out yet a while, in hope of speedie reliefe: yea Terskie with his hands cast vpon treated them, that if they would no longer hold it out but needs yeeld, they they should first kill him with their owne hands, that he might not liue to see so great a dishonour. But what auaileth persuasion with men possessed with so great feare? And in the meane time two hundred and fittie of the common souldiours, amongst whom were many Italians, secretly escaping out of the castle fled into the campe, of whom diuers became renegats and turned Turkes, which added to the former feare, so much discouraged the minds of the rest, that they forthwith required to come to parley with the enemy, and so agreed, That they might with bag and baggage & their swords by their sides in safetie depart: the great Sultan giuing his faith for the performance thereof, with hostages deliuered on either side. So the thirteenth of October about noone, the garrison souldiours came out of the castle in number about two thousand: but they were not gone farre, but that they were in a great plaine set vpon by the Turkes and Tartars, and there cut in pieces; some of them were slaine quicke, and some other of them otherwise shamefully dismembred; the Turkes in the meane time vpbraiding them, and saying, That faith was not to be kept with them that had so cruelly before dealt with them of HATVAN. This perfidious dealing much offended diuers of the better sort of the Turkes, in so much, that some of them complained thereof vnto the Sultan; who (as is reported) caused some of the chiefe authors thereof to be put to death: and afterward by open proclamation commanded, that if any of the Turkes or Tartars had taken any of them prisoners, they should forthwith set them at libertie. Thus is the famous citie of AGRIA, of long time a Christian bishops seat, now become a sure receptacle for the Turkes and Infidels.

vnto the Turkes.*

*W*hilest Mahomet thus lay at the siege of AGRIA, the Bassa of BOSNA with certaine other of the Sanzacks thereabouts, hauing raised a great armie, came and besieged PETRINIA in the borders of CROATIA: which he at his first comming so furiously battered by the space of seauen daies, that it was of many thought not possible for it to hold out two daies longer. In the meane time the lord Herbenstein and Leukowitz, with all the power they could make out of CROATIA and WINDISMARCH, came towards PETRINIA: but hauing no means in so great hast to make a bridge ouer the riuer of Kulp, they retired towards SISEG there to passe ouer. The Turkes hearing of their retire, and supposing them to haue fled for feare, put six thousand horsemen ouer the riuer to pursue them: vpon whom the Christians turning, and charging them home, ouerthrew them; and hauing slaine many of them, draue the rest headlong into the riuer, where most of them perished. The Christians neuertheless keeping on their way to SISEG, there the next day by a bridge passed ouer the riuer, and so marching towards PETRINIA, and being come neere vnto the towne, were encountred by eight thousand Turkes, whom they also put to flight; and by certaine prisoners there taken, vnderstood that the Bassa the day before was risen from before the towne and gone: which they at the first beleued not, but comming thither found it so, to their owne good contentment, and the great joy of the late besieged.

by the Turkes.*

Maximilian the Generall marching on faire and softly from STRIGONIUM, at length the seuenteenth of October came to CASSOVIA, foure daies after that AGRIA was lost; and there met with the Transylvanian prince, who was come thither with eightene thousand men, and fortie field pieces to aid him: of whom eight thousand were mercinarie horsemen, fiftene hundred were of the nobilitie of his countrey, and the rest footmen. The next day after they setting forward from CASSOVIA, joyned themselves with the rest of the armie led by the lord Tenffenbach and Palfi, and so of all their vnited forces made one armie, consisting now of two and thirtie thousand horsemen and eight and twentie thousand foot: who drew with them an hundred and twentie field pieces, and twentie thousand wagons, wherewith they euerie night enclosed their armie as with a most sure trench. So orderly marching, they kept on their way towards AGRIA, with a full resolution to giue the Turkes battell, whereof the whole armie seemed to be verie desirous. By the way at length they came to a faire heath two miles long and foure broad, where they were to passe ouer a certaine riuer, the passage whereof Giasfar Bassa had before taken with twentie thousand Turkes and Tartars, the rest of the Turkes armie lying still not farre from AGRIA. Now the purpose of the Bassa was, to haue enlarged the passage of the riuer, and

A so to haue made way for the whole armie, to haue afterwards passed vnto the other side, as most commodious for many purposes, especially for water, whereof they so might themselves haue had plentie, and yet kept the Christians from it. But of this his purpose, by the comming of the Christians he was quite disappointed: for the next day being the three and twentieth of October, they skirmished with him in diuers places, especially at the passage of the riuer, where at the first encounter he lost three hundred of his men, & in the end seeing himselfe too weake to withstand the whole power comming on, fled to the Sultan, hauing lost two of his ensignes and twentie field pieces, but of his men not many, both for that he fled betime, and the approach of the night hindered the pursue of the Christians, who were now become masters both of the passage of the riuer, and of the place where the Bassa lay: which they finding not so commodious for them as they had at the first supposed (especially for lacke of wood, the weather then being extreame cold, as also hearing of the approach of the Sultan with his whole armie) they forthwith forsooke the same, and retired again ouer the riuer vnto the place where they lay before, enclosing themselves with their waggons, as if it had beene a citie strongly enclosed with wooden walls. The next day, which was the foure and twentieth of October, towards night, Mahomet with all his army shewed himselfe vnto the view of the Christians, and sent three thousand Tartars to passe the riuer: of whom the Christians slew a great number with their great shot, and put the rest to flight. Both the armies were populous and strong, and couered a great deale of ground, a most goodly sight to behold: both drunke of the same riuer, as well the men as their horses, and therefore kept continuall watch all that night on both sides of the riuer, especially at the passage. In the morning betwixt six and seuen a clocke, Mahomet with his armie raunged in order of battell, came within sight of the Christians, his squadrons as it were couering all the countrey on that side of the riuer as farre as the Christians could well see; and now againe sent part of his armie ouer the riuer: with whom the Christians skirmished from morning till night, both the armies parted but by the riuer, all this while standing fast, and as it were facing the one the other. But being at the length on both sides well wearied, and many slaine, the Turkes retired againe ouer the riuer to the campe: in the meane time (as if it had beene by consent) they resolved on both sides the next day to trie the fortune of a battell, and so commaundement was giuen through both the armies, for euery man against a certaine appointed time to make himselfe readie. So the next day, being the six and twentieth of October, Mahomet brought forth his armie againe out of his campe, which was not farre from the Christians; and began now to draw downe towards the riuer. Neere vnto this place were the ruines of an old church, where Mahomet placed certaine companies of Iannizaries, and foure and twentie field pieces, and commaunded ten thousand of his select souldiours to passe the riuer, which they readily did. The Christians also readie for battell, and now thinking it time vpon the comming ouer of the enemy to begin; with part of their armie thereunto appointed, so fiercely charged the Turkes that were already come ouer, that they quickly ouerthrew them, and not them onely, but certaine companies of Tartars also that were in another place come ouer the riuer: and not so contented, but following them they had in chace, put to flight them also that stood on the further side of the riuer, of whom they slew a great number, and by the comming on of the rest of the armie tooke from them an hundred and ninetie great pieces of artillerie: whereof so great a feare rose in the enemies campe, that Mahomet with Ibrahim the great Bassa seeing the discomfiture of the armie, fled in all hast towards AGRIA, shedding some teares by the way as he went, and wiping his eyes with a peece of Mahomet's garment, which he for reuerence carried about him as a relique. It drew now towards night, and the Arch-duke was about to haue caused a retreat to be sounded, and that day to haue done no more. But the Transylvanian prince, the lord Palfi, and the rest, perswaded him in that so great feare of the enemy to prosecute the victorie; and the rather, for that the Turkes began againe to make head, and to repaire their disordered battells. Wherefore the Christians still keeping their array, charged afresh the front of their enemies restored battell, consisting of fortie thousand men, and that with such violence, as that they in short time had slaine the most part of them, and put the rest to flight: and with the like good fortune charging the bodie of the maine battell, forced the discouraged Turkes with great slaughter into their owne campe. Now commaundement was before giuen throughout the Christian armie, that no man vpon paine of death should in seeking after spoile breake his array, or forsake his place, before the victorie were assuredly gotten. But they in this hot pursue breaking together with the Turkes into their tents, & there killing a great number of them, and seeing in euery place great store of rich spoile, contrarie to the aforesaid commandement, left the pursuit of the enemy, and disorderly fell to the spoile of the tents, vntill they came to the very tent of the great Sultan. But here began all the mischief, with a most sudden change of fortune. For here these greedie disordered men, not now worth the name of soldiers, light vpon a strong Squadron of resolute men, with good store of great ordinance readie charged, which they discharged amongst the thickest of their enemies, and rent in sunder a number of them, and after that came on resolutely themselves: when in the meane time Cicala Bassa with his horsemen yet vntouched, brake in vpon them also, and with the terror of his coming brought such a feare vpon them, that they began amaine to flie, especially the Hungarians and Germanes, most busied in the spoile. Neither could they in that feare, by any threats or entreatie of their commanders be perswaded to make a stand, or so much as once to looke backe, or to shew any token of true valour: which their hastie flight was the ouerthrow not of themselves onely, but of others also that would haue fought: for whilest they fled headlong vpon the spur, and could not be stayed, they ouerran their owne footmen, and so furthered the enemies victorie. Thus for want of good order, through the greedie couetousnesse of a sort of disordered men the most notable victorie that euer the Christians were like to haue had ouer the Turks, was let slip out of their hands. Many noble gentlemen and commanders, in seeking to stay the flight of their owne men, were here slaine: and although the enemy followed the chase scarce halfe a mile, yet were the Christians possessed with such a feare, that they fled amaine all ouer the countrey with greater shame than losse, no man pursuing them. The Archduke himselfe seeing all desperat, fled to CASSOVIA. The Transylvanian of all others most orderly retired himselfe towards TOCAIT, hauing not lost in this battell about two hundred men, and of them neuer a man of name. All this losse he imputed to the couetousnesse of the Hungarians, and cowardise of the Germane horsemen. The lord Bernsteine hauing charge of the great artillerie, fled also, and made shift for himselfe, as did Palfi, and in fine all the rest. Neither was the feare lesse amongst the Turks (a wonderfull thing to be spoken) than it was amongst the Christians: for the night following they for feare of the returne of the Christians, trusing vp the best of their things, fled also towards AGRIA. And it was afterwards knowne, that the Turks great ordinance, tents, and baggage stood three daies in their trenches, either altogether vnguarded, or so slenderly guarded, as that they might haue beene easily taken by the Christians, if they would but haue made head againe. Yea Mahomet himselfe is reported oftentimes to haue confessed the danger and feare he was then in to haue beene taken, and all his armie destroyed, if the Christians had (as they should) pursued the victory, and not so basely run after the spoile: by which danger he then warned, hath euer since shunned to aduenture his person to the like perill in the field. In this battell of KARISTA (for so it is of a place thereby called) and at the siege of AGRIA were lost of the Christians about twentie thousand, and of the Turks threescore thousand. Mahomet after this victorie fortified AGRIA, and for the keeping thereof left in it 10000 soldiers, and so returned to BELGRADE.

Vacia besieged by the Bassa of Buda.

The Bassa of BUDA perswading himselfe that the Christians after so great an ouerthrow could not this yeare to any purpose recouer their strength, came with all the power he was able to make, and the fourth of Nouember besieged VACIA, in hope to haue easily carried it: but finding there greater resistance than he had before imagined, and hearing that the dispersed Christians in the vpper part of HUNGARIE were making head for to come to the reliefe of the towne, he more afraid than hurt, brake vp his siege, and so returned to BUDA: for indeed the dispersed reliques of the late armie of the Christians were drawing together, but vnarmed and vnserviceable, as hauing in the late flight shamefully cast away their armes, and therefore could haue done the Bassa small harme if he had continued the siege.

Mahomet thinking it honour ynough for him to haue thus woon AGRIA, and driuen the Christians out of the field, deuided his armie into two parts at BELGRADE: whereof the one he billeted in the countrey thereabout, to be readie for all euents; and with the other he returned to CONSTANTINOPLE: but by the way he was set vpon by Barbelius Ianuschi the Transylvanian princes lieutenant, and the Vayuod of VALACHIA, who with a great power both of horse and foot being got ouer the Danubius, and secretly fauoured by the countrey people, lay in ambush for him in places of aduantage, and still following in the taile of his army, cut off 7000 of his men before he could be rid of them: and so with much trouble arrived at length at CONSTANTINOPLE, where we will for this yeare leave him, vntill we heare of him more.

Maximi-

Maximilian with a small retinue arrived at VIENNA in the latter end of Nouember, where he found the Vicount of BVRGAVV, Swartzenburg, with some other of the commanders of his late armie; most of the rest, especially the Italians, being slaine. The small remainder of this vnforgotten yeare was spent with often skirmishes and intrudes one into anothers frontiers, as the manner of warre is, without any other great thing done worth the remembrance.

Rodolph the Christian Emperour, notwithstanding the late discomfiture of his armie not farre from AGRIA, made choice againe of his brother Maximilian the Archduke, for the managing of his forces for his next yeares wars against the Turke. Vnto the Pope by his legate Fran. Aldobrandino promised of his owne charge to send ten thousand Italians, vnder the conduct of the duke of MANTVA: as did also the Germane princes their wonted aid, with some others:

All which slowly at length meeting together neere vnto POSSONIVM and ALTENBURG, in the moneths of Iuly and August, departing thence, marched to PAPPA; which after eight daies hard siege they tooke, and so againe retired to ALTENBURG, where they tooke a generall muster of the armie: and afterwards in the beginning of September shewed themselves before the strong towne of RAB: where the lord Bernsteine approaching too neere the wals, was with a shot slaine. Neuerthelesse the rest there staid, vntill that hearing of the coming of Mahomet Bassa the Turks Generall with a great armie, they left the siege, and the foure and twentieth day of September passing ouer the riuer Danubius into the island SCHVIT towards KOMARA, there on the North side of the riuer encamped. Where they had not lien past eight daies, but that the castle of DORIS, standing vpon the South side of Danubius, was by the Bassa before their faces and as it were euen vnder their noses besieged and taken; the whole armie of the Christians in the meane time as idle beholders looking on, but not daring to relieue their distressed friends: but afterwards arising, marched to VACIA, where hearing of the Turks coming against them from PBSTH, they set fire on the castle, and so retired along the North side of the riuer, vntill they came ouer against VICIGRADA castle of their owne on the other side of Danubius: where by the good direction of the lord George Bassa a most expert captain, and lieutenant Generall of the armie, they encamped so strongly, as that the Turks after many braue attempts giuen to haue forced them in their trenches, were glad with some losse to depart.

Neither went things this yeare better forward with the Christians in other places than in this side of HUNGARIE. For Sigismund the Transylvanian prince by his Chancelour besieging the strong citie of TEMBSVAR in October, was by the valour of the defendants and the vnseasonableness of the weather enforced to raise his siege, and with dishonor to depart.

Michael also the Vayuod of VALACHIA, who moued with the example and persuations of the Transylvanian prince, had revolted from the Turke, and done them great harme (as is in part before declared) now wearied with their often inuasions and the spoile of his countrey, almost brought to vtter desolation, many thousands of his subjects being by the Turks and Tartars caried away captiues, and his townes and castles for the most part rased, to giue his people a time of breathing, submitted himselfe againe vnto the Turkish obedience, solemnely receiving at the hands of one of the Turks Chiaus (for that purpose sent from CONSTANTINOPLE) an ensigne in token of his submission vnto the Turkish Emperour, as also of his fauour towards him. Which the more to assure him of, he by another honourable messenger shortly after receiued from Mahomet the Turkish emperour more kind letters than at any time before, with the confirmation of the Vayuodship of VALACHIA, by the graund signior his solemn oath vnto Michael the Vayuod and his ship of VALACHIA, by the graund signior his thirteen yeares old, for the tearme of both their liues, without disturbance, paying but the halfe of the old yearely tribute by the Turks before demanded: so glad he was vpon any conditions to haue reduced that martiall man with his countrey vnto their obedience: and in token of further grace together with these letters, he receiued also a goodly horse, most richly furnished, with a faire scimitar and an horsemans mace, in signe of the martiall power and gouernment committed vnto him by the great Sultan Mahomet. All which goodly gifts and honours the Vayuod seemed thankfully to accept: neuerthelesse not daring too farre to trust vnto the Turkish faith, of the small assurance whereof he had before had sufficient experience, he still kept strong garrisons vpon the frontiers of his countrey, with such other forces also as he was wont, excusing the same to be done for feare of the Tartars; by whom he also excused himselfe, for not going with the Turke Generall this yeare into HUNGARIE, as he was by speciall messengers from the grand signior himselfe requested, telling them that he might not in any case so doe for feare of the Tartars most horrible incursions, and the spoiles of his countrey: yet knew he right well how that they were by the great Sultan his expresse commandement charged not to do any harme either in MOLDAVIA or VALACHIA, as they went into HUNGARIA. But this warie Vaiuod not greatly trusting either the Sultan or them, as also loth himselfe a Christian to go against the Christians his friends and late confederates, excused himselfe by the necessarie care he had of his subjects and countrey, and so requested that his reasonable excuse to be in good part of the great Sultan accepted: but of him more is to be said hereafter. Thus passed this year without any great thing done more than is before declared, both these great princes, the emperor and the Turkish Sultan, being well warned by the last years worke what it was to pueall to the fortune of a battell: and therefore now contenting themselves to haue shewed their forces, as not afraid one of the other, countenanced this yeares wars with greater shewes than deeds.

What great things might by the Christian princes at vnite amongst themselves be done against the Turks, is by the considerat right easily to be gathered: but especially by the notable victorie of the famous Transylvanian prince Sigismund, who confederated but with his poore oppressed neighbours the Valachians and Moldauians, and strengthened with some small aid from the Emperour and the Hungarians, not only deliuered those three countreys from the heauie burthen of the Turkish thraldome, but vanquished also their most renowned captaines, overthrew their mightie armies, burnt and spoiled their countreys, rased their townes and cities, which as it hath bene in part before declared, so if it should be all particularly set downe, beside that it would be tedious, so also might it happily seeme almost incredible. Beside which calamities of war (commonly more felt of the subjects than of the prince) the great Sultan himselfe found no small wants, as well in his cofers, as other his necessarie supplies for the maintenance of his wars, especially in HUNGARIE; the onely countrey of MOLDAVIA (before these troubles) yeelding vnto him yearly a tunne of gold, two thousand horses for seruice, ten thousand great measures of wheat, with as much barley, and a wonderfull proportion of butter, honie, and other victuals; the other two prouinces paying also the like or more, as a yearly tribute: whereof he had of late to his great discontentment by the generall reuolt of these three countreys bin quite disappointed. But this so wholesome a confederation, to the great hurt of the Christian commonweale and benefit of the Turks, now broken, and MOLDAVIA by the Polonians dissiuered from the rest, and againe made tributarie vnto the Turke (as is before declared) and now VALACHIA also in a sort acknowledging the Turks obeisance, the noble Transylvanian prince, who hitherto with great cheerefulness and courage had fought the most Christian battels against the Turke, now left as it were all alone, and doubting how with his own small forces to be able long to defend his countrey against the Turke and the Polonian, whom he feared not much lesse than himselfe, the same should together with himselfe fall into the hands of the Turkes, or some other his enemies, by a wonderfull change voluntarily resigned this his countrey of TRANSYLVANIA vnto Rodolphe the Christian emperor and his heires for euer: and so leauing his wife in TRANSYLVANIA, went himselfe into SILESIA, there to take possession of the dukedomes of OPPEL and RATIBOR, which together with the yearly pension of 50000 Ioachims, or the reuenues of the bishopricke of VRATISLAVIA, he had in lieu thereof receiued of the emperor: wherupon the possession of TRANSYLVANIA, by the generall consent of all the states of that countrey, was in the beginning of this year 1598 deliuered vnto the Archbishop of VRATISLAVIA, the Countie Nadasti, and Doctor Petzi, the emperors commissioners; and a solemne oath of obedience and loialtie taken of them all in generall: albeit that the foresaid commissioners as also the emperor himselfe would haue perswaded the prince either not at all or at leastwise not so suddenly to haue forsaken his countrey, but to haue still kept the gouernment thereof himselfe yet for a yeare or two; well foreseeing that the same could not so conueniently bee gouerned by any other as by himselfe, a naturall prince therein borne, and exceedingly beloued of his subjects. The same commissioners also in Iune following going into VALACHIA, there tooke the like oath of obedience of Michael the Vaiuod and his people: who loathing the Turkish foueraigntie, all willingly yeelded themselves into the emperours protection. These commissioners also at the same time came to agreement with the Tartars ambassadors, offering vnto the emperor peace and aid for the yearly pension of 40000 duckats, and as many sheepe-skin gownes, their vsuall manner of apparrell.

All this while continued the Diet of the empire, begun in December last past at RATISBONE, Matthias the emperours brother being there his deputie, and in his maiesties name demanding a greater

A greater aid for the maintenance of his warres against the Turke, the common enemy, than was by the princes and states of the empire offered: where, after great and long deliberation, a large proportion was by them all agreed vpon for the defraying of the charges of those wars and defence of the Christian commonweale, to be paid in three yeares next, and so thereupon was the assembly dissolved. But as they were returning home, behold contrarie to all hope Ras, one of the strongest fortresses of Christendome, three yeares before betrayed vnto the Turks by countie Hardeck, was now by the wisdom and valour of Adolphus Baron of SWARTZENBURG, the Emperours lieutenant in the lower HUNGARIE, againe recovered: to the great griefe of the Turks, and wonderfull reioycing of the Christians, in sort as followeth.

This noble gentleman the Lord Swartzenburg of no lesse courage than experience, then lying at KOMARA, and still in doubt least the Turks to neere vnto him at RAS, should attempt something against him and his charges, provided for his own defence all that winter time with a strong garrison, keeping continuall watch and ward, although it were as then no time for the enemy with any armie to keepe the field: So Winter passing and the Spring approaching, it fortuned that the two and twentieth day of March about seauen a clocke in the night, the gates being shut, were heard neere vnto the wals of the towne two men, who by their speech seemed to be Italians: with great instance requesting, for the safegard of their liues to be let in, for feare of the enemies pursuit. Which by one of the Sentinels was forthwith reported vnto the Gouverneur, who doubting it to be some subtil practise of the enemy, commaunded them there to take their fortune vntill the morning: at which time they were receiued into the citie, and being brought before the Gouverneur, prostrating themselves forthwith at his feet, pitifully requested him to haue compassion of their miserie; and to comfort them with his charitable reliefe, that so they might at length returne againe into their countrey: who at the first asked them, what countrey men they were: and from whence they came at that time of the night: Whereunto they answered, That they were Italians, and that they had but euen then escaped out of the cruell hands of the Turkes at RAS. But desiring to know of them some newes, they after their manner humbled themselves, shewing by their gesture not to know any: yet would he needs vnderstand of them the particularities, when and how they were taken by the Turkes, and the meanes they had vsed to escape out of that cruell seruitude, all in order as it had befallen them. Where the younger of them beginning, told him, That now almost two yeares ago, at such time as the Christians were ouerthrowne by the Turkes vnder AGRA, and euerie man in that confusion then seeking the best and neere way to saue themselves; they hauing by flight now escaped the greatest danger of the enemy, and fortrauelling ouer the countrey towards VRATISLAVIA, were to their great misfortune (by an hundred Turkes come out of RAS to scour the countrey, and to seeke after prey) taken prisoners, and as slaues committed to the chaine, where they had almost two yeares vntill now, with great patience serued. These two fugitiues by their outward appearance, seemed to be men of good spirit and valour, which caused the Gouverneur to be the more desirous to know of them the meanes they had vsed for their escape. So the younger proceeding in his tale, gaue him to vnderstand of the whole matter, telling him, That they had been three moneths before still carefully deuising how to recouer their lost libertie, which now seemed to make some offer of it selfe vnto them: For that since the time that the emperours armie rose the last yeare from before the towne, they were not kept so strait or looked vnto as before, but lay as men by the Turkes not much regarded: which caused them the more cheerfully to take the offer of the time, and to resolute either the sooner to die, or to set themselves at libertie. And that so one day as they were carrying certaine munition from the pallace of Giasfer Bassa for the souldiours, they secretly conuaid three peeces of coard of some reasonable bignesse, therewith by night to let them selves downe from the wall, and so as they might to escape: which stolne coard that it should not be seene, and so their purpose suspected, they buried in the ground. But the night being come for them to effect in what they had so long desired, and they roaming vp and down in the darke, and still finding one let or other, they were enforced for that time to stay, and to deferre it vntill the night following: which being come, and choise made of a most conuenient place, they made first the elder, and then the younger; who not fast the coard above, and so thereby slid downe, first the elder, and then the younger; who not knowing how to swim, was yet by the good direction and helpe of his fellow, conducted ouer vnto the farther side of the broad and deepe ditch: and that so, in the night (so darke as that one of them could hardly see the other) they were come by chance to KOMARA, thinking to haue taken taken the way to VIENNA. The Gouverneur thus fully instructed of their escape, demanded of them farther, how the strong towne of RAB was by the Turkes governed and guarded: who told him, verie euill, and with small care, especially since the departure of the emperours campe; and also, that foure gates of the towne were filled vp with earth, which if they were broken open, would all fall into the towne ditch; and so farther them that would attempt to enter: with diuers other particularities. Whereof the Gouverneur hauing well considered, thought with himselfe, that if by some ingenious deuise he might by night with some good strength vpon the sudden enter the towne, it might happily be so againe recovered. Vpon which so great a designment he thought good to consult farther with the lord Passi, whom he requested in all hast and with as much secrecie as was possible, with 1600 foot and as many horse as he could make to come vnto him to KOMARA. Who vpon the aduertisement so giuen staied not, but presently giuing order vnto his men, set forward by night, and the six and twentieth day of March before day, with 1400 foot and 120 horse arrived at KOMARA: where they were all joyfully receiued, and the gates after they were entered, againe fast shut, and so kept for feare of the enemies secret spies; of whom no man can be too ware, be he neuer so wise. Now whilst these souldiours were refreshing themselves, in the mean time the Gouverneur with the lord Passi discoursed to the full concerning the intended enterprise: which resolved vpon, they found themselves vpon the view of their men to haue two thousand six hundred foot of the garrison souldiours, and three hundred horse, all good and courageous men, and well appointed for the intended seruice: who there staying two daies after their comming, and many of them in the meane time (after the manner of their religion) confessing themselves, and receiuing the sacrament, were become so courageous, as that they doubted not in the quarrell of the Christian Religion to encounter a faire greater number of the Turkes than themselves. And the more to stirre them vp, the lord Passi at the same time deliuered vnto them a notable speech: not for all that telling them, whether they were to go, but that that they were his Christian souldiours and brethren, vnder his leading both of long and late time; who neuer by him deceiued of their wonted pay at such time as it was due, would not now as he hoped forsake him. And albeit that he well knew them to haue deserved at his hands a greater contentment: neuertheless being himselfe depriued of his reuenue by these late warres, and his possessions euerie houre subject vnto the incursions of the Turkes, could not therefore according to his desire and their deserts, shew vnto them the great good will he bare them: Yet that now, and euen presently was come the time wherein they might not only aboundantly enrich themselves, but also adorne their heads with an immortal crowne of glorie, and make themselves for euer famous, by performing the most happie and glorious exploit that euer was by valorous souldiours attempted or atchieued in that part of the world. And to the intent that they all might know how deere he accounted of the life and honour of euerie one of them, he would therefore himselfe with the lord Swartzenburg (of whom proceeded all that faire deuise and new stratageme) be present with them in the action: and that therefore they were not to thinke, that they were led forth to any priuat danger, farther than their commandments themselves: whose folly were to be accounted great, if rashly and vpon no good ground they should aduenture their liues and honours together: whereof they ought not now to doubt, hauing by a thousand proofs knowne, how much they had been of them alwaies regarded. And that therefore it behoued them so much the more to shew their valour in this peece of seruice vnderaken for the great benefit of the Christian common weale, and the honour of Christ Iesu: vnto whom they were with one accord to make their prayers, with his mightie hand to strengthen their hearts, and with glorious victorie to bring to happie end the intended exploit against his enemies, to the honour of his name, and the aduancement of the Christian religion and faith. At the end of which speech all the souldiours cried aloud, That they were most readie to do any their commandments, and to follow them whither soeuer. So order was taken, that within three houres they should euerie man be prest and readie with their armes according to their places: and so hauing well refreshed themselves, about eleuen a clocke the seuen and twentieth day of March, they in good order began to set forwards toward RAB. But for that the multitude of souldiours oftentimes giue the enemy warning of that is intended against him, Passi gaue order to one John Stroeine his Sergeant maior, to follow faire and softly after him with 1700 horse and foot, which he well performed. And so vpon the breake of the day they began to draw towards RAB; and there lay close in ambush all that day vntill night, about seuen miles short of the towne: refreshing themselves in the meane time

A time with plentie of victuals, which they had brought with them from KOMARA. Night (the fauourer of deceit) being come, in two houres march they began to draw neere to RAB, and there staied about fife houres: from whence they sent before them a French enginer, a man of great judgement, with thirteene others (before rewarded with 1500 duckats) hauing with them toure Petardes (engines of force to blow vp into the ayre any thing whereunto they be fastened, be it neuer so great or waightie;) where by good chance they found the draw-bridge down, and the portcullis vp: for that the Turkes then casting no perill, expected euerie houre for certaine wagons with prouision from ALBA REGALIS. By which good hap the Christians vnperceiued comming to the gate, and therunto fastening their Petardes, in good order gaue fire to the same, which presently tooke not hold: yet were they not farre gone, but that they were by a Sentinell descried, who demanding what they were, was presently answered by the violent engines, which in a trice tore in sunder the gate, with some part of the wall and of the fortifications neere vnto it. When now the watch (but all too late) began to giue the alarum, and the Christians in the foreward thrusting presently in, tooke the gate, none of the Turkes yet comming to the defence thereof, or to hinder them from entering. The first that appeared were two hundred Turkes, which with their wonted crie, Alla, Alla, in such hideous manner as if they would therewith haue rent the heauens, would haue staied the Christians from farther entering, but were themselves overcharged by three hundred which were already entered. At which time also the Bassa came on, with more than a thousand following him, and that with such courage and furie, as was neuer greater to be seene in any Turke: where after a most terrible fight maintained by the space of two houres, the Bassa himselfe being slaine, the Turkes began a little to retire; where by a thousand Christians mo had leasure to enter: when strait waies after came Giasfar the great Bassa, with about a thousand tall souldiours following him, all the inhabitants also of RAB running after him, and that with such force, that they constrained the Christians to retire vnto the gate wherby they entered. Who (resolved rather honorably to die within the towne, than with dishonour to be forced out) there with incredible courage sustained the greatest impression of the furious enemies: where was to be seene the true Christian valour, for the performance of so great an exploit, well worthie of eternall memorie. But this Bassa also (the other being dead of a wound in his necke) encountered by the lord Swartzenburg, after he had in that sharpe conflict shewed great tokens of his valour, was there at length slaine also: both whose heads sticke off, were for a present afterwards sent to the emperour at PRAGA, with all the particularities of the whole action. But now the Turkes perceiving that all their chiefe commanders were slaine, retired most part of them into the citie: some three hundred of them crept vnderneath one of the bulwarkes, where stood certaine barrels of gunpowder, which they desperately set on fire, and so together with themselves blew vp 300 Christians that were about vpon the bulwacke, the greatest losse the Christians had in all that victorie, who were otherwise supposed not to haue lost therein about 200 of their men. Thus the Turkes discomfited and altogether full of feare, loosing both their force and courage, fled in euerie place before the Christians, they in euerie corner making of them a most horrible slaughter. The Turkish women all this while out of their windowes and other high places, ceased not to cast downe stones, timber, and such like things vpon the heads of the Christians, whom they fought by all meanes to annoy, and to helpe the Turkes. The bloodie execution continued all that day vntill night, the Christians still finding one or other hidden in the most secret places of the citie, vpon whom to exercise their wrath: who ransacking also euerie corner thereof, were by the wealth therein found greatly enriched. But comming to the pallace of Giasfar the great Bassa, they found such great store of rich furniture, as better becomed some great prince than a Turkish slave. There they found also letters written in characters of gold from the Bassa of BUDA to this Bassa, greeting him and promising him in his behalfe to deal with the grand signior against the next Spring, with the first that his armie should take the field, That he might therein haue some honourable place of command, to the end he might in the field shew his greater valour, and no longer lie idly in that strong towne. So found they there also many things written from the great Sultan himselfe vnto this Bassa, with great store of coine, which all fell to the souldiours share; inasmuch that by this so notable an exploit, so well performed, the publicke state, together with the souldiours priuat, was not a little bettered. There amongst other things were recovered threescore and six pieces of artilerie, which were knowne to haue bene sometime the Emperours, and foure and twentie others, which the Bassa had had caused to be brought from BUDA with great store of shot and powder and other small pieces, and meale sufficient to haue serued foure thousand men for a yeare and a halfe, but of wine (little vsed of the Turkes) onely foure vessels. In the Bassaes pallace was also found of armour and weapons of all sorts, great store, with abundance of cloth and apparrell, which was all giuen in spoile to the souldiors. Thus RAB, one of the strongest fortresses of Christendome, not full foure yeares before besieged by Sinan Bassa with 150 thousand men, by the space of almost three moneths, and then at length by the treason of the Gouverneur to him betrayed, in one night, by the valour and pollicie of a few resolute men to their immortall glorie againe restored to the Christian common-weale, the nineteenth day of March in the yeare 1598. Of which so notable a victorie, the Christians rejoyced not a little both in HUNGARIE and else where: the great Sultan with the Turkes in the meane time no lesse grieuing and storming, as well for the losse of the towne before got with no small charge, as for the death of his people there slaine, to the number of about six thousand and moe, with the losse of scarce six hundred Christians.

A great tumult
betweene the Ianizaries and the Spahis.

Yet for all this Mahomet the great Sultan ceased not to make great prouision for his wars in HUNGARIE, and that greater than before; and so with greater furie also, to prosecute his wrathfull indignation, to be reuenged vpon the Christians. VV hereunto order was giuen vnto Ibrahim Bassa his brother in law, and Generall of his armie, with all conuenient speed to take the field: which for all that fell out farre otherwise, for that now thinking to haue had all things in good forwardnesse, a great dissention rise betwixt the Ianzaries and the Spahi: the Ianzaries being the best footmen, and the Spahi the best horsemen of the Turkish empire; both the faithfull keepers of the person of their prince, and the greatest strength of his state: whereby it cometh to passe, that in setting forward towards the wars, these two sorts of valiant souldiors, the one standing vpon their strength, and the other vpon their honour, and both jealous of their reputation and credit, haue no good liking of one the other, but oftentimes, and especially of late in this corruption of their martiall discipline vnder their degenerat emperours, fall at ods among themselves, as now they did, to the great hinderance of their affaires, and trouble of their Generall. In somuch that to appease this tumult, he was glad to put to death certaine of the insolent Ianzaries, refusing to set forward as they were by their Aga commaunded. But proceeding farther, and thinking to haue executed some others of them also, to the farther terrour of the rest; he was by them and their adherents put in such feare of his life, that to auoid the present danger, he was glad to excuse himselfe by his lieutenant, laying all the blame vpon him as the cause thereof: who was therefore as a sacrifice deliuered vnto the furie of the Ianzaries, by whom he was presently slaine, with some others of the Bassa his followers. So these broiles with much adoe ouerpast, Ibrahim hauing taken a generall reuiue of his armie at SOPHIA, there staid, expecting order from the great Sultan where to begin his wars, in HUNGARIE or in TRANSYLANIA (for as yet that was in question:) which could not well be before the beginning of Iuly, by reason of the scarcitie of victuals euen then arising in the campe: for the supplying whereof Mahomet himselfe had no small care. But this long delay was the cause that a great number of the Ianzaries coming from HADRIANOPLE, and hearing by the way that the Generall would not as yet set forward, not knowing the cause of his stay, and doubting to be deceived of their promised entertainment, were about to haue returned backe againe: which knowne at the Court, commandement was presently sent thence vnto the Generall, without longer stay to set forward towards HUNGARIE, which the more hastened his departure with his armie.

In this the Turkes so long delay, the Christians had good leisure to prepare their new forces, being now the latter end of Sommer: for well they might thinke that the enimie slept not, knowing what prouision hee had made as well in CONSTANTINOPLE as in other places. VV herefore reasonably doubting, that Sommer well spent and August now at hand, he would not so late turne his forces into the lower HUNGARIE, they thought it best to prouide for the safetie of the vpper countrey: And to the end that the enimie approaching those frontiers might there find forces readie to encounter him, the lord George Bassa, a man of great experience and valour, was appointed lieutenant Generall for that countrey: to the great contentment of the souldiors in generall, all shewing themselves most readie at his commaund. The lord Swartzenburg in the meane time remaining in the lower HUNGARIE at RAB, with eight thousand good souldiors: and the Archduke Matthias at VIENNA for the dispatch of George Bassa, and

A the hastening of him soeward: for that the vpper HUNGARIE to the great hurt thereof began now to feele the incursions of the Turkes and Tartars: besides that, he was afterwards to returne himselfe to speake with the emperour his brother, still expecting a Chiaus of the Turkes by the appointment of the Grand signior, sent by the way of POLONIA for PRAGE, to intreat with the emperour concerning a peace.

They of BUDA in the meane while seeing the delay of the Turkes, of whom not one band yet appeared in those quarters; and on the other side perceiving the great preparation of the Imperials, and the great garrison at RAB so neere at hand; began now to doubt some new resolution of the Christians: wherein they were no whit deceived; for no armie of the Turkes being then in field in the lower HUNGARIE, and the countrey plaine and open, the lord Palsi with a conuenient power and certaine pieces of batterie set forward to attempt the enterprize, and the sixteenth of October with sixteene pieces of artillerie began to batter the citie of BUDA, to the great feare and discomfiture of them within: hauing first taken the fort S. Gerarde, with hope to haue gained the rest also. For which cause, the men, the women, and all that dwelt in the citie, most instantly besought the Bassa, not to endure the destruction of the same, with the inhabitants and wealth thereof altogether; but being not able long to hold out against so furious a batterie, in time to hearken vnto some reasonable composition, that so they might yet euerie man at least with life depart. VV hereunto the Bassa for all that would not hearken, but put them still in hope that they should be presently relieved. Howbeit the batterie still continuing, and they not able longer to endure the force of the Imperials; nor any reliefe yet coming, they were glad at length to abandon the citie with the losse of two thousand of the Ianzaries, and but three hundred of the Christians slaine, and eight hundred hurt: the rest of the Turkes at the same time retiring themselves into the castle, where they might for a space deeme themselves safe. So the lord Palsi possessed of the citie, with all his forces laid siege vnto the castle, which although it were in some places shaken with the continuall furie of the cannon, yet were the defendants still readie to make good the same: in somuch, that Palsi vpon good hope of successe giuing thereunto a generall assault, was by their valour enforced to retire: they within in the meane time with great labour and industrie repairing the breaches and gaules made by the artillerie. So that Palsi considering the difficultie of the assault, thought it better by vndermining to shake the rock whereon the castle stood, than by a new assault to expose so many worthie men vnto so manifest a danger: which his purpose by the enimie discovered, was by them also by countermining disappointed: yet for all that were the Christians still in good hope by an other mine not yet by the enimie perceiued, to sort to the full of their desire: and the more, for that they saw not so much brauerie or shew of courage in the defendants as before. VV ho now kept themselves silent and quiet, as if they had been consulting about the yeelding vp of the castle, as men bereft of all hope of reliefe and succour: the Christians being now possessed of a strong abbey and fortress fast by, and hauing broken downe all the bridges ouer the Danubius, in such sort, as that the besieged could not receiue any reliefe either by land or water. But forasmuch as the time of the yeare began now to grow tedious, and the winter weather sharpe, the Christians thought it not best there long to protract the time; and therefore resolved to present vnto the castle another E generall assault; and at the same instant to blow vp the mine: but in giuing this assault, they were againe repulsed with the losse of two hundred men. At which time also a number of the Turkes gallantly out of the castle, courageously encountered the Christians, but not with successe answering to their valour, being there almost all cut in pieces: neither did the mine take the desired effect, but being blowne vp did little or no harme at all. So that the Christians wearie of their long suffering of the extremities of the weather, and withall considering the great courage of the defendants, were euen vpon the point to haue risen: yet willing to giue a fresh attempt by the mine, they began againe to worke in the same, and in hope to preuaile began to parley with the defendants about the giuing vp of the castle, but all to little or no purpose; for that the mine hauing taken no effect, the souldiors could hardly be drawne on through the deepe and muddie ditches, to giue a new assault. In fine, seeing no hope to preuaile, and hearing also of the coming of a great armie of the Turkes for the reliefe of the besieged, they raised their siege, and at their departure burnt their suburbs, carrying away with them a great bootie: and so retiring towards STRIGONIVM, expected farther direction where to winter. VV here shortly after order was taken, that the forces disbanded should be dispersed, some into the garrisons, and some into the country thereabout; to the intent they might so be in the more readinesse with the first of G the next Spring to take the field, or as occasion should serue to be otherwise imploied.

But Sigismund the Transylvanian prince in the mean time repenting himselfe of the vnequall exchange he had made with the emperour, in disguised apparell hastning in post out of Silesia came to Clavsenberg in Transylvania: and there joyfully receiued of his subjects, and taking of them a new oath of obedience, by messengers sent of purpose certified Maximilian the Archduke (appointed by the emperour for the government of Transylvania, and now vpon his way as farre as Cassovia) of the causes of his returne, perswading him rather to conuert his forces against the Turkes for the recouerie of Agria, than to trouble himselfe to come any farther for Transylvania, now againe by him to the great contentment of his subjects repossessed: as did also the princeesse his wife (Maximilian his cousin german) wishing him to consider what hurt and dishonour he should doe vnto the Emperour his maiestie, himselfe, the Roman empire, and the whole Christian common-weale in generall, if in so dangerous a time hee should attempt any thing against the prince her husband, and vnto him by her so neere-ly allied.

Veradinum besieged by the Turks.

Now the Turkes great armie being come into the vpper Hungarie, lay encamped vnder the wals of the strong citie of Veradinum, where that wortheie capitaine George Basta was lieutenant Generall for the emperour: but not hauing such strength, as without farther helpe to go against so mightie an enemy, or to relieue the besieged citie, not as then furnished with a sufficient garrison, he gaue knowledge thereof vnto Maximilian the Archduke, who (as is aforesaid) with a conuenient power was but a little before come to Cassovia, to haue gone into Transylvania, had he not there by the way been staied by embassadours from the prince Sigismund but lately before returned out of Silesia: and hauing againe taken vpon him the government, by these his embassadours requested him no farther to trouble himselfe with that journey, offering to giue him aid against the Turkes whensoever he should require it. The besieged neuerthelesse in the meane time notably defended themselves, and with certaine braue sallies did the enemy great harme: still expecting, that Basta the lieutenant, or the Transylvanian prince, or Maximilian the Archduke, or they all with their vniued forces should send them reliefe: vnto whom they gaue knowledge the nineteenth of October, how that the Turkes with all the force and furie they had vsed, had as yet little preuayled, being by their valour still repulled, and with many sharpe sallies to their great losse encountered; and some of their great ordinance cloyed, in such sort, as that they were in good hope to protraie the time vntill they might by them their friends be relieved: yet not doubting, but that the Turkes according to their wonted manner, would doe what they might to subdue them: According to whose expectation, the Transylvanian prince with a great power taking the field to haue relieved them, was letted so to doe by the Tartars, to that purpose stirred vp by the Turkes: so that he could by no meanes ioyne his forces with Maximilians, for looking to the safetie of his owne people and countrey. Yet in token of forwardnesse, he sent certaine companies of braue souldiours vnto the lieutenant Basta: who vnderstanding that of two thousand good souldiours in garrison in the citie at the beginning of the siege, there were scarce seauen hundred left aliue, all the rest being with continuall assaults slaine or mortally wounded, vsed a notable stratagemme to delude the enemy withall: for hauing put his men in good order, and comming brauely on, as if he would euen presently haue joyned battell (a thing which the Turkes most desired) whilest they likewise with great fire were putting themselves in order of battell, and wholly busied therein; he by an other way (of the Turkes least suspected) cunningly thrust into the citie eight hundred good souldiours; and that done, presently retired againe into his trenches, wherein he strongly encamped feared not all the Turkes forces: who thinking euen then to haue come to a day of battell, and still in vaine expecting the same, returned deceived by this finenesse. And so shortly after (enforced by continuall foule weather) raised their siege, not without great difficultie and danger (reliefe lying so neere at hand, and the defendants strengthened with new supplies) to haue beene longer maintained: So passed the troubles of this yeare, with no gaine but great losse of the Turkes: who at their departure: enforced by the vnseasonablenesse of the weather and feare together, left behind them in their trenches many tents, with some great pieces of artillerie, being not able to conuay the same by water to Buda: and withall fearing greatly to be encountered by the forces of Basta, strengthened with new supplies euen then sent vnto him from the emperour.

A new supply

The

A The Archduke Matthias, Swartzenburg, and the other commanders of the armie in the lower Hungarie, being twelue thousand strong, with the garrison souldiours of Rab, Strigonium, and Komara, in the meane time because they would not stand idle, together with the Hungarian horsemen, ouerran all the country thereabout euen vnto the gates of Buda: in good hope also to haue met with 8000 Turkes (as they were by their espials aduertised) comming towards Pesth with victuals for the reliefe of the castle of Buda.

Whilest things thus passed in Hungarie, Mahomet to shew his greatnesse, as also the more to keepe the Christian princes in suspence, sent Cicala (or as the Turkes call him Cigala) Bassa his Admirall with a great fleet to sea: wherewith being come vpon the coast of Sicily, he requested the Viceroy of that kingdome, to send him about his fleet the ladie Lucretia his mother, which dwelt in Messina, for that he greatly desired to see her and to doe her honour, promising so quietly to depart without any harme doing. And the Viceroy againe considering how that the angrie renegar for the like courtesie to him at an other time before denied, had in his rage done great harme all alongst the sea coast; couenanting with him to send her in safetie backe againe, sent her honourably accompanied about the Admirall gally: whom Cicala her sonne receiued with great joy and triumph, and hauing kept her with him one day with all the honour that might be, according to his promise sent her backe againe to Messina; and so without any harme done for her sake to any part of Christendome, peaceably returned backe againe with his fleet.

Now in the meane time Michael the Vayuod of Valachia with good forces of his owne, because he would be doing something also, resolved vpon to giue an attempt vpon Nicopolis, a citie of the Turkes in Bulgaria: and so giuing order to his people, caused a bridge to be made ouer Danubius to passe that great riuer by. Whereof the Bassas of Silistria and Badova vnderstanding, thought good with all their power to disturbe him in that worke: and so comming, as the said bridge was by the Vayuod his souldiours laid ouer the riuer vpon boats, without farther stay attempted to haue broken the same, to the intent that the Vayuod should not that way passe. Who halting thither with his armie, rescued his worke, and enforced the Bassas to forsake the exploit by them begun: where betwixt them for a space was fought a most hard conflict, vntill at length the Turkes were with a great slaughter ouerthrowne; and so glad, some here, some there, by flight as they might to saue their liues. After which victorie, he without let passing ouer the riuer with his whole forces, came & encamped vnder the wals of Nicopolis: where they of the citie vnderstanding of the late slaughter of the Turkes, and finding themselves not able to hold out against the force and valour of the Valachies, and now out of hope of any helpe or reliefe in time to come from the Turkes, without farther resistance yielded themselves into the power of the Vayuod. Who hauing sacked the citie and set it on fire, caried thence a great spoile and bootie, with a number of the Bulgarians: chusing out the best and most able bodies amongst them to serue him in his wars, and appointing the rest to inhabit & manure the wasted places of Valachia. The report of this ouerthrow giuen vnto the Turkes by the Valachian, with the sacking of Nicopolis, running abroad, brought a generall feare vpon the Turkes euen in the imperiall citie of Constantinople. For the staying whereof Mahomet commaunded the chiefe of his Bassas, with a great power of tumultuarie soldiours taken vp in hast to go forthwith against the Vayuod, to stay the course of his farther proceedings, to the dismaying of his people, himselfe thundring out most horrible threats against him: who encouraged with his late victorie, and well acquainted with the Turkes manners, little regarded the same, as knowing that he was not with words but with armes to be vanquished.

Now Mahomet the Turkish emperour oppressed with melancholie to see himselfe at once assailed with the plague then raging in Constantinople, the bloudie wars in Hungarie, and the horrible mortallitie and losse of his people in both places; and withall not ignorant of the euill successe of his armie at Veradinum, & of the great harme done at Nicopolis by the Valachian: yet for all that ceased not in what he might to prouide for so many euils, but gaue order to Tant Basta with all speed to set forward (as we haue said) from Constantinople toward Valachia; as from whence he feared the greatest danger: who without delay to make the Vayuod to vnderstand how highly the great Sultan was displeased with him, put himselfe vpon the way with six hundred Ianizaries towards Hadrianople, with purpose there to winter vntill the Spring, and so to expect the comming of the rest of the armie, that so with the Polonian embassadour, were both courteously received in the Turkes Court, and as with an especial fauour rewarded with right sumptuous garments, and charge giuen them, That the Cardinall within three moneths next should send thither a solemne embassadour, with the old accustomed tribute by the Turke demanded. Thus through the inconstancie of the prince, the ambition of the proud Cardinall, and the foule collusion of the Polonian, the countrey of TRANSYLAVANIA (one of the strongest fortresses of that side of Christendome) falling from the obedience of the emperor, and so in sort bereft from the Christian commonweale, became againe tributarie vnto the Turke; most good men detesting the lightnesse of the one, the ambition of the other, and the slinnesse of the third.

Now the Turkes in BUDA not able longer to endure the great famine therein, had most earnestly requested reliefe from the other Turkes their friends in HUNGARIE, who on all hands ran to haue relieved them: but comming neere thereunto, could not put therein such provision as they had brought for the reliefe of the same, being letted so to doe by the Imperials; who about a league off diligently attended euery motion of the chemie: from whence the lord Swartzenburg in the night secretly approaching one of the gates with his followers, thought with a Petard to haue broken it open, and so to haue entred. Which his device taking not effect, as did that at RAB, the gate being within strongly fortified by the enemye, he was enforced to depart, being also discovered by the Turkes from the wall. Now shortly after the Bassa of BUDA with six hundred horse issuing out of the citie to haue met with victuals that were comming thither, fell into an ambush of the Haiduckes, who after their manner fiercely encountered him, and putting him to flight, tooke him prisoner, his horse in the chafe falling vnder him: whom his fouldiours seeking to rescue, there began a new skirmish, encreasing their former ouerthrow with the losse of the greatest part of them that were left: amongst whom the Bassa his sonne, with the Aga of the Ianizaries, there lost their liues also. Which conflict thus ended, the Bassa was with safe conduct brought to the campe, and there with great threats enforced to reueale the state of his citie, with other the secret designs of the Turkes. Whereupon the Haiduckes returned againe towards BUDA, seeking by all meanes to stop the comming of victuals thither, so in hope at length to haue gained the distressed citie. But whilest they thus lay vpon the passages, behold newes was brought vnto them, how that the Bassa of BOSNA, with the Sanzackes of SIGETH, QUINQV ECELESIÆ, and COPPAN, with ten thousand Turkes were comming to oppresse them, and to open the passages by them holden. But they knowing their owne strength, and nothing fearing K so small a force, stayed not for their comming but went to meet them; and in a place of good advantage waiting for them, vpon their first appearance with great assurance and courage charged them, brake their array, and slew the greatest part of them, together with the Bassa himselfe: yet with so much adoe, as that had not the lord Palfi in good time sent in vnto their aid certain companies of fresh men, it was not without cause doubted but that the Haiduckes had been put to the worse, about three hundred of them having there already lost their liues. The Tartars yet neuertheless in good number held on their way towards BUDA, with purpose to haue ouerrun the countrey, and so to haue withdrawne the Imperials from the citie: but for as much as that base nation was knowne to be good for nothing but to rob and spoile, the lord Swartzenburg his regiment only going against them, and encountering them, ouerthrew them, in such sort, that part of them being there slain in fight, and part for feare driuen into the Danubie, the greatest number of them there most miserably perished.

Bassa the emperours lieutenant in the vpper HUNGARIE at the same time lay at CASSOVIA with eighteen thousand men, doubting least the enemies armie, which he heard to bee at hand, should come to besiege that citie. In the meane time Ibrahim Bassa Generall of the Turkes forces, came to SOLNOCH with an armie of fiftie thousand strong, amongst whom wereten thousand Ianizaries: but for all that, vnderstanding that Bassa nothing dismayed awaited his comming at CASSOVIA, not thinking it good to goe any further (his fouldiours being already wearie with long trauell) neither yet safe there to stay so neere vnto his strong enemye, retired backe againe to BELGRADE, a place of more strength and securitie; expecting a great fleet of ships, M which charged vpon the Danubius, were to bring victuals for the armie, as also for the reliefe of BUDA, ALBA REGALIS, and other such distressed places, with diuers great pieces for batterie, and other lesse artillerie vpon carriages, with a number of ladders and other instruments of war, declaring their purpose for the performance of some notable exploit; all guarded with six thousand

A sand Turkes, which conducted it vp the riuer. Of all which the Imperials vnderstanding, the lord Palfi dispatched his lieutenant with a conuenient power, and the captain of the Hussars with his followers, all good and valiant fouldiours, to cut off this conuoy: Who to make the matter short, suddenly assailing them, and so comming to handy blowes, cut in peeces the conuoy, and rifled the ships, of whom the greater part were there sunke in the deepe riuer; and so tooke an exceeding great bootie, deemed to be worth a million of gold: where amongst other things of great value, there was found about an hundred thousand dollars, which were all deuided amongst the fouldiours as a reward of their trauell. This great ouerthrow once knowie at BUDA, ALBA REGALIS, and the cities thereabouts, brought vpon them a great feare: yea the armie of Ibrahim grew thereby much discontented, as being at once disappointed both of their victu- B als and their pay. Besides that, the Imperials ouerran all the countrey thereabout, ransacking, sack- ing, and destroying the countrey villages and castles without mercie, although the poore inhabitants offered them large contribution to haue staid their fittie, which would not bee accepted. Vpon this notable ouerthrow also the lord Swartzenburg was determined with all his forces to come againe to the siege of BUDA, in hope in so great a discomfort and want of victuals to haue had it deliuered vnto him, and for that purpose sent for certaine great pieces of artillerie to V- ENNA. But whilest things went thus well in the lower HUNGARIE, colonell Rodolfe of SACH- C drewes in the vpper countrey, tooke occasion also vpon this ouerthrow of the Turkes with five hundred horse and six hundred foot, to shew himselfe with this small companie before AGORA, hauing yet left the greatest part of his forces a little off in secret ambush: Which small companie the Bassa of AGORA beholding, presently put himselfe in arms, and so falling out, began an hot and braue skirmish: when suddenly the other fouldiours left in ambush starting out and couragi- ously assailing their enemies, brake their order, & put them to flight, pursuing them at the heeles euen to the gates of the citie: and had there beene a greater force of footmen, it was verely thought, that the Turkes (dismayed with the flight, and altogether confounded) had abandoned the defence of the place, and the Christians euen then become masters of the citie, which had beene the cause of their notable ouerthrow in the yeare 1596. Neuertheless they with great brauerie and small losse retired, hauing slain a great number of the Turkes, and carrying away with them an hundred prisoners; with a bootie of five hundred horse, and much other cattell.

The free Haiduckes also strengthened with new supplies, had done great harme in the coun- D trey about BUDA, scouring freely all ouer it; finding none to oppose themselves against them: for which cause the poore Christians, which yet dwelt in that countrey, rose vp against the Turkes, promising their obedience vnto the emperor: and moreover, to the intent they might bee no more molested by the Imperials, offered to take vp armes themselves against the enemye, and to the victuallmost of their power to hinder his passage both by land and water. These same Hai- duckes also had broken downe all the bridges which the Turkes had made betwixt BUDA and ALBA REGALIS, to the end they should not that way commodiously bring either victuals or munition from the one place to the other. And the lord Palfi and Nadeßi vnderstanding by their espials, That the Tartars deuided into three companies, had ouerrun a great part of the countrey, and with a great bootie were retiring towards BUDA, presently went out against them and en- E forced them to fight: which barbarous people, better inured to filch than to fight, there lost all their liues; together with which they had before stolne. After which victorie, these valiant men tur- ning their forces against certaine other places of the Turkes there by, tooke two of their castles with much rich spoile: which castles they sacked and burnt, together with the great towne of ZOLNA, breaking downe also the bridge vpon the riuer Traua. And thus againe the Turkes in Now at this time the Turkes at BUDA held themselves malecontent within the citie, hating the Government; their Bassa being before taken by the Haiduckes, and they themselves pinched also with great want of victuals. VV hereupon doubting some sudden attempt of the Christians, as men dismayed, they for the more safetie, retired themselves into the citie, a place of great strength, leaving the citie vnto the Imperials that readie to haue besieged it, but doubting of the F Turkes great armie, which as they heard was marching thitherwards, the awaiting guard there of being comen to MORAVIA, where Silesia was also looked for; the report being giuen out, that the Turkes having relieved BUDA, would goe to besiege CASSOVIA or else SERA- uay, as they staid to goe any further, as men in doubt what to resolve vpon: So were the ver- tuous colonels And other capitaines with their fouldiours, to fortifie certaine passages whereby the Turkes before by the Cardinall yeelded vnto the obeifance of the Turke; was againe by this worthe G Vayoud recovered, and restored vnto the Christian empire; the proud Cardinall cast out and brought to confusion, hauing not yet possessed these his new honours full eight moneths. His cousin Sigismund the late Transylvanian prince, who almost all this while had stayed at Borvsta, and in disguised apparrell scene Danska, and diuers other the free cities thereabouts, now hearing newes of the Cardinals ouerthrow, secretly got him away from thence into POLONIA to seeke againe his new fortunes. The lord Swartzenburg at the same time vnting his forces in the lower HUNGARIE with them of STIRIA, and now twenty thousand strong, fought by all meanes to reduce so many places vpon those frontiers as he could vnto the emperours obeifance, and so tooke in about two hundred villages. But afterward thinking to haue surprisid the strong castle of CAPISVAR, and by night secretly approching one of the gates with a Petarde, which H tooke not the expected effect, he was discovered by the watch, and so by the garrison souldiors (now raised with the alarum) repulsed, and enforced to retire with the losse of about an hundred men, and diuers others wounded, all men of good account: in reuenge whereof Swartzenburg afterwards sent out diuers troupes of horsemen, which scouring all ouer the countrey as farre as SIGETH, burnt it also, and so returning, carried away with them a great bootie.

Ibrahim Bassa hearing of this ouerthrow of the Cardinall, with all the forces he had sent him much troubled therewith, sent newes thereof in post to CONSTANTINOPLE: the brute whereof brought a generall feare vpon the whole citie also, inasmuch that commision was forthwith sent vnto him from the great Sultan, giuing him power (if it might be) to come to some honourable peace with the Emperour, and to bring it with him to CONSTANTINOPLE: whether I was shortly to returne, being now no longer time to keepe the field with his armie, which beside the cold season of the yeare suffered great want of bread, the plague also then raging therein with the death of many his best souldiors both horse and foot, beside the wonderfull mortallitie of their cattell also: in such sort, that the souldiors not able longer to endure the famine and wants increasing, fell to robbing of one another, and so at length into mutinie; wherein diuers of them being slaine and cut in pieces by their fellowes, the rest for the most part brake in sunder of themselves, and so by diuers waies returned home, not well trusting one another. So that nothing more was now done with the great preparation of the Turkes, their armie being discomfited with wants and the euill successe of their affaires, as well in HUNGARIE as in TRANSYLVANIA. Neither did Ibrahim the great Bassa for the reliefe of those euils, at his returne bring any K conclusion of peace vnto his great lord and master, as was commonly expected.

Now beside these troubles of TRANSYLVANIA and the other reuolted countries, Cusahin (or as some call him Cassan) the sonne of one of the Sultanesse, brought vp in the Seraglio according to the manner thereof, and hauing long serued in the wars of PERSIA and in HUNGARIE, and so at length made Bassa of CARAMANIA, a man of great spirit, and not able to endure the imperfections he daily saw in the Othoman empire, and the cowardise of the grand signior; vpon the report of the euill successe of the affaires of HUNGARIE on the one side, and the desire he saw in the Persians to recover their lost fortresses on the other, and grieved also with more particular wrongs concerning himselfe; as a man altogether discontented, resolved to take vp L armes: and calling vnto him his souldiors, and (as he was a well spoken man) laying before them the deformities of the present state, gallantly perswaded them with the promise of honour, soueraignie, and rich rewards, what an easie thing it were to chase the grand signior out of ASIA, and to set themselves with all that part of the empire at libertie. And so euen at the first hauing wooen vnto him three thousand haquebusiers, and five thousand horsemen, tooke the field to the great hurt of the Turkes, and trouble of the state. A strange matter in that tyrannical empire. The newes whereof comming in post to the Court, commision was forthwith directed vnto foure of the Sanzackes of ASIA nearest vnto him, for the speedie suppressing of that rebellion but euen then arising. VV hereof Cusahin vnderstanding, and that they with ten thousand horse and foot were comming to oppress him: without farther stay went courageously to meet them, and so encountering of them, ouerthrew them with a great slaughter, and tooke from them their baggage with six pieces of great ordinance. And after with his people seized vpon all the castles thereabouts, giuing whatsoeuer he found therein for a prey vnto his souldiors: who also much enriched themselves with the spoile of the Iewes, as the people whom they most hated, and neuer rested vntill he had made almost all the countrey of CARAMANIA his owne. And yet not so contented, gaue it out by open proclamation, that for the reformation of the disordered state, he would ere long go to besiege the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE: and that therefore all such as would follow him, should of him be intreated as his friends and companions, threatening vnto the rest most cruell death and destruction. Of which his proceedings Mahomet (as then disposing himselfe at his gardens of pleasure in the countrey, all alongt the side of PROPONTIS) vnderstanding, and fearing to be there surprisid, or that some sudden in- nouation might be raised in the citie: hasted with all speed to CONSTANTINOPLE, and from thence in all hast dispatched Mehemet one of the Visier Bassas the sonne of Siman, with all the forces he could make to go against him. VVho passing ouer into ASIA with a great power, and

B yet fearing to come to the trial of a battell with him whom he knew to be a man of himselfe de- peratly set, and not a little fauoured also euen of his owne souldiors: so secretly wrought by large promises, that Cusahin his footmen were euen vpon the point to haue forsaken him. VVhich he quickly perceiuing, fled forthwith through STIRIA into ARABIA with his horsemen, and the horsemen of Siman the Georgian: purposing the next Spring by the helpe of Arabians and Persians to appeare in the field with greater forces than before. After whom Mehemet the great Bassa following, came with his armie to ALEPPO, there to Winter, and to expect the returne of the rebell together with the Spring. This so dangerous a rebellion, with the troubles of TRANSYLVANIA and VALACHIA, were the cause that the grand signior seeing himselfe in so many places forsaken of his subjects, was the readier to encline vnto peace with the emperour; wherunto for

C all that the emperour was not hastie to hearken; but vpon honourable conditions: as knowing that the Turke required the same, not for any desire he had to liue in quiet, but for that his troubled affaires both at home and elsewhere abroad so required; his Ianizaries and other men of warre in this his so weake gouernment being growne so insolent, as that they were hardly to bee by him commaunded; openly threatening in their discontented humors not only the depoling of the principall officers about him, but of himselfe also, and of the banishment of the Sultanesse his mother, saying, that she had bewitched him, to the end she might her selfe rule, which she indeed doth in all his greatest affaires. But the rebell Cusahin the next yeare growne againe very strong, was now come into the field, and euen readie to haue giuen the Bassa battell: who as hee was a man of great wisdom and experience, well considering with what a desperat enemie hee

D had to doe, thought it best againe to proue, if his rebellious followers might by faire meanes bee drawne from him: and so comming neere vnto him, by open proclamation promised a free and generall pardon to all such as had followed the rebell in those wars, if forsaking him, they should forthwith returne home to their dwellings, and so to the obedience of their just and lawfull prince and soueraigne. VVhich generall pardon so proclaimed, was the ruine of Cusahin, for that the greatest part of his followers now enriched with the great booties they had gotten, and now also hauing free pardon offered them, returned home into their owne countries, there at ease to liue of their euill gotten goods, leaving their captaine with some few others which staid with him, with little hope to be saued. So that within a few daies after Cusahin thus forsaken of his follo- E ers, was himselfe taken and brought prisoner to CONSTANTINOPLE, where shortly after hee was with most exquisite torments tortured to death.

The troubles of this yeare thus past, Rodolph the Christian emperour with the beginning of the next (whilest the ground yet covered with snow, and the vnseasonableness of the weather would not suffer the souldiors to keepe the field) caused a Diet of the princes of the empire to be called, to consider with him of such helpees as were by them to be giuen against the Spring, for their maintenance of the warres which yet he had against the Turke: who all promised to send their souldiors with their pay, and such further contribution as might serue for the maintenance of that defenseue warre against the common enemie. VVhereunto also Clement now bishop of ROME (this yeare of Iubilie) put to his helping hand; as he had diuers times before, by sending thither such aid both of men and money as hee had before promised: so that by this meanes great pre- paration was made by the Christians for the taking of the field with the first of the Spring. At F which time the Turkes also began to stirre: who although Ibrahim Bassa their Generall by the appointment of his great lord was then in some speech with the emperour about a peace, yet cea- sed not they in the meane time that this treatie was from day to day prolonged, with their com- panies scattering here and there, to doe what harme they could vpon the frontiers of the empe- rours rours territories, the cause why he with more speed called vpon his friends for their promised aid. G And for the better managing of this yeares warres against the Turke, he appointed duke Mercurie (who had drawne a great number of Frenchmen both horse and foot out of FRANCE) Generall of all his forces, sending Ferrant Gonzaga (whom for his approued valour and experience in martiall affaires, he had sent for to MANTVA) gouernour into the vpper HUNGARIE. So the souldiours now day by day by companies resorting from diuers parts into AVSTRIA, were from thence sent vnto such places as were by the Turkes most molested, so to repress their often incursions, as in many places they did. For eight thousand of the Turkes going out vpon the sudden to haue surpris'd PAPPÁ, were by the garrison souldiours of that place encountered and ouerthrowne. And on the other side, whilest Ferdinand the Archduke was assembling his people in CROATIA, for the defence of that countrey against the incursions H of the enemy, six thousand Turkes without resistance entring the same as farre as BYCCARI, and burning the countrey villages as they went, had taken many prisoners, with a great bootie of carrells, and so (merrie and out of feare) being about to haue returned, were suddenly set vpon by the Countie Serinus in certaine straight and troublesome passages, where they least feared any such matter, and ouercharged also with their prey, were (I say) easily by him for the most part ouerthrowne, and the rest put to flight, and so the prisoners with all the rest of the bootie againe recovered. At which time also one of the imperiall colonels with fiftene hundred horse making an inrode into the countrey about ALBA REGALIS, and meeting with the Turkes and Tartars theteabouts, slew six hundred of them, and tooke diuers of their captaines prisoners. Six thousand other Tartars also at this time returning out of HUNGARIE home towards their owne I country, were by the Cossackes neere vnto the Blacke sea set vpon with such force, that many of them being slaine, the rest for feare ran into the sea, leauing all the prey they had got in HUNGARIE vnto their enemies. In the heat of these broiles the noble lord Palfi gouernour of STRIGONIUM, a man that all his life long had done great seruice for his prince and country, & whom we haue so often in this historie remembred, died the three and twentieth of March in his castle at BIERSPURG, to the great griefe of many, especially the Hungarians his countreyemen. And for that STRIGONIUM (so neere vnto the enemy) required in his stead to haue a right valiant and courageous gouernour, the emperour appointed the lord Swartzenburg to that charge: the same still running, that Ibrahim Bassa would come thither with the great armie he was in prouiding, if the peace went not forward, which was now still lesse and lesse hoped for, by reason of his proud K and insolent demands.

The Frenchmen
and Wallons mutinie in Tap-pa.

But whilest these troubles with such others too long to rehearse, thus passed in diuers parts of this miserable countrey of HUNGARIE: twelve hundred Frenchmen and Wallons in garrison at PAPPÁ (a strong frontier towne of the emperours in the lower HUNGARIE) for want of pay began to mutinie. For which cause it was thought good to the chiefe commanders to haue them thence remooued, and others placed in their roume. VVhich they perceiuing, and withall knowing themselves too strong for the rest of the garrison, all Hungarians or Almaines, not partakers of their conspiracie; they first resolued to thrust their owne captaines out of the towne, as lets vnto their desires: and then laying hands vpon Michael Marotti the paymaster, and other the L Hungarian and Dutch commanders, with their souldiours, tooke from them their weapons, and cast the said Marotti with the other captaines and some of the better sort of their souldiours into yrons, exacting of the rest as well Hungarians as Dutch, in number about a thousand persons; a thousand duckats; threatening otherwise to deliuer them into the hands of the Turkes: and albeit that Marotti offered for his libertie eightene hundred duckats; yet would they not bee so contented, but spoyling both him and the rest of all that they had, with their apperrell and weapons furnished such Turkes as were there prisoners, and so sent them away to ALBA REGALIS; and afterwards rifling euery mans house, as if they had bene enemies, tooke from them whatsoever pleased themselves: and that which worse was, to encrease these outrages, compacted with the Turkes of ALBA REGALIS and BYDA, for the pay which (they said) the emperour ought them, to deliuer them the towne: certifying them withall, how that the lord Swartzenburg with- M in two daies was coming with money to giue them contentment; promising if hee came into the towne, to deliuer him with the same into their hands: or to bee the more sure of him, they might if they so pleased intercept him at the passage. ZESENBOCK, whereby he must needs come. For the more credit of which their wicked purpose, they sent an ensigne of the emperours, as a token by the mutiners.

A token vnto the Turkes at ALBA REGALIS: who for all that altogether belieued them not, yet willing farther to trie them, sent them for hostages two Chians; for whom the rebels sent also two others of the better sort of them to ALBA REGALIS; with conclusion, that the five and twentieth of Iune at the furthest the money should be paid, and the towne deliuered. For the receiving whereof, and for feare of some hidden treason, the Turkes and Tartars began to make themselves strong: the Imperials also doing what they might for the appeasing of so dangerous a tumult. So the tenth of Iune the lord Swartzenburg with two thousand horse and foot came within two miles of the towne, and from thence sent foure and twentie horsemen to dissuade the rebels from yeelding the towne vnto the Turkes, and to tell them that they should shortly receiue their pay: who shamefully deriding them, sent them backe againe as wise as they came: so that B Swartzenburg perceiuing himselfe with so small forces to be able to doe nothing against them, neither yet by faire means to persuaade them, retired againe to RAB, vntill some greater strength were come vnto him. Immediately after, doctor Petzen, Councellour for the warres, a man of great authoritie, grauitie and wisdom, was by Matthias the Archduke with foure hundred horse conducted to PAPPÁ, to see if he by his discretion could haue dissuaded them from their so vngodly a purpose, for the yeelding of the towne vnto the enemy: whom they not onely refused to heare, although he spake vnto them most kindly, but also bent their muskets and harquebushes vpon him, threatening to kill him if he did not forthwith depart. VVhen shortly after, twentieth of the Hungarians imprisoned in a cellar in the towne, brake out, and coming to RAB, brought newes thither, That the Frenchmen and Wallons in PAPPÁ were at variance among C themselves about the yeelding vp of the towne vnto the Turkes (some better minded than the rest, not willing to consent therunto) in so much, that they in the castle shot at them in the towne, and they againe at them in the castle: and that they had already received from the Turkes twentie thousand duckats, with some prouision of victuals, & were shortly after to receiue from them the rest of the money promised them, and so to deliuer the towne. For preuenting whereof, the lord Swartzenburg the two and twentieth of Iune sent the lord Sharpsenstein with a French colonnell, three thousand souldiours, certaine Petardes, and a number of scaling ladders towards PAPPÁ, whom the false rebels suffered peaceably to enter the towne the foure and twentieth of Iune, still encouraging them to come on, calling them their countreyemen and brethren, and in token of friendship shaking them by the hands, telling them, that hauing assurance of their pay, they D desired no more: But hauing now receiued in so many of them as they thought good, and as they knew they were well able to deale with, shutting the rest out, they cut them all in peeces, and afterwards in derision called vpon the high Dutches to come on in like manner. Three hundred of these rebels at the same time had laied themselves in ambush by a mill fast without the towne, who by the Wallons and Haiduckes without discovered, were also by them charged: vpon whom for all that, by reason of the shot out of the towne, they could doe no good; but hauing lost three hundred men, and amongst them Hannibal Kralcs, the lord Sharpsenstein's lieutenant generall, and one Del la Margose the chiefe engineer, they retired: VVhich losse the desperat rebels (if it had bene in their choice) had wished rather to haue happened vnto the Dutches than to the Wallons or Hungarians. About three daies after, three of these rebels being by chance taken E prisoners by the Imperials, and brought to RAB, were not only apparrelled but also trimmed after the Turkish fashion, as men not desiring longer to be accounted Christians, the rest of their fellows in the towne also all imitating the Turkes fashions, as well in their apperrell as in the manner of seruice: yet for all that would not these metamorphosed monsters yeeld the towne vnto the Turkes, before they had the full summe by them agreed vpon, the Bassa of BOSNA being commaunded from the Grand signior in all hast to prouide it for them, and so to receiue of them the towne. Neuerthelesse, for their more strength and their more credit with the Turkes, they receiued into the towne one ensigne of the Turkes, with certain waggons of victuals, brought thither with so strong a conuoy as that the Imperials durst not meddle therewith: in which wag- A most wicked gons (being discharged) they sent in bonds six hundred Hungarians and Dutch, men, women, and fast. F children, prisoners to ALBA REGALIS; being all of them glad to be so sent away, in hope to find more fauour and courtesie at the hands of their enemies, than they had found with these renegat Christians. So shortly after, these rebels sent out certaine messengers vnto the gouernour of ALBA REGALIS, to know his full resolution; which messengers (conducted by certaine Turkes of great account) were vpon the way by the free Haiduckes all intercepted, and the messengers taken, ken, with an hundred Turkes moe. In the meane while Michael Marotti, before imprisoned by G the rebels in P A P P A, by letters secretly aduertised the lord Swartzenburg of a certaine place, whereby he might (as he said) easily enter the towne, and the rather, for that the rebels were at variance amongst themselves. VVho thereupon the twelfth of Iuly came to P A P P A with nine thousand horse and foot, but disappointed of his purpose for entering the towne, hardly neuertheless belayed the same: vpon whom the mutiniers many times desperatly sallied out, & right valiantly encountered them, albeit that they were still, without any notable losse, by their enemies (too strong for them) beaten backe againe into the towne. In one of which sallies it fortuned one of their captaines to be taken, who to the terrour of the rest was presently flaine quicke, and his head and skin vpon a pike set vp before the towne, for his fellowes to behold. But the lord Swartzenburg still more and more preuailing vpon them, they sent secretly for aid to the Turkes: H whereof he for all that getting intelligence, sent also for three regiments of souldiours moe to come vnto him to the siege; by whose coming he well strengthened, and bringing his approaches neerer the towne, tooke from the rebels the mill, a strength which they very vnwillingly lost, as in hope thereby to haue the more easily receiued aid from the Turkes; who hauing made preparation to haue relieved them, were letted so to doe by the rising of the water, which had spoiled all the prouision for their reliefe at the bridge of E S S E O, as also hindered them for marching forward. At length the Imperials were come with their trenches euen to the towne ditches, out of which they had let out all the water: where some of the townefmen escaping out of the towne, declared, how that the mutinous souldiours within laboured both day and night to fortifie the towne, but to be in their worke much letted by the continuall assaults of the Imperials: I as also that they now had neither bread nor wine, nor other victuals left, more than a little salt, and threescore horse, of which they had already begun to eat: and that although they were not altogether so valiant, yet that they had resolved to die by the hands of the souldiours, as men expecting no other mercie. Yet shortly after, viz. the nine and twentieth of Iuly, they desperatly fell out vpon the trenches of Marsburgisch, a Dutch captaine; of whose souldiours they slew many, being drunke, and driuing the rest out of their trenches, raised a great alarm. Which the lord Swartzenburg hearing, hastened thither to the rescue; where with an vnluckie musket shot hee was stricken in the head and flaine. VVhereof the rebels got knowledge the same evening, and Del la Mota their Generall in reward of that seruice gaue vnto them that had made that fallie a thousand dollars to be deuided amongst them. The dead bodie of that so worthie a man, as had done great seruice for the Christian commonweale, was afterwards with great solemnitie brought to R A B, and there honourably entered. The like desperate fallie they made againe the next day, and slew of the Imperials an hundred and thirtie, and tooke certaine prisoners: and in retiring backe againe into the towne, cried aloud, That when they lacked meat, rather than they would yeeld the towne, they would eat Christians, whereof Marotti should bee the first.

The lord Swartzenburg flaine.

Pappa abandoned by the mutiniers.

The lord Swartzenburg thus flaine, the gouernment of the armie was by Matthias the archduke committed to the lord Redern, a noble man both valiant and learned, who although hee were verie sickly came vnto the camp before P A P P A the eight of August; where vnderstanding that the rebels now brought vnto extremitie, had a purpose by night to flie away and so be gon, L he caused a more vigilant and strong watch to be kept; when lo according to his expectation the next night after about two houres before day they began to issue out: whereof the watch giuing knowledge vnto the Generall, they were indeed suffered to go out as vnperceiued, but presently after at their heels were sent out the lord Nadasti and the earle of Thurn with two hundred Hussars, and after them the chiefe colonell and countie Solmes with part of their horsemen also, who in three diuers places ouertaking them neere vnto a great wood called Packem, slew most part of them: Della Mota their chiefe captaine or ringleader being flaine by the chiefe colonell, because he would not yeeld, and his head afterwards by him presented vnto the Generall in the campe. Two hundred Wallons the Hussars vnder the leading of the lord Nadasti, countie Solmes, and countie Thurn, found out in the wood; who albeit that they for a space made great resistance, yet in the end were enforced to yeeld, and so with their two ensignes were brought into the campe. The Hussars also vpon another passage light vpon other two hundred mo of these rebellious Wallons, who because they stood strongly vpon their guard, and were more desperatly set than the rest, the Generall sent out other two hundred of the colonels horsemen vpon them, by whom

A whom and the Hussars they were almost all flaine: diuers others of them also were flaine in coming out of the towne, and in the marshes therabouts. Their Generalls lieutenant with such other of their principall commanders as were taken, were by the lord Rederns commandement delivered into the Prouost martiall; the rest of the rebellious traitours he at the request of the souldiours deuided into diuers parts of the armie, there to the terrour of others to be executed, from whom the souldiours could hardly be persuaded euen for the present to hold their hands. But afterwards hauing brought them to R A B, and leaue giuen them to doe with them their pleasure, they as farre exceeded in the cruell manner of their execution, as had they before in An horrible execution. wheele; some of their skins they cut off their bodies as it were into thongs, and so poured into the wounds, vinegar, salt, and pepper; from some others they cut off their priuities; some they roasted, and some they put vnto the Tenalia; vpon some they dropped molten pitch, and then casting gunpowder vpon them, so burnt them to death; othersome they hanged vpon yron hookes; and some they set in the ground vp to the chin, and for their disport with yron bullets bowled at their heads. In all which torments no signe of compassion was to be scene, the tormentours to make their paine the greater, doing nothing but deride them; the miserable wretches in the meane time confessing the hainousnesse of their offence, and craving for death as a fauour. A most horrible thing it was to see, how whilest some were thus tortured, others were brought to see the same miserie they themselves were by and by to endure. Amongst the rest of C these exquisite torments, one Peter Orsy caused one of the mutiniers to be fowed vp in the belly of a mare, with his head hanging out, and so to be roasted; in which miserable torment he liued three houres, and then died: after which he caused the loathsome bodie so roasted, to be giuen to them that lay statuing vpon the wheele to eat. Thus was the dangerous mutinie at P A P P A with much adoe ended, and that strong towne like to haue been lost, preferred: the rebels themselves being become a dreadfull example to all posteritie, for all them to looke vpon that shall attempt the like villanie.

Now at this same time also, though neither the Christians nor the Turkes had as then any great armie in the field, yet many an hoar and bloudie skirmish passed daily betwixt them in one place or other of H V N G A R I E: all which to recount as it would be much tedious, so in silence to D passe them all ouer, were greatly to wrong those worthie personages by whom they were not without their great aduenture done. Amongst the rest, one Nicholas Horbath, countie Serinus, his lieutenant, with an hundred and fiftie souldiours, and Andrew Thust an other great comman- der, going forth to seeke for bootie, Thust hearing that the Turkes were abroad for the surpris- ing of certaine Haidukes then gone out, staid fast in a secret place yntill he might heare farther newes, Horbath another way still going on. Now it happened that the Bassa of S I G E T H hauing been abroad, in returning home by chance met with Horbath, and encountering with him ouer- threw him, and slew most of his men, Horbath himselfe by flight hardly cleaping. But Thust hearing this skirmish, as lying close not farre off, and now hastning thither to haue been partaker thereof, found the Bassa yet in the field on foot, knowing the bodies of the flaine: vpon whom E he came so suddenly and with such force, as that the Bassa with his disordered men had much adoe to take horse, and so without any great resistance to betake himselfe to flight: after whom the Hungarians fiercely following, slew many of the Turkes, and amongst the rest the Bassa himselfe, whose head presently cut off, Horbath sent to the countie Serinus, who shortly after by Thust himselfe sent it to Matthias the archduke. This Bassa was a man of great strength and courage, a most expert and aduenturous captaine, about thirtie six yeares old, and for his valour of a common souldiour created a Bassa by the great Sultan. His head being brought to V I E N N A, and there shewed to the Bassa of Buda then there prisoner, and he demanded whether he knew it or not, sighing answered, that he knew it well, and that it was the head of the Bassa of S I G E T H, a braver man than whom the Sultan had none in all his empire, earnestly withall desiring to know how he was flaine. And not long after the aduenturers out of C O M A R A, S T R I G O N I A, and other places thereabout hauing made a great parrie, and taken a great bootie from the Turke at a faire at C O M A R A, and by T R I A and E S S E O, thinking to haue passed Danubius in hope of a greater bootie, leuen hundred of them being passed the river, were by the new Bassa of S I G E T H and others with fuge thousand Turkes in an hoar skirmish, querthrowne yee, nor without their great great losse also: the Bassa himselfe with two other Sanzackes and five hundred Turkes being there slaine, and but fiftie of the Christian aduenturers left dead in the place, the rest disorderedly retiring to their boats, being for most part drowned in the Danubie. The free Haiduckes also surprised I V L A and set it on fire, in which confusion the Turkes flying into the castle, for hast thrust one another from the bridge into the castle ditch; wherein so many of them were drowned, that a man might haue gone drie foot ouer vpon the bodie of the dead. They tooke there also six hundred prisoners with much other bootie, and deliuered two hundred Christians which were there captiues. And albeit that these Haiduckes after this exploit done were hardly pursued by the Turkes from other places, yet they in safetie retired with such bootie as they had already gotten.

But now to leaue these troubles of H V N G A R I E for a while, as the fore-runners of greater here long to ensue; let vs againe looke backe into T R A N S Y L V A N I A and V A L A C H I A, to see how Michael the Vayuod now in the meane time behaued himselfe there. The Cardinall Bathor ouerthrowne and slaine, and the countrey of T R A N S Y L V A N I A againe brought vnder the emperours obedience; the Vayuod by his embassadours gaue him forthwith to vnderstand of all his proceedings, with the whole successe thereof, as also of a purpose he had to inuade M O L D A V I A: for that it was commonly reported, and also beleued, that Sigismund the late prince (not a little moued with the death of the Cardinall his cousin, and the reuolt of his countrey) aided by the Turkes, the Tartars, and Moldauians, would now attempt some great matter for the recouerie of T R A N S Y L V A N I A: All which was shortly after the rather thought to be true, for that diuers of his spies being taken, some at C L A V S E N B U R G, some at N A S S E N, beside the letters that were found about them from him vnto the nobilitie and states of T R A N S Y L V A N I A (persuading them to reuolt from the Vayuod vnto him, and that his meaning was shortly to come with a great armie out of P O L O N I A for the repulsing of him) they also of themselves confessed, how that Sigismund in disguised apparell had himselfe beene in T R A N S Y L V A N I A, to conferre with diuers his secret friends concerning that matter. Which his embassadours the emperor honourably entertained, and by them confirmed vnto the Vayuod the gouernment of T R A N S Y L V A N I A, sending also vnto him diuers honourable presents; forbidding him neuertheless to inuade M O L D A V I A, for feare of raising a new and dangerous warre against the Polonians also, vnder whose protection and the Turkes the Palatine thereof then rested. According vnto which commaund the Vayuod staied his intended expedition; yet sending some good part of his forces vnto the frontiers of M O L D A V I A, for feare of Sigismund whom he heard to be hatching some mischief in P O L O N I A, and euen then to lie vpon the frontiers of that countrey. Some few moneths thus passing, Husraim Aga (a graue reuerend old man, and much employed by the Turkish Sultan) with five other Turkes of good account, embassadours from the great Sultan, and a great retinue following him, came to C R O N S T A T in T R A N S Y L V A N I A where the Vayuod then lay. Of whose coming the Vayuod hearing, with foure thousand horsemen most brauely mounted, went halfe a mile out of the citie to meet them: the footmen in the meane time on both sides of the street standing in good order, from the gate of the citie whereby they were to enter, euen vnto the Vayuods lodging; where stood also his guard all in red and white silke. So meeting in the field, they both alighted from their horses, with great reverence saluting the one the other: when presently the embassadour embracing the Vayuod, vngirt his scimitar, and in the name of the great Sultan put another about him, so richly garnished with gold and precious stones, as that no part of the scaberd was therefore to be seen: Besides this, he presented him with a faire plume of blacke Hearn feathers mixed with some white (a right goodly ornament, in forme of a great bush) which the Vayuod would not in the field put vpon his head, although he were thereunto by the embassadour most earnestly requested, but caused it to be carried before him: He also presented him with two verie faire red ensignes, in token of the Turkes fauour and protection; the one for himselfe, and the other for his sonne Petrasco: moreouer, hee gaue vnto him two exceeding faire horses richly furnished, with foure others, and a most faire faulcon. The Vayuod himselfe was most brauely mounted, and (after the maner of his countrey) had ten verie faire spare horses led before him. At whose entrance into the towne, all the great ordinance was discharged, with great volleys of small shot. And so the embassadour still riding on the left hand of the Vayuod, being brought to his lodging, had six of his chiefe followers euerie one of them presented with a rich robe of cloth of gold; in requitall

Vayuod.

A requitall whereof the embassadour rewarded an hundred of the Vayuod his followers euerie one of them with a good fure of apparell: with this embassadour of the Turkes was also the Polonian embassadour, whom the Vayuod in like manner honourably entertained. These embassadours (as was thought) did what they might to haue drawne this worthie and renowned man, together with the counties of T R A N S Y L V A N I A and V A L A C H I A, from the emperor vnto the Turkes obedience: howbeit he seldome or neuer spake with them; but thither either before or after he had conference with the lords Vignad and Zekell (the emperours commissioners) concerning their requests; alwaies protesting vnto them, not to yeeld to any thing without the emperours consent and good liking. Whereof Mahomet aduertised, and that he was not by any thing yet said or done to be remoued from the emperor; gaue him by the same embassadours to vnderstand, how that he was in some speech with the emperor concerning peace (as indeed he then was by messengers from the Basses at P R E S B U R G) which if it sortted to effect, that then all should be well; but if not, that then it should be good for him whilst he had yet time; wisely to consider of his owne estate, and to submit himselfe vnto his protection who was able to defend him, rather than for the vaine praise of a certaine foolish constancie; to aduenture himselfe with all that he had vnto most certaine danger and destruction: promising him in recompence of that his loyalty, to giue vnto him for euer the counties of T R A N S Y L V A N I A, V A L A C H I A, and M O L D A V I A; and at his need to furnish him both with men and money; offering moreover to make him a great commaunder in his armie in H V N G A R I E; and the Bassa of T M E S V V A R as his friend to be at all times readie with fiftie thousand horse and foot (as need should be) to asist him against the emperor, reseruing vnto himselfe whatsoeuer he should more win from him: for all which bountie and kindnesse, requiring onely to haue him vnto him loyall. All which his large offers the Vayuod little regarding, declared the same vnto the emperours commissioners; yet still protesting neuer to start, but to stand fast for the Christian emperor. Notwithstanding as a man desirous to better his estate, he tooke hereupon occasion to request of the emperor the countrey of T R A N S Y L V A N I A, by him so lately taken in, vnto him and his sonne in inheritance for euer, with such frontier townes as in former time belonged vnto T R A N S Y L V A N I A: and that whatsoeuer he should win from the Turkes, might be his and his sonnes: He also requested, that all the preferments and dignities in former time granted by his Imperial majestie vnto Sigismund the late prince, might now be bestowed vpon himselfe; and for his seruice done, to be furnished with money for the payment of his souldiers: And that the emperor with the other princes of the empire should assure him, that if he were taken by the Turke, they should raunsome him: but in case he were by the great power of the Turke driuen out of those countries, then by the emperours appointment to haue some conuenient place allotted vnto him in the vpper H V N G A R I E to liue in, with the yearly pension of an hundred thousand dollars. All which his requests if it would please him to grant, he promised this yeare to doe so much against the Turke, as had not in an hundred yeares beene done before: with vaunt, that if he had had the employment of the money which was spent in the time of this war, he would not haue doubted but to haue brought all the counties from the Euxine (or Blacke sea) to B V D A, A L B A R E G A L I S, and S O L N O C K, vnder the emperours obedience. A large promise indeed, but hardly to haue been performed by a farre greater prince than he.

Thus whilst things stood in discourse after the Cardinals death, Sigismund the late prince in the meane time supported by the Polonians, with the aid of the Turkes, the Tartars, and the Moldauians, was readie to haue inuaded T R A N S Y L V A N I A: yea the Tartars (as the fore-runners of his greater power) were already entred the countrey, and had out of the frontiers thereof carried away some bootie. Whereof the Vayuod vnderstanding, in great hast assembled his forried away some bootie. Which in short time was growne to some good head, the countrey people ces out of all places, which in short time was growne to some good head, the countrey people together with the free Haiduckes (an aduenturous and resolute kind of souldiers) in great number daily resorting vnto him. So being now eight thousand strong, and most of them braue and lustie men, he with them and twentie pieces of artillerie remoued to C R O N S T A T the foure and twentieth day of Aprill, sending part of his armie (which euerie day more and more increased) before him to N E S S E N: where all his forces being assembled to the number of almost fiftie thousand horse and foot, hee with great sceleritie passed the rough and high mountaines into M O L D A V I A without resistance, but yet not without some trouble, his souldiers by the way being glad sometimes to eat the leaues of trees, the enemy hauing of purpose before carried away what-whatsoever he could that might haue yeelded him reliefe. Of whose speedie comming and great strength, Sigismund and Jeremias the Vayuod of Moldavia hearing, and vpon the reasonable estimate of their owne forces finding themselves too weak to encounter him, retired themselves out of Moldavia into the frontiers of Polonia, there to gather greater strength, and so to meet him: for as yet Jeremias the Vayuod had not received from the Turke such forces as were vnto him promised, and as he still expected. Michael the Vayuod in the meane time (his enemies thus fled) with fire and sword entering into Moldavia, tooke in the greatest part thereof, the fearefull countrey people still yeelding vnto him as he went: and the rather, for that Jeremias their Vayuod (placed by the Polonian, but tributarie vnto the Turke) had laied vpon them a most grievous imposition, as vpon euery man a duckat a moneth, for which they exceedingly hated him. But here in Moldavia, Michael the Vayuod (hauing still in his companie H one of the emperours commissioners in Transylvania most trustie seruants, who might faithfully report vnto them the whole manner of their proceedings) after the departure of Sigismund and Jeremias his enemies, staied not long; but hearing that they were retired towards the confines of Polonia, without longer delay made towards them, and the eighteenth of May found them by the castle Othvne nere vnto the riuer Nester, being thirtie thousand strong; Polonians, Moldauians, Turkes, and Tartars: with whom he joynd a most fierce and cruell battell, which begun about ten a clocke before noone, was with great courage but greater obstinacie on both sides maintained vntill the euening. At which time the fortune of the Valachian preuayling, his enemies at last betooke themselves to flight, of whom were there slaine eight thousand, beside many others of them drowned in the riuer Nester: where of the Valachians were lost two thousand onely. Concerning Sigismund and Jeremias, diuers reports were after this ouerthrow giuen out, some saying that they were slaine, and some that they were in flying drowned: howbeit the truth was, that they both by flight escaped, to the greater trouble of themselves as of their afflicted countries also. Michael after this so notable victorie, taking in the rest of Moldavia, caused the people to sweare their obedience vnto the emperour, himselfe, and his sonne, to the great offence of the Polonians, not a little (as they tooke it) wronged therein; but especially of the great Chancellor, an old enimie vnto the house of Austria. W hereof ensued greater troubles in those frontier countries than before, to the further effusion of more Christian blood, much better to haue been employed against the fatal enimie in defence of the Christian common-weale. Yet thus the three warlike and frontier countries of Transylvania, Valachia, and Moldavia, the furest bulwarkes of that side of Christiendome, and most exposed vnto the furie of the common enimie, were now once againe vnited vnder the obedience of the emperour, to the great benefit (no doubt) of the Christian common-weale, and hurt of the Turkes; if they might haue so continued, as God wot they did not long.

Now the Vayuod notwithstanding this so great a victorie, well considering that he of himselfe could hardly keepe this new gained prouince of Moldavia against the power of the Turke, pretending that to him it belonged as his own to giue to whom he pleased: as also against the Polonians (not more desirous to restore Jeremias againe into Moldavia, than the prince Sigismund into Transylvania) without the help of some other more mightie prince whom he might rest vpon: by his embassadours (sent for that purpose) offered the soueraignie of all those three countries vnto the emperour, with condition, that he should appoint him perpetuall Gouvernour of the same vnder him. The emperour also understood how that Mahomet the great Turke had not long before againe sent vnto him another of his Chiaus, commaunding him without delay to restore the countrey of Transylvania vnto the prince Sigismund (vnto whom he was by the mediation of the king of Polonia now before reconciled) threatening otherwise with fire and sword to destroy Valachia, and by force of armes to deprive him both of Transylvania and his life together. W herefore the emperour doubting least the Vayuod either for feare, or for the better assuring of his owne estate, should to his prejudice fall to some agreement with the Turke, yeelded to all that his embassadours had of him requested: with condition, that he should be bound as need should require to serue with his people against the Turke; and that in Transylvania nere vnto his owne person should be alwaies resident one of the emperours counsellors, as Superintendent ouer the whole countrey. W herewith the Vayuod being contented, the Emperour sent thither doctore Petren with six thousand souldiours, and a great summe of money to pay the Vayuods souldiours, as he had before requested; and Moldavia subdued by Michael.

A so to take of them an oath, That they should from thenceforth become his majesties faithfull seruants. W hich Superintendent so by the emperour sent, the Vayuod receiued with great honour, as vnto him of all others most welcome. Neuerthelesse being againe returned into Transylvania, it was not long, but that (without regard of him) he bega with new exactions to oppress the people of that countrey, and in some sort to tyrannize ouer them; vsing great seueritie against diuers of the Nobilitie also, especially such as he knew to haue taken part before with the Cardinall, or now of late with Sigismund his cousin, or anyway to haue fauoured his quarrell. All which he did without the consent or good liking of Petren, contrarie to his promise made, No more to embroe his hands in the blood of the nobilitie of Transylvania, without the knowledge or consent of his Imperiall majestie, or the Superintendent by him appointed: which for B all that had he not done, he could not possibly haue kept them (disdaining to be gouerned by him) vnder his obeisance. Neuerthelesse the Transylvanians taking it in euill part to be so oppressed, and the nobilitie almost extinguished, yea and indeed to be at all ruled by him; by generall consent as if it had been but one man, rise all vp in armes against him: insomuch, that he finding himselfe with his Valachians and other his fauourits too weak for them, retired with all such as would follow him into the mountaines, and from thence sent presently for aid vnto the lord George Basta (a worthy capitaine and then the emperours lieutenant in the vpper Hungarie) for the subduing of these rebellious people, and the reducing of them to their former obedience: W ho by letters from Matthias the Archduke at the instance of the Vayuod commaunded so to doe, with about six thousand horse and foot, and eight field pieces, remoued from Cassovia in the vpper Hungarie the fourth of September: W here by the way came vnto him embassadours also from the people of Transylvania now vp in armes, and confederat also against the Vayuod: who in like manner also requested his aid, pretending themselves to be the emperours most loyall subjects, but not vnder the gouernment of such a tyrant as was the Vayuod: alleading and exaggerating many his most cruell actions, and clearly protesting, That for the present want of a good Gouvernour they were enforced for the safeguard of their owne liues to band themselves together: which if happily it might be in any thing prejudiciall vnto the emperour his claime and interest, which he with so great toyle and cost had procured in that prouince, it was against their wils, as enforced by necessitie to doe that they did in defence of themselves. W hich embassadours so sent from the people, Basta with all speed dispatched away backe again, D comforting them without farther stir to expect his arriual in Transylvania: yet covenanted withall, That they should before conceiue into writing the oath of their fidelitie and allegiance vnto his Imperiall majestie. Now might many and important considerations trouble the mind of Basta in so doubtfull a case. To giue aid vnto the Vayuod against the people, was the expresse order from Matthias the Archduke the emperours lieutenant Generall: but to aid the people confederat against him as they had requested, seemed now both more profitable and honest, especially hauing most certaine tokens of the small and doubtfull faith of the Vayuod; who onely by deputation interested in that prouidence, was not so carefull of an other mans; neither seeming to haue regard of Petren, or of his owne word giuen, for not farther embroing his hands in the blood of the nobilitie of Transylvania, without the emperours knowledge and leaue: E vpon which promise was also grounded the Archdukes order for giuing of him aid. So that such breach of his faith, and contempt of Petren had hastened the conspiracie of the people against him, dispairing of all other health than that which by force of armes they could procure themselves. To stand doubtfull himselfe, or to hold others in suspense, vntill that by courours in this new case he might receive new instructions from the emperour or the archduke, had in it too much danger, as giuing leisure to each partie to make sides, and to encrease the slander of the last yeare, That he might so easily (and especially from the Valachian) haue assured that pro- uince to his majestie, had he not bene an heartlesse man of no resolution, euen such an one as durst not looke vpon a cat (as some had said:) all which might not a little pricke an honourable mind. To take part with the people confederat against the Vayuod, if it should not happily fall out at the first encounter; might betwixt the two contendants giue an entrance vnto the third, F either the Turke or the Polonian in the fauour of Bastor: but if it should fort to the quite contrarie, and so himselfe to loose the day; then he saw himselfe void of all defence against the malicious, especially in that the world commonly measureth the wisdome vied in any action, according to the successe thereof, than which nothing can be more vnreasonable, but about all others in

to stand vpon that wing to giue the first charge; hee gaue order vnto Rechuz his lieutenant G and colonell of the Ruters, which had the leading of the left wing, that he should at a certaine signe giuen, set forwards towards the left hand; for the charging of that great Squadron. So his people being set in order, and the manner of proceeding set downe, hee putting on his helmet, with cheerefull countenance said, That at that time he trusted hee should shew vnto the Vayuod, that his truncheon could doe more than his scimitare: And himselfe setting forward betwixt the Squadron of the Almaine footmen and the wing of the musketers, about two houres after noone, marched faire and softly towards the enemy: who without mouing expected the discharging of their artillerie; whereunto the neerer that the enemy came vnto it, the lesse harme it did him, by shooting either ouer or short in the field, which easily ascended. H The wing of musketers went directly to giue a charge vnto the artillerie; and the Squadron towards the foot of the hill, where Bassa desired forcibly to charge, that thereby they might be enforced to spend their first volles, and with some discouragement or disorder to retire, presently came in all afront just vpon the signe giuen; and so with his Almaine footmen and the Ruters on the right hand, enclosed and compassed in behind the greatest part of the enemies footmen. At which very instant, the Ruters on the left hand also so courageously charged vpon the three thousand lances, that better could not haue beene desired of any band of most old and expert souldiours. The lances retiring without any hurt, and the first volley discharged, forced the infanterie, and so disordered the rest. Whereupon the wings charging, there ensued presently a great slaughter and ouerthrow, onely partie of Bassa his men being slaine, and as many hurt; where of the enemies were lost in the battell ten thousand: and greater had I the slaughter beene, if the village and approach of the night had not couered many of them that fled, and stayed the pursuite of the victors that followed them. Which putteth me in remembrance of the great victorie that Scipio Asiaticus had against Antiochus, wherein were slaine of the Romanes but three hundred (although that in the fight one of the wings stood for a time doubtfull) there being lost of the enemies about fiftie thousand. Howbeit there were afterwards found in all (as was by the peasants of the countrey reported) twentie thousand slaine in this battell. By this victorie Bassa recouered many ensignes and much armour, before sent by the emperor vnto the Vayuod, together with all his tents and baggage. And presently after the ouerthrow there were many troupes of horsemen sent out euery way: with proclamation, To spare the liues of such of the Siculi as should lay downe their armes: of K whom many were sent prisoners vnto diuers places, especially to Fogaras, a strong towne toward VALACHIA. As for the Vayuod himselfe, hee with certaine Cossackes escaped by flight.

The morrow following, Bassa dispatched away the Countie Canviali, to enforce the emperor of all the particularities of the successe of that expedition: who seemed to bee therewith pleased, yet neither gaue reward vnto the Countie, neither commended Bassa in that he had done, (foreseeing perhaps what was to ensue thereof) although hee had in writing before approoued his resolution and motion made in fauour of the Confederates. Staying that day in that quarter, Bassa gaue order vnto the Chiaki, to send out a thousand horsemen to pursue the flying Vayuod: who in stead of so doing, joyning themselves with other their conforts, settled themselves to ranlacke ALBA IULIA, vnder the colour, that there was the Vayuods wealth and substance; yet (as the manner of such men is) sparing neither marchant nor citizen: which worthily seemed vnto Bassa a great wrong, for to see the innocent punished, and the guiltie to escape free. And albeit that he made what hast he might thitherwards with all his campe, and so stayed one day not farre from thence, to haue giuen some redresse vnto the spoile that had happened: yet was all that his labour lost, for that so many of the greater fort and chiefest amongst them had their hands therein, with whom he thought it more wisdom as then to dissemble, than to fall into any tearmies of severitie; without hope of doing any good. So he resolved in all hast to march towards Fogaras (whither he heard say the Vayuod was come with new forces out of VALACHIA and MOLDAVIA) and in six daies march came to CIBINIVM, where he receiued certaine newes: That the Great Chancellour of POLONIA, and Sigismund (sometime the Transylvanian prince) were with a strong armie vpon the frontiers of MOLDAVIA; hauing sent before them Moses the Sicilian, with about eight thousand of the Siculi (his souldiours) to what purpose was easie to bee scene. Which aduer-

This Chiaki was the chiefe man, and as it were the ring leader of the Transylvanians in this rebellion.

A aduertisement interrupted the course of Bassa his victorie, for that it seemed not reasonable to pursue the enemy, and to leaue behind him a doubt of so great importance: and especially, for that he thought he could not assure himselfe of the aid of the countrey people, in case that Sigismund their old prince were once scene in TRANSYLVANIA. Wherefore he thought good to stay where he was, to prouide for all euents as need should be; and so resolved to send the Chiaki and one Ladislav Pithi to parley with Moses, who made a shew of no great moment of his good will towards the confederats. In the meane time came two messengers from the Vayuod, offering in his name, that he should doe whatsoever were in the behalfe of the emperor to be imposed vpon him: vnto whom these conditions were by Bassa and the rest of the counsell propounded: First, that hee should for euer resigne all the claime hee had or might haue into the B countrey of TRANSYLVANIA; then, that he together with his armie should giue his oath of fidelitie vnto his imperiall maiestie; also, that he should forthwith through VALACHIA go with his armie vnto the frontiers of MOLDAVIA, to stay the Polonians from further entrance; and moreover, to giue his wife and little sonne in hostage for the performance of these things. With which messengers was sent one Sebastian Tschelli, to receiue the oath and promised hostages: vnto whom was appointed for the place of their safe keeping, the bishops castle in ALBA IULIA, the Vayuod hauing before requested, that they might be so kept in TRANSYLVANIA: although Bassa thought it much better to haue had them kept in the vpper HUNGARIE. This agreement being made, Bassa kept on his way towards Fogaras, which he found already possessed by the Chiaki, and so from thence to CORONA. After which the Vayuod distrustful of the articles C agreed vpon, went directly into VALACHIA, but not at all into MOLDAVIA; nor so much discomfited with the forces of the Polonians whom he went against (not doubting to giue them a great ouerthrow) as for the distrust he had of Moses the Sicilian, who in the battell might shew himselfe his enemy behind him. Now whether it were for the distrust he had in his owne followers, or onely for feare of treason by the Polonians plotted, being not likely that they with so small forces were come to fight, without some greater secret deceit; he not knowing whom to trust or to feare, of his owne accord tooke his flight into the strength of the mountaines, without any great losse of his people, hauing left his baggage behind him, which was assailed and taken by the Haiduckes and such other tharckers enured to prey, and alwaies readie in like occasion to helpe to spoile and chase them that are already running: although that afterwards in diuers D skirmishes with the Turkes (who to cause him the rather to turne his backe vnto the Polonians, had presumptuously scoured vp and downe the countrey) he lost many. In fine, giuing MOLDAVIA lost, he was now out of hope how to be able to hold only VALACHIA, his old government. Euen he which but a little before commaunded about an hundred thousand souldiours in field: he (which in despite of who said nay) was able to commaund VALACHIA and MOLDAVIA, and happily the other countrees also neere vnto him; as hauing receiued the commaund of TRANSYLVANIA, as gouernour for the emperor: he that made CONSTANTINOPLE to tremble, and found no empire equall to his desires. But it fareth oftentimes with the great, as with birds of prey, who greedily seeking to prey vpon others, become themselves a prey vnto other, greater than themselves: for they neuer contented, and attributing onely vnto their owne E valour and wisdom, their owne prosperous proceedings, are the true shoares of the vnsable wheele of fortune: or what say I of fortune: being rather the very children of folle. So commonly fallerth it out with princes (especially the new) which in the garboles of warre betwixt their mightie neighbours, not gouerned by their owne wisdom, rest themselves only vpon the aduice of their counsellours, are by them led they wote not whither, for the great interest they haue in them. For had the Vayuod had but the least sight into politick gouernment, he might well haue vnderstood, that amongst so many mightie princes, he could not much grow, or yet well root himselfe, without the assured stay of some one or other of them. He should also haue knowne within what compass a new prince ought to haue vsed severity and rigour; and that he ought to abstaine from all offence in goods, or otherwise, which might any way procure F vnto him the displeasure or hatred of his subjects. Whereas his counsellours not so much respecting his profit as their owne, had not the power or not the will to perswade him so by good meanes to plant himselfe sure in TRANSYLVANIA; but so both cast him headlong from his high estate, and at the same time furthered the losse of CANISIA, a matter of important consequence.

A reconciliation made betwixt Michael the Vayuod & Bassa.

Michael for feare of being betrayed vnto the Polonians, taketh his flight into the mountaines.

Now lay Basta encamped in the field in TRANSYLVANIA, when a messenger came vnto G him from the great Chancellor of POLONIA, to declare vnto him, That it was not his purpose to trouble TRANSYLVANIA, hauing no such order from his king: albeit that he would aduise the Transylvanians if they wished to liue in quiet, to make choice of a prince of their owne nation, and such an one as the Turke should well like of, whereas otherwise they should but seeke their owne destruction, together with their neighbours. VVhich his counsell was well marked of them all, albeit that it was thought by many of the wiser fort not so much to proceed of any good meaning he had towards the Transylvanians, as of an old grudge and inueterat hatred hee had alwaies borne against the house of AUSTRIA: as also that he euen then countenanced the prince Sigismund with his armie, to no other end, but by him to raise vp new stirres in that prouince, and so to draw it from the emperours obedience, although thereby it became againe tributarie vnto the Turke, who in all these matters had a great hand. Yea some stuck not to say, That he couertly aimed at that principallitie for his sonne, howsoever he masked the same vnder the shew of Sigismund the late prince. But vnto him answere was giuen by the Transylvanians in generall (with thanks for his good will) that in all their consultations they would haue a principall regard of their owne welfare, together with the common: VVhich answere he hauing receiued, forthwith placed one Simon (the brother of Hieremias the Moldauian) Vayuod of VALACHIA in stead of Michael by him driuen out, and so leauing a conuenient number of souldi- G ors with him, returned himselfe towards POLONIA. Vnto which election so made by the Polonian, the Turkes craftily gaue place, knowing well to play the foxes where they could not play the Lyons, wisely for a time comporting the iniurie: and the old Chancellor as craftie as they, hauing a secret purpose by occasion of these present troubles, to preferre his sonne at length vnto the principallitie of TRANSYLVANIA, and therunto also to joyne the countiees of MOLDAVIA and VALACHIA, had therein purpose placed the aforesaid Simon, a man of no valour, and of a small apprehension, whom he might again at his pleasure displace, and joyne those prouinces vnto his new purchase; which he could not so well doe, if he should haue there placed a man of greater reach and courage. So worke the heads of the great, and so trauell the braines of the ambitious aspiring.

False rumours

astonish Basta.

Basta vnderstanding of the retiring of the Polonians, entred into consultation with the Chiaki and other the principall men of that prouince (which lodged with the armie in the countie villages thereabout) for calling together the states and people, to make choice of some such men K as they thought meetest to be sent vnto the emperor, to know his pleasure for the government of that prouince. But now in the meane time, whilst there was no suspicion of the forraigne enemy, began to worke certaine Malecontents, which thinking with greater libertie to liue vnder a weake prince than vnder one of greater power, with one voice cried out, That Sigismund with a great power was entered into the confines of TRANSYLVANIA; one whilst towards VALACHIA, another while by the way of MOLDAVIA; and that the strength of the countie and others therby still resorted vnto him: with other such like inuentions, of purpose deuised to haue made Basta suddenly departed, or at leastwise to haue troubled the Diet or assembly called, and the consultation also. But he well aduised of their purpose, moued not out of his quarter, but there lay very priuately, to declare thereby the great confidence he had in the thankfulness of the nobilitie of the countie, as by him deliuered from the oppression of the Vayuod: as also to make them to vnderstand, That the government to be appointed, was not to be seded in the sole power of a tyrant, but in the fidelitie of the subjects protected vnder a most gentle, royall, and most fatherlike government, not ambitiously sought after, but most voluntarily of themselves offered, and (for the common good) by the emperor accepted. Beside that, he knew right well how that Castaldo (in like case before in the yeare 1551 sent into TRANSYLVANIA with eight thousand Almaines) left behind him his armie, and without any precedent courtesie went priuately to ALBA IULIA, where queene Isabel had for her defence assembled a Diet of all the states, and there by well handling of the matter got to Ferdinand the emperor that kingdom, which hee could not by the fear of his forces haue gained: for which doing, VVriters attribute vnto him the name M of great wisdom; notwithstanding that the yeare following he was enforced to abandon his conquest, but yet not through any default in himselfe.

But it is truly said, That men pleased, according to the occasion change their manners, as doth the Chamelion his colour according to the place: nothing being by nature so short, nothing of

A of lesse life than the remembrance of a benefite with the vnthankfull, which the greater it is, the more it is repaid with vngratitnde; either by making it to haue been of little worth, or to haue proceeded not of courtesie, but from some other more priuat, and proper considerations of the giuer. The Diet (aforesaid) being assembled, diuers broiles were there raised by the malecontents, as usually it cometh to passe where the people haue to doe with the government: apt to be moued with euerie rumour, alwaies readie to change their opinion as streight gluted therewith, headstrong, faithlesse, all in words to no end: Some of them in that assembly cried out, that the Almaines might be paid, discharged, and thanked for the paines they had taken for them as their neighbours, with offering to doe them the like pleasure as their occasions should require: other some cried to haue them all put to the sword, so much they were deuoid of reason: B others cried out as fast, that they were not by any meanes to endure the government of Maximilian the Archduke, but by some nominated vnto them: would needs haue a prince of their owne countie, and such an one as the great Turke should well like of, as the Chancellor had perswaded them: Basta for all that not dismayed with so vnexpected an encounter (albeit that he began to suspect that he had lost all his labour, if he were not in short time with greater forces relieved) at such time as the Chiaki with other the chiefe men amongst the people, came as their manner was euerie other day to visit him: with couragious speech and vnappauled countenance told them plainly, That he well perceiued their dust and purpose; and yet doubted not either of their oath of obedience giuen vnto his Imperiall maiestie, either of the fresh remembrance of the great benefite they had from him so lately receiued; and in case it might happen them little to C esteeme of those things (greater than which could not happen amongst men) that yet they should well know, that he was not a man to be feared with words, but fully resolued not to stirre one foot thence with his forces but rather to lose his life, which he would for all that sell as deere as he could. VVherunto answere was giuen with much courteous speech, That he should not giue eare vnto any the speeches of the light vulgar people; but to content himselfe that the Nobilitie in whose hands the chiefe power of that prouince was, had not done any thing not becoming themselves. So after much dispute, were appointed three persons according to the three estates (the Nobilitie, the Commons, and the State in generall) to go vnto the Emperour, to request of him Maximilian the Archduke for their Governour: with speciall request also, that it would please him not to ouercharge with forreign soldiours that prouince already sore impouerished; especially D hauing in it selfe people sufficient for the defence thereof, and more nimble to encounter with the Turkes, than the heauie and slow Almaines and they also of double charge. These difficulties with much adoe thus appeased by such as stood fast for the emperor, Basta thought it not good againe to call any such assembly, hoping that time and the emperors great wisdom, would for all these matters find conuenient remedie. Yet saw he plainly, the mind of the people was to resolve to remaine for euer free, if they should haue come to a second consultation; and in them a princely desire to commaund rather than to be commaunded: Yea in that selfesame Diet the Chiaki was declared Gouvernour on the behalfe of the people, with authoritie in many things of himselfe to determine without calling together of any assembly of the rest of the States: which they said they did only vntill they were by his Imperiall maiestie provided of a Governour. Ne- E uertheless Basta well perceiued more than a Tribunitiall power to be now joynd by the people vnto the emperours commissioners, knowing that this Chiaki was in great hope to haue bene proclaimed prince of the confederats, in case they had not bene presently relieved against the proclaimed prince of the confederats, still his great ambition, for that marching from TORDA Vayuod: and hauing in him yet noted still his great ambition, for that marching from TORDA toward the Vayuod, he caused to be carried before him a speare with an Hungarian cap, and a plume of feathers vpon a lance; in token of his chiefe commaund; albeit that afterwards at the complaint of Basta, pretending therein a wrong to be done vnto his regiment marching vnder the Imperiall standard, he tooke it downe: neither was he then a little suspected to haue suffered his souldiours to haue sacked ALBA IULIA, also to haue surpris'd FOORAS; and to haue meddled yet better to dissemble than to proceed farther, and then to doe it in deed when he had power sufficient. F
The next day following came all the Counsell of that prouince, with the Deputies (appointed to haue gone vnto the emperor) and the people vnto the house of Basta, requesting him (albeit that such their manner of comming might seeme to exceed the bounds of request) that hee would would send his Germanes out of the country, and so after so many troubles to giue it leaue a little to breath: as for himselfe, that he might stay at ALBA IULIA, vntill the men depuited to that purpose might go vnto his majestie with their requests. Bassa not a little troubled with such an imperious request, and now (but not before) perceiving the occasion of this great discontentment; saw himselfe much deceiued in a most materiall point and the ground of all this action, by trusting too much vnto his owne too small forces, too weake for the defence of his owne person, much lesse to keepe vnder so populous a prouince, such as before in the yeare 1552 vnder the leading of Castaldo, had of it selfe sent out 70 thousand fighting men for the besieging of LIPPA, and now vpon the sudden twelue thousand with a few noble men in the face of a mightie and armed enemy; where they now held an armed consultation with him, the Nobilitie meeting together with their great retinues; and so much the greater, by how much the suspicion was the more by them feared, for them to be enforced to resolue vpon any thing contrarie to their good liking; whereas he contenting himselfe onely with their oath without any other hostages, and so giuing aid vnto the confederats, had put himselfe vpon their faith, together with all his people, into the midst of TRANSYLVANIA; a matter of far greater importance than any pledge they were able to haue giuen him. Besides that, of the six thousand men which he had brought with him into that country, three thousand five hundred of SILESIA now brought to two thousand, could not be persuaded longer to stay without their pay before hand, the pay of their country being already spent: and the rest drawn out of the garrisons of the vpper HUNGARY, or else there pressed, were at a certaine time to returne. Yet neuerthelesse he attempted in some sort to satisfie their request, for not grieuing of the country, by requesting of them to deliuer vnto him some strong place, whereinto he putting his men in garrison, they might so lie without any farther charge or trouble to the country, liuing vpon their owne wages. Which when he could not obtaine, and withall considering that if those few of his people which yet remained could be contented to stay with him, the retaining of them might giue occasion vnto the desirous of new stirs vpon euery the least disorder of the souldiours, to alter the matter at their pleasure; as had happened vnto the eight thousand Almaines of Castaldo, driuen sometimes out of that country vnder the colour of some insolencie by them committed, although others had been the chiefe doers thereof, namely about some twentie Polonians: he resolued of all these things to giue notice to the Court, and so faire and softly to march with his souldiours vnto the confines of that country; and to saue his eight pieces of artillerie with his other munition in Samos Viua castle, a strong fortesse a good way within the confines, which together with the strong castle of KVIVAR, Aga Leche an Albanoise and Generall of the Vaiuods horsemen deliuered to Zakel capitaine of ZACCOMAR, one of his majesties commissioners; who there provided for the Gouvernor Bassa his familiar fauourit: although that the Transylvanians had with great promises sought to haue crossed such deliuerie of the aforesaid castles, and to haue had them in their owne power.

The discretion of

Wherefore Bassa not deceiued, but by necessitie enforced, yeelded that he could not hold, and gaue that he could not sell, making a vertue of necessitie; deceiued in the euent of the matter which he had propounded vnto himselfe from the beginning, for the assurance of that country vnto the emperor, by an excusable error; if it be true that some wise men say, Nothing to be more vnreasonable than by the euent of matters to iudge of their wisdom by whom they were managed; which consisteth not in diuining before of the certaintie of the euent; but in the reasonable conjecture thereof, by the means leading thereunto, than which nothing is more deceitfull, as not depending from our owne actions onely, but from other mens also more grosse and vnreasonable: none knowing better how much the wisdom of man deceiueh it selfe, than those which are vnto themselves true witnesses of the euent of their owne consultations. Neuerthelesse the matter was afterward so well handled by Bassa, Petren, and others the emperours great fauourits in TRANSYLVANIA, that in a Diet holden by the Transylvanians, he was with a convenient guard againe by them receiued as the Emperours lieutenant, vntill further order were by him taken for the government and assurance of that country: the Chiaki and his complices faintly consenting thereunto, as not greatly pleased therewith. Neither had Bassa much cause to be proud of such his gouernment, hauing thereof no longer assurance than pleased that fickle people to afford him: yet sith no better could be had, he must take it as he might, deeming it better in some sort for the present to hold it for the emperor, than not at all: with which his weake

A weake state amongst moe enemies than friends, we will for a while leaue him.

But whilst things thus passed (as we haue said) in TRANSYLVANIA and HUNGARY (the treatie for peace betwixt the Emperour and the Turke being vanished into smoake) Ibrahim Bassa the Turkes Generall in HUNGARY, hauing all the last winter made great preparation for the inuasion of the emperours territories, and the doing of some notable enterprize for the recouerie of his reputation somewhat impaired by the euill successe of the last yeares warres; and euen in these his greatest preparations of this yeare, not a little troubled by the mutinie of the Ianizaries and Spahi for want of their pay at CONSTANTINOPLE, as also with the rebellion in CARAMANIA: now at length in the latter end of August (by order from the Grand signior his great lord and master) began to set forward with his armie from BELGRADE, supposed to be about two hundred thousand men strong. And comming to BABOYSCA, a strong fortesse of the Christians in the nether HUNGARY, sat downe before it, and hauing planted his artillerie, furiously battered it, with purpose to haue the next day assailed it: but the capitaine of the castle considering the weakenesse of his garrison to withstand so puissant an enemy, and that the wals to be already sore shaken with the furie of the great ordinance, came to a reasonable composition with the Bassa, and so deliuered vnto him the place. Which exploit done and the castle to him surrendered, he marched from thence to CANISIA, a strong towne in the frontiers of SIERIA, of most men before supposed a place impregnable; for that it was situate in a very deepe marish, and furnished with a strong garrison of valiant souldiours, part Hungarians and part Almaines: after this strong towne Ibrahim the great Bassa especially longed, so to free those frontiers of the Turkes from the often incursions that the garrison souldiours of that place made thereinto; as also by the taking of that so strong a fortesse from the Christians, to open a more free and safe passage for the Turkes into AVSTRIA, to the endangering of other places of the empire also farther off. Wherefore encamping his great armie on the side of the marish which compassed the Isle round whereon the towne stood, he began with fagots and earth to fill vp the marish, so to passe ouer his armie; they in the towne in the meane time not ceasing with their thundering shot to disturbe them, and to doe them what harme they might: who for all that proceeding in their worke, had brought it now almost close vnto the island, where whilst they were about to haue landed, they were by the souldiours of the garrison so encountered, that hauing lost a number of their men as well Ianizaries as others, with two of their best capitaines also, they were by plaine valour enforced to retire. But preparing themselves against the next day with a greater force to haue againe returned vnto the assault of the Isle, they saw the Imperiall armie now at their backs, and come so neere them, that with their artillerie they did them great harme; which put them in no small feare, seeing themselves enclosed betwixt the towne and the campe, and both out of the one and the other to receiue no small hurt, as well with the small shot as the great: besides that out of the campe diuers whole bands sometimes sallied, discharging great volleys of shot euen into their trenches. In the Imperiall armie were about two and fortie thousand horse and foot, men of diuers nations, vnder the leading of duke Mercurie, now Generall of the Emperours forces in HUNGARY; with whom were also the lords Nadasti, Esdarin, Bacochian, and the Gouverneur of CROATIA, with diuers other famous capitaines, come thither for the reliefe of CANISIA, a place of so great importance for the defence of that side of the country, and to helpe that it fell not into the power of the barbarous enemy. But Ibrahim Bassa vnderstanding by his espials the small number of the Christians; and well knowing how much he was too strong for them by reason of his great multitude, went out against them, and finding them as readie as himselfe, joynd battell with them, with great slaughter of men both on the one side and the other: which bloudie fight (the victorie yet standing doubtfull, but in all mens judgement more enclosing vnto the Christians than to the Turkes) was at length by the comming on of the night broking off. At which time the Christians retiring themselves into their trenches, the Turkes stood all the night in the field with their weapons in their hands, as fearing to haue been againe in the night by their enemies assailed: Meane while the Christian capitaines in the campe at variance amongst themselves, and so not now to be commaunded by duke Mercurie their Generall (as such time as the Turkes presuming on their multitude dared them to battell the next day) could by no means be persuaded to go out against them, or once to stirre out of their trenches. Infomuch that the Generall of the Tartars thereupon taking courage, made an inroad into the country thereby, and meeting with two hundred wagons laden with victuals going vnto the Christians stian campe, flew the conuoy that guarded them, and so carried them quite away. Whereby such want arose in the Christian campe, that hauing not what to eat, and out of hope of any new supply of reliefe in time to come, they were glad by night to dislodge and retire; which could not so secretly be done, but that it was by the Turkes perceiued, who presently following after them in the taile of the armie, cut off about three thousand of them, with certaine pieces of great ordinance, and most part of the baggage; the rest of the armie in the meane time retiring farther off into places of more safetie. From this victorie the Turkes returned againe to the siege of CANISIA, where after a few daies, the garrison souldiours now out of hope to be in good time relieued, suddenly fell into mutinie, refusing any longer to defend the towne now hardly laied vnto by the Turkes; and the rather, for that diuers of the Hungarians were already fled out of the towne vnto the Bassa, hauing (as it was thought) reuealed vnto him the whole estate of the besieged: so that now there was no remedie but that the towne must be deliuered vnto the enemye, although Paradisier with some other of the capitaines did what they might (as they said afterwards) to haue perswaded the contrarie. Whereupon they came to parley with the Bassa, and couenanting with him that they might with bag and baggage depart, and with a safe conuoy be brought ouer the riuer Mur, promised to yeeld vnto him the towne: all which the Bassa granted, fearing how to haue been able to haue kept the field, if they should for any long time haue holden out. Winter now so fast approaching. So the two and twentieth of October the towne was vnto the Bassa right cowardly deliuered, and the garrison souldiours with their baggage in an hundred wagons lent them by the Turkes, safely conducted ouer the Mur as was vnto them promised. After the agreement made for the yeelding vp of the towne, the Bassa in courtesie sent vnto Paradisier the Gouvernour a verie rich gowne of cloth of gold; which albeir that he refused, yet was it afterwards laied to his charge as a presumption of some treacherous collusion betwix him and the Bassa for the betraying of the towne, which it was thought he might much longer haue kept. Ibrahim now thus possessed of the towne he so much desired, fortified it more strongly than euer it was before; and for the more assistance thereof, put into it a strong garrison of foure thousand foot and fife hundred horse, all old expert souldiours. And immediately after without resistance, foraged the countrey round about CANISIA, burning all before him as he went; the poore Christian inhabitants still flying as fast as they could for safeguard of their liues. But hauing thus with the spoile of the countrey well pleased his souldiours, he desirous to haue the same againe in time repeopled, as thereby to yeeld vnto the Turkes the more profit, staid their farther outrage, vpon great paine forbidding the same; by open proclamations in euerie place set vp, inuiting the Christians without feare of farther harme to returne againe into the countrey, where submitting them vnto the great Sultans obeyfance, they should vnder his protection safely dwell, without any tribute to be of them exacted for the space of three yeares next following. Which proclamations were in his name thus published.

Ibrahim Bassa to the Inhabitants of the countrey about

CANISIA, greeting.

Ibrahim Bassa his proclamation
Ive Ibrahim Bassa by the grace of God, Visier, and Cousin vnto the most puissant and invincible Sultan Mahomet, Emperour of the Turkes, vnto all the Inhabitants of the marches about CANISIA, and the rest of the countrey of STAIRMARCK, from the greatest to the least, greeting. Whereas we haue willingly heard that some of you willing to submit your selues vnto the great Sultan, and to swear vnto him fealtie, are againe returned vnto your old dwellings: we promise and assure you vpon the faith of the said Emperour, that whosoener shall be found nere vnto the fortreffe of CANISIA now belonging vnto the great Sultan, with all reuerence submitting himselfe as his subiect vnder his gouernment, acknowledging him for his Soueraigne; shall enjoy moe priuiledges than euer he did before, and also be protected in the same. And for that we know that your houses are for the most part destroyed, as also your posteritie; you shall therefore for these three yeares next following be exempted and free from all tributes and charges whatsoever, to the intent you may the better recouer your selues. Of which grace if you shall willingly accept, we promise you, that neither you, your wiues, nor children, shall be in any thing wronged, or your goods in any part impaired, but so much as in vs possibly is to be defended: so that so many of you as please, may in safetie returne vnto your owne old dwellings, giuing before knowledge thereof vnto the Gouvernour of this our fortreffe. Given in our campe after the conquest of CANISIA.

Many

Many of these poore countrey people before fled for feare of the Turkes, and not knowing where to bestow themselves, now vpon this proclamation returned againe to their ancient dwelling places, there to begin the world againe vnder the Turkish obeifance. But for that Countie Serinus was the man whom of all others in that countrey the great Bassa sought after, as him whom hee most feared after his departure, to trouble this his new conquest, and to seeke to bee reuenged; hauing in this so generall calamitie of STIRIA his countrey, lost twentie villages of his owne, quite burnt by the Turkes, and the people most slaine or els taken prisoners: the Bassa hauing many times before sought to haue perswaded him to haue yeelded his obeifance vnto the Turkish Sultan, and now in hope after so great a losse to bring him in, before he were come vnto the vtter ruine of all his fortunes (now by the losse of CANISIA, and the entrance of the Turkes into STIRIA, not a little endangered) writ vnto him as followeth:

Ive Ibrahim Bassa, chiefe of the Visier Bassaes, and cousin vnto the most puissant Sultan Mahomet, to the Countie Serinus sendeth greeting. We haue oftentimes heretofore written vnto thee concerning the matter thou knowest of: but what the cause is that we received no answer, we cannot tell. Yet could I not but write to thee againe, that if yet thou canst be content to begin the matter aright, and to submit thy selfe vnto our protection, we will be readie to receiue thee. Thou seest, that what we foretold thee, is now more than fulfilled both vpon thee and thine, which thou wouldest neuer beleene. Neuerthelesse, for the staying of the further effusion of the blood as well of thy subiects as ours, and to come to some good attonement, it is high time for thee to lay thine hand vpon thine heart, and to consider how much more it concerneth thee than vs, and that the benefit thereof redoundeth more vnto thine than ours. What our affection is towards thee, Hicome the Vaywod can tell thee. Fare thou well from our campe after the conquest of CANISIA the seuenth of November, 1600.

But these letters being also as the rest answered with silence, the great Bassa hauing disposed of all as he thought best at CANISIA and in the countrey thereabout, returned with his armie to BELGRADE, there to Winter: hauing before fully certified the great Sultan of all his proceedings, and the successe of this war, vaunting after his vaine manner, the next Spring to besiege VIENNA also, if it should please him so to commaund. Of all which things Mahomet vnderstanding, and not a little therewith pleased, caused great triumphs to be made by the space of foure daies at CONSTANTINOPLE, and in token of his loue and fauour sent a rich robe of cloth of gold, with a leading staffe, all set with pearle and pretious stones, vnto the Bassa, yet lying at BELGRADE.

This losse of CANISIA much troubled all that side of Christendome, especially them of the territories belonging vnto the house of AVSTRIA, in a fort dismayed to see the Turkes so easily possessed of a towne, before thought almost impregnable, and the strongest defence of all that countrey against the furious impressions of the Turkes, to whom it was now become a most safe and sure receptacle, all men with one voice blaming the discord of the capitaines in the impeffable and sure receptacle, all men with one voice blaming the cowardise of Paradisier; who knowne to haue in the towne a strong garrison, with good store of munition and radiser; (as was supposed) had so basely deliuered the same vnto the enemye, not doing the vtmost of his deuoir as had becomed him for the defence thereof: whereas if he had so done, happily in the meane time the cold and vnseasonableness of the weather (though no other reliefe had beene) Winter being now come, might haue enforced the Turkes to haue raised their siege. Whereupon he was for this so foule fact by the emperours commaundement apprehended and cast in prison at VIENNA, where after he had long line, and his cause oftentimes examined, he was the next yeare following condemned of felonie and cowardise, and so the fifteenth day of October executed, hauing first his hand at foure strokes of the executioner struck off, and after that his head: with him was also in like manner executed his Ensigne-bearer: and after them his lieutenant, with the maior of the town, who both bound fast to a stake, had first their tongues cut out, and afterwards their heads chopt off also.

Now the rebellion before raised in CARAMANIA by Cusshahin Bassa (as is afore said) was not with his death altogether appeased. Also ORFA, a great cite of that countrey (which hauing tasted the sweetnesse of libertie in the time of Cusshahin) yet still holding out against Mehemet the great Bassa, the Sultans lieutenant Generall there. At which time also a companion of Cusshahin the late rebell, called the Scrimano, and one of his greatest fauourits; seeing how hardly not onely Cuffahin himselfe, but the rest of his followers had bene handled by the Turkes, began to make head, and to call vnto him all such as loued their libertie: vnto the sweet name whercof, so many were in short time come about him, as that out of them he formed such an armie, as made him now dreadfull vnto the Turkes his enemies. Against whom, Mehemet Bassa going with all his power to haue oppressed him, found him with those his rebellious followers so courageous (for the desire they all had to breake out of the Othoman slauerie, and to liue in such libertie as was promised them by their capitaine and Generall) that joyning battell with them, he receiued of them a notable ouerthrow, inso much that fearing to haue lost his whole armie, he was glad to retire, and to send out commissions for the raising of greater forces. Sultan Mahomet in the meane time, whether it were for feare of this new rebellion, or for that he vnderstood of the em-bassadours sent from the Persian vnto the Christian princes, began to suspect least that king should breake the league he had with him, and so to his farther trouble take vp armes also against him. Wherefore vpon a Turkish pride he sent an embassadour into PERSIA, to giue the king to vnderstand, That for the more assurance of the league betwixt them; he demaunded to haue one of his sonnes sent vnto him in hostage, as a pledge of his fathers faith: Vvhich so proud a demaund the Persian king tooke in such disdain, that he commaunded in his rage the embassadour to be forthwith slaine: but that his furie being by his graue counsellours somewhat appeased, he remitted the severity of that his rigorous commaund, and sparing his life, was contented, that in despite and contempt of him that had sent him, he should be put to the Bastonado onely: and so gricuously threatened, sent backe againe vnto his master. Vvhich hauing receiued this shameful answere, and in doubt of some further matter from that angric king, commaunded new and strong garisons to be put into all his strong holds confining vpon the Persian kingdom.

This troublefome yeare of Iubilie thus past, the emperor much troubled with the losse of CANISIA, and in doubt of worse to come (albeit that Ibrahim Bassa, whom for all that he trusted not, did afresh entreat with him concerning peace) and seeing also the great need hee had of greater aid to withstand the mightie power of the Turke, with great instance requested aid of the Pope and of the other princes of ITALIE: who considering also how much it concerned the rest of the Christian commonweale, to haue the frontiers of HUNGARIE defended, condiscended vnto the emperours request: and so the Pope with the beginning of the Spring sent him eight thousand souldiours in pay, vnder the leading of Jo. Francesco Adorbrandino his nephew K their Generall, who with the like charge had now serued euer since the yeare 1599: King Philip also at the instance of the emperor gaue order vnto the Countie Fuentes to send into CROATIA certain bands of Dutches; who by direction from him, were forthwith conducted to MILLAINE: The great duke of FLORENCE also sent vnto him two thousand souldiours, vnder the leading of Francesco del Monte; with whom also by his appointment went the lord Jo. de Medices, whom Ferdinand the Archduke forthwith requested for to be master of his campe: Thither came also the duke of MANTVA with an honourable companie both of horse and foot, being forthwith by the Archduke made his lieutenant generall. And so whilst these people assembled together into CROATIA, the emperor sent also another good armie into HUNGARIE, drawne for most part out of GERMANIE, which vnder the leading of the Archduke Matthias his brother, and the duke Mercurie his lieutenant generall, went into those parts to withstand the Turke. A third armie he also made of the Imperials: which strengthened with the forces of Don Ferrant Gonzaga, Gouvernour of the vpper HUNGARIE, joyned themselves with Basta, for the recouerie of TRANSYLVANIA; out of which he had been of late driuen, as shall hereafter be declared.

And so whilst these armies were in preparing, many hot skirmishes passed in HUNGARIE betwixt the Christians and the Turks, the losse falling sometime to the one side and sometime to the other. But the time now come that souldiours might well take the field, Ibrahim Bassa being now before dead at BELGRADE, whilst he was yet entreating of a dissembled peace, and Hassan one of the Visier Bassaes by Mahomet appointed Generall in HUNGARIE in his place: yet delaying his comming, the parley for peace laied aside (as neuer indeed by the Turkes intended, but onely by them entertained to dallie off the time to their owne more aduantage) duke Mercurie Generall of the emperours forces taking the offer of so fit an opportunitie, came with his armie from COMARA (where he had lien expecting the euent of the parley) and laied siege to ALBA

A REGALIS, one of the chiefe and strongest cities of HUNGARIE: which seated in the middle of a marish, was thought almost impregnable, being hardly to be approached but by the suburbs, which strongly fortified and defended by the marish, serued the citie in stead of threec most sure bulwarkes, within which stood also the citie it selfe, well defended with a good wall and a ditch. This citie the duke for certain daies continually battered, as if he had purposed at length to haue taken it by assault: but in the meane time certainly enformed by a fugitiue (but lately fled out of the citie) that the broad lake on the other side of the citie oueragainst the place where he lay, was not so deepe, but that it was to be passed (contrarie to the opinion both of the Turkes captiues and of the naturall inhabitants, whom he had vpon that point examined) and that the Turkes presuming vpon the strength thereof, and thinking themselves on that side safe, had turned almost
 B all their care and forces vnto that side of the citie which was now by him battered, without regard of any great perill to be from the other side feared: he appointed the lord Russworm with his souldiours to make prooffe if the SIGETH suburbs (for so they were called) on the aforesaid side of the citie so little regarded by the Turkes, were not to be surprised: for that these suburbs being taken, the citie could not long hold out. For the vndertaking of which enterprise, Russworm was both by the captiue Turkes and countrey people thereby dwelling, much discouraged, they all with one consent affirming, That albeit he should find no other difficulties in the attempting thereof, yet the lake it selfe was not possible to be passed: who neuertheless not altogether resting them, sent certaine of his men secretly to trie the matter: who hauing so done, brought him word, That the lake was vndoubtedly though with much difficultie to be passed. Vvhich vpon
 C he with a thousand select souldiours with euery one of them a good faggot on his backe beside his armes, to fill vp the deepest of the marish, by night entered the same; wherein he had not gone farre, but that he almost with the danger of his life found it much deeper and more troublefome than the spies had vnto him before reported: but caried with an inuincible courage himselfe, and his souldiours moued by his example, he still went on, they also following of him. It is almost a thing incredible to tell what these aduenturous men endured, plunged in the deepe mud amongst the flags and bulrushes, going still vp in water and mud vnto the waist euen where the marish was the shallowest; where also if one misst but a step, he was by and by ouer head and eares, and in danger to be drowned, if he were not by his fellowes presently holpen: yet at length by Gods his helpe hauing with the losse but of six or seauen men a little before day got ouer, the duke by an D appointed signe aduertised thereof, with greater stirre and tumult than at any time before assailed that side of the citie where he lay, as if euen then and there he had onely meant to haue engaged his whole forces for the winning thereof. Vvhich in the meane time the lord Russworm on the other side with his resolute souldiours, with ladders provided for the purpose scaled the walls of the suburbe, and almost vnperceiued, recouered the top thereof (the Turkes being at the same time wholly bent for the defence of the other side of the citie, where most stirre and apparent danger was) and so being got into the suburbs, with a great and terrible crie assailed the Turkes, who surprised with an exceeding feare, and not well knowing which way to turne themselves, without any great resistance fled into the citie, the Christians following them at the heeles, and making of them a great slaughter. In which so great a confusion, euen where was least feared, the duke by other his souldiours tooke the rest of the suburbs as he had before determined, the E Turkes there also for feare forsaking them, and retiring with all the halt they could vnto their fellowes in the citie, there to liue or die together. The Christians in these suburbs, beside much other rich prey, tooke also foureteene great pieces of artillerie, with good store of shot and powder. The suburbs (the greatest strength of the citie) thus happily taken, the duke againe summoned the citie, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him: whereunto the Turkes gaue no other answer but by their pieces, which they discharged vpon the Christians so perswading them to yeeld. Vvhich with the duke much displeased, sent them word, That he would send them other manner of messengers to morrow; and by Gods helpe sup with them in the citie, although he were not vnto them welcome. Neither failed hee of that his promise: for the next day hauing
 F out of the suburbs by the furie of his artillerie made two faire breaches into the citie, he by the ruines thereof with great slaughter of the enemy entered the citie, albeit that the Turkes did what they might to haue defended the same, by casting downe vpon the Christians as they entered, darts, wild fire, and such like things, usually provided for such purpose. But seeing now no remedie, but that they must needs giue place vnto the fortune of their enemies, they fledmaine which meanes they hindred, and the enemies murthering pieces continually flanking them, and their muskietiers still playing vpon them afront, they were enforced to retire, leauing behind them three hundred of their men slaine. Yet were not the Christian commanders any thing therewith discouraged, but being generally resolved not to giue ouer that they had taken in hand vntill they had brought it to effect, began to make such prouision as they knew to be needfull to preferre their armie vnder, against the violence of the winter weather; as also to hinder that no victuals might be brought vnto the towne, so by famine at length to enforce the Turkes and Wallons to yeeld: who although they were already pinched with wants, inasmuch that horseflesh was daintie cheere with them; yet for all that they nothing abated of their wonted fiercenesse, but being againe required to yeeld, vouchsafed not to answer them one word, but in stead thereof shooke their naked swords a farre off at them, in token of their vndaunted courage. But yet for all this resolution of the commanders for the continuance of the siege, Aldobrandino Generall of the Italians being now a little before dead (of an old infirmities he had) the Italians began at the first some few of them secretly to withdraw themselves out of their quarter: but afterward by greater numbers to depart, and so to returne againe into their countrey; alleading for their excuse, want both of pay and victuals. But the best better minded, vnderstanding that the Turkes were risen from before Alba Regalis, and the rest of their armie disbanded, began to enter into new hope by some deuise or other to passe the ditch, and so by force to take the towne: and the rather, for that they were by a French fugitiue informed both of the weaknesse and wants of the besieged. Whereupon they began afresh to make new engines for the approaching of the wals, without danger of the enemies ordinance any more to flanke them. At which time also (viz. the fourth of Nouember) the lord Russworm came vnto the campe, sent thither from duke Mercurie with eight thousand souldiors (after that Hassan Bassa had broke vp his armie) by whose comming they were also the more encouraged to prosecute that they had taken in hand: neither sayled the Turkes in the meane time with often sallies to trouble the Christians, attempting aboue all things to haue fiered their tents; for that so lying open in that so cold a season of the yeare, they must thereby of necessitie be enforced to raise their siege and be gone. But the successe of these their so great designes was not answerable to their hopes, being still to their losse beaten backe into the towne by the Christians: whom it behooued to looke well about them, for that the besieged desperatly set, and all resolved rather to die than to yeeld, aduentured themselves to all dangers, neuer ceasing to doe what they might to put the Christians out of hope for winning the towne. But whilst the Turkes with doubtfull and as it were desperat hope to defend the place, and the Christians grown stronger by the comming of their friends lay in hope to win the same: lo, in the latter end of Nouember the North wind accompanied with a deepe snow, so furiously raged, that it ouerthrew the greatest part of the tents and pavillions of the Christians, and as it were buried their whole armie in the snow and ice; in such wise, as that in Ferdinand the archdukes campe (being reasonably well prouided for) were a thousand five hundred men, with three hundred horses, starued and frozen to death. At which time the state of them that came with the lord Russworm was most miserable, who wearied with the siege of Alba Regalis, and as it were spent with the dirtie trauell of the deep way, had not brought with them their tents or other prouision, and were therefore enforced to lie abroad in so cold and vnreasonable a time: with whose miseries, although their good Generall was much grieved, yet to doe the Christian common-weale seruice, he with them right patiently endured. In which so great an extremitie, the Archduke with the rest of the commanders vpon view taken, well considering what small hope there was in good time to take the towne, the vnreasonablenesse of the winter weather still more and more increasing; thought it better in time to rise, than longer to expose their armie vnto most certaine destruction, either of the enemy or the cold. Which was done with such hast and confused tumult, as that their rising seemed rather an hastie flight than honourable departure; leauing behind them for hast their great ordinance, with their tents and baggage; a common voice still running, That they were well if they might but saue themselves: so that the souldiors euery man mindfull but of himselfe, and in feare to be pursued by the enemy, no man chasing them, fled, but still accompanied with such furious winde, snow, and extreme cold, that with all the labour they could take they could get them no heat, but fell downe to the earth many of them frozen, and so once falling neuer rose more, being vnable for want of heat to helpe themselves: in which case they were not to expect for helpe from others, euery man haning ynough to doe to looke vnto himselfe: so that vpon the way whereby the armie went thus disperfed with the weather, lay aboue five hundred dead of cold; beside foure hundred others left sicke in the forsaken trenches, who forthwith after the departure of the armie were thought to haue beene all put to the sword by them of the garrison of CANISIA.

But hauing thus passed through these troubles of HUNGARIE, it is time now also to looke backe againe into the frontier countries of TRANSYLVANIA and VALACHIA; which to haue kept in the emperours obedience, and so preferred as a liuely member of the Christian common-weale, no lesse concerned him, than the keeping of any other his frontier territories, which are many: Michael the Vayud of VALACHIA; the last yeare for his crueltie first driuen out of TRANSYLVANIA by Bassa, and afterwards out of VALACHIA by the Great Chancellour of POLONIA (as is aforesaid) and another placed in his stead, as a man forsaken euen of his owne better fortunes, and not well knowing which way to turne himselfe: thought it best now at last to submit himselfe vnto the emperour, if so happily by his meanes he might in some sort repaire his broken estate, and so at leastwise recouer his gouernment in VALACHIA. So resolved, he set forward, and in the beginning of this yeare, viz. the three and twentieth of Ianuarie, with five and thirtie of his followers and six coaches arriued at PRAGE, where he was by the emperours appointment honourably receiued, and his cost at the emperours charge defrayed. Vnto whom he excused himselfe of the seueritie by him vsed in TRANSYLVANIA (the cause of those late troubles in that countrey) as enforced thereunto by the stubbornnesse of the Transylvanians themselves, whom he found still inclined to rebellion, and vnwilling to be commanded by any but by themselves. Which his excuse (as true) was well admitted, and he with all kinde vsed.

Now at this same time Bassa lying also in TRANSYLVANIA, as Gouverneur for the emperour, right slenderly accompanied, (as is before also declared) the parliament at CLAVSENBURG being ended, and all controuersies (as was thought) well composed, now without feare one night of the watch being set, went to bed to take his rest; where he had not long lien, but that certaine of the Transylvanian lords, among whom the Chiaki was chiefe, came with their followers, and surprising the watch, and entering the pallace, brake into the chamber where he lay, tooke him out of his bed, and so kept him prisoner all that night. And the next morning going forth, about twelue miles off met with Sigismund Bathor their late prince, before secretly by them called in, whom they honourably conducted to CLAVSENBURG, and there deliuered vnto him Bassa, whom they late gouernour for the emperour, whom he commanded to be cast into yrons: and so going to the pallace, gaue like order for the apprehending and safe keeping of the rest of the nobilitie also, such as had taken part with Bassa in the behalle of the emperour. For now the Transylvanians were deuided into three parts: whereof the one stood for the emperour; the second for Istuan Bathor (pretending, that vnto him belonged the souerainetie of that prouince) but the third and farre the greatest, for Sigismund their antient lord and leader, who now by means of the king of POLONIA reconciled vnto the great Turke, and in this troublesome time by his fauourites called againe into his countrey, was by them joyfully receiued at ALBA IULIA, CLAVSENBURG, and the rest of the chiefe cities of TRANSYLVANIA. Who now therof againe possessed, for the better assuring of his estate forthwith writ vnto the emperour what had happened, requesting him to content himselfe, that he was desirous of his loue and fauour, promising to be alwaies his good friend and neighbor, and for euer to keepe good amitie with him: giuing Bassa also (whom he had now at the intercession of certaine great friends againe enlarged) to vnderstand, That hee was forthwith to depart from all the places belonging vnto his ged) to vnderstand, That hee was forthwith to depart from all the places belonging vnto his principallitie, as also to cease from further molesting of his people that were now voluntarily againe returned vnto his obedience. Which his request was neither of the one nor of the other much regarded: or hearkened vnto: for the emperour vpon the first aduertisement of this so great an alteration in TRANSYLVANIA, calling vnto him Michael the Vayud (not so much troubled with the strangenesse of the matter, as for that his wife and sonne, whom he had left as hostages with Bassa, were now come into the hands of the Transylvanians his mortall enemies) and satisfying him in many things that hee had before requested, tooke order with him, That with all conuenient speed returning home againe into VALACHIA, where hee was now much longed for (the people generally disliking of the simple Vayud, by the great Chancellour set ouer them) and gathering together such power as he could, he should ioyne himselfe with Bassa his lieutenant generall, vnto whom he had already sent great companies both of horse and foot for the expulſing of Sigismund out of TRANSYLVANIA, and the reducing againe of that province vnder his obeyſance. Whereupon the Vayuod forthwith returning into VALACHIA, and aſſembling about ten thouſand of his friends, all good and expert ſouldiours, went to ſecke for Baſſa as he had with the emperor agreed; whom he found readie in the field with about twenty thouſand foot and eight thouſand horſe, but newly departed from VRADINVM: where muſtering their armie, they with their vnited forces entered into TRANSYLVANIA; there to put in execution what the emperor had commanded. Where the Vayuod in diſdaine of the people which loued him not, with fire & ſword waſted all the country before him as he went: not without the great diſcontentment of Baſſa, to whom it ſeemed not good to make deſolat that countrey which he was in good hope ſhould in ſhort time be his lord and maſters the emperours. But Sigismund vnderſtanding both of the continuing of his enemies and of the harme they did in his country, riſe from SOLNOCK where he lay encamped with his armie, and ſo to hinder their further proceeding went to meet them: howbeit being come ſo neere vnto them as that he might well diſcouer them, he would not come to the trial of a battell with them, which was by them offered; but fortified himſelfe in his trenches, ſo ſeeking but to delay the time vntill the coming of the Tartars, which were to haue come vnto him from the Chanceller of POLONIA, as alſo of ſix thouſand Turkes to haue been ſent him from the Baſſa of BELGRADE. Where hauing after ward vnderſtood that the paſſage of the Tartars to haue been ſent him, was ſtaied by Don Ferrante Gonzaga the emperours lieutenant in the vpper HUNGARIE; and that the Turkes ſtaying at GIVLA would come no farther except they had their pay before hand: finding himſelfe too weake with his owne power to encounter with his enemies, he riſe with his armie, with purpoſe to haue retired a little backe, and to haue taken certaine ſtraight paſſages whereby the enemy muſt needs paſſe, ſo by the aduantage of the place to haue holpen his owne weake ſtrength. But Baſſa and the Vayuod perceiuing his riſing (whereunto they were ſtill attentiuely) followed him with ſuch ſpeed, that they ouertooke him before he could get thither, and ſo hardly preſſed him, that needs he muſt turne his face and joyne battell, or elſe ſuffer his people altogether like beaſts to be ſlaine. In which doing, albeit that neither he nor his failed to doe what was by men to be done for the obtaining of a notable victorie, yet ſuch was the valour of the ſouldiours of Baſſa and the Vayuod, that in a great fight hauing diſordered his footmen, they put them to flight, and ſo cut them all in pieces. Which the prince beholding, and not able to remedie the matter, betime fled with his horſemen from the furie of his enemies, and ſo retired to the vttermoſt confines of TRANSYLVANIA, hauing in this battell loſt ten thouſand of his faithfull ſouldiours. Whereupon CLAUDIO with diuers other cities and townes of that countrey, returned againe vnto the emperours obeyſance.

*Sigismund over-and the Vayuod, ſleight of

In the proſecuting of this victorie, the Vayuod to ſatiſſie the hatred he had of long borne againſt the Transylvanians, did what ſpoile he could, vtterly waſting all the places whereby he paſſed; which Baſſa not liking, requeſted him to vſe his victorie with more modeſtie, and to haue more reſpect to what he did, eſpecially vnto ſuch places or perſons as of themſelues returned vnto the emperours obeyſance. Whereunto he proudly answered, That he would doe what he thought good without his appointment or the emperours either, eſpecially in that countrey which he had now with his owne ſword twiſe conquered: and that therefore Baſſa might commaund them that were by him to be commaunded, as for himſelfe he acknowledged no ſoueraignie that either Baſſa or the emperor had ouer him. Vnto which his ſo preſumptuous ſpeech Baſſa replied not, but yet much therewith diſcontented, began to enter into a great ſuſpicion from what ground thoſe his haughtie conceits (eaſily by his words to be gathered) might grow. And ſo from that time better obſeruing his proceedings, perceiued him to haue intelligence with the Turkes, with purpoſe to joyne hands with them, that ſo by their helpe chaſing the Imperials out of TRANSYLVANIA, he might hold it to himſelfe as tributarie to the Othoman emperor, of all others beſt able to defend him. Which to be true (beſide diuers other ſtrong preſumptions) he certainly vnderſtood by certaine letters of his written to that purpoſe, intercepted by his ſouldiours and brought vnto him: whereupon he became verie penſiue and M heauie, for the great power the Vayuod was of in thoſe countries; as alſo for the great ſtrength he had euen then preſent about him, and wherewith he was as it were then guarded. So conſulting with certaine of his Colonels and chiefe commaunders of his armie, what were beſt to be done in that ſo dangerous a caſe, whereof ſo much depended: a Wallon capitaine offered

himſelfe to go into the Vayuod his campe, and there in his owne tent to kill him as a traitour. Which his offer well liked of, and he was readie to performe as he was to promiſe, going into the Vayuods campe accompanied with ſome threeſcore men, and finding him in his tent, boldly ſtepping to him, willed him to yeeld himſelfe the emperours priſoner: Whereat he being about to lay his hand vpon his ſcimitar, the Wallon capitaine with an holbard thruſt him into the breaſt, at which verie inſtant another with a ſword at one blow claue his head downe to the ſhoulders. An unworthie death for ſo worthie a capitaine, had not ambition the torment of great ſpirits carried him too high with the wings of immoderat deſire, beyond the bounds of loyaltie and reaſon. But there he lieth now dead among his friends, whom the great Turke ſometime more feared euen in his palace at CONSTANTINOPLE, than he did all the reſt of the emperours commaunders. Preſently vpon his death a great tumult and hurly burly was riſed by the ſouldiours in his campe: but Baſſa forthwith ſhewing himſelfe with all his ſouldiours in armes, and withall producing the letters declaring the treaſon by the Vayuod continued with the Baſſa of TRANSYLVANIA againſt the emperor; all was againe appeaſed: but eſpecially for that his ſouldiours now ſaw themſelues without an head; and too weake alſo for the Imperials there preſent and already in armes. In the Vayuods tent were alſo other letters found, ſo plainly declaring his ſecret colluſion with the Turke, and treaſon againſt the Emperor, that the Wallachians who at the firſt were wonderfully moued with his death, and hearing the ſame read; reſted not now onely contented, but ſaid moreouer that he was worthily ſlaine, and that if they had knowne him to haue had any ſuch traitorous purpoſe, they would themſelues long before haue taken of him deſerued puniſhment. Now vnto his ſouldiours Baſſa offered, at their choiſe, either to depart whither they would without danger; or elſe taking the oath of obedience vnto the emperor to enter into his pay, which moſt part of them did. The tumult appeaſed, the dead bodie of the Vayuod was laid out a whole day for the ſouldiours to gaze vpon, and ſo afterward buried. So lieth he, that but of late and many times before, had ſo fortunately ouerthrowne his enemies; vnhappy man himſelfe now ouerthrowne by his owne ambition and vnconſtance.

Baſſa now deliuered of the great feare he had before of the Vayuod, what by force, what by agreement in ſhort time tooke in moſt part of the country: for that the Transylvanians ſeeing the ſmall power of Sigismund, and well comforted with the death of Michael the Vayuod ſo much hated of them, as alſo to avoid the dangers euen preſently hanging ouer their heads from the Imperials, if they ſhould in any thing ſhew themſelues obſtinat againſt them, ſubmitted themſelues wholly to the courteſie of Baſſa, ſo that the places were but few that yet held out for the prince Sigismund: who in the meane time was doing what he might for the raiſing of a new armie (hauing not altogether with this late ouerthrow forthwith alſo loſt his hope) by the helpe of the Turkes, Tartars, and Polonians, to recouer againe the poſſeſſion of his ſtate; and by force of armes to chaſe out the Imperials. But he being brought to ſo low an ebbe, and almoſt the countrey of TRANSYLVANIA poſſeſſed by Baſſa; who would not haue thought but that now after ſo long trauels it would haue remained wholly at the emperours deuotion? and ſo many that thought themſelues to ſee much, ſaid aſſuredly it would. But ſee the change, and what ſmall aſſurance euen the greateſt haue of the conſtancie of the vaine multitude: neuer more like themſelues, than in diſliking to morrow what they beſt liked to day, fooliſh, ſenceleſſe, imprudent, raſh, headſtrong, violent, and aboue all things mutable and vnconſtant. So now for all that Baſſa had done for the aſſurance of this countrey vnto the emperor (being ſo much as moſt men thought ſufficient to haue been ſufficient, and indeed as much as was poſſible for him to doe) euen in the winding vp of this year 1601 the Transylvanians vnderſtanding that Sigismund with a great armie of Polonians, Turkes, and Tartars, was now coming againſt the Imperials, moſt part of them preſently tooke vp armes in his ſauour, ſaying, That their firſt oath voluntarily giuen vnto him as their naturall prince and Gouverneur, was more to be reſpected than any other aſſuredly giuen vnto Sigismund by force extorted from them by a forreign prince. Inſomuch, that Baſſa perceiuing with regretwards by force extorted from them by a forreign prince. To ſaue himſelfe and his people from the rage thereof, withdrew himſelfe with his followers vnto a ſtrong towne in a corner of that countrey: from whence he with all ſpeed ſent vnto the emperor for greater aid; as well for the defence of the place he yet held, as for the ſubduing againe of that rebellious people. After whole departure, Sigismund without reſiſtance entering the countrey, was of the people in generall joyfully joyfully receiued as their most lawfull prince and soueraigne, and all the honour done vnto him: that was by them possible: in which his so princely, but dangerous estate, now twife in lesse, than the space of one yeare by him regained, and yet thereof no whit assured, we will for a while leaue him to joy therein with his subjects.

But whilst the state thus turneth vpside downe in TRANSYLVANIA, the Basha of AGRIA going out with ten thousand Turkes in hope to haue surpris'd, TOCCATE (a strong hold of the Chriftians in the vpper HUNGARIE) was encountred by Ferrant Gonzaga the Emperours lieutenant there; and by him ouerthrowne, and with great slaughter of his Turks chafed to the gates of AGRIA.

Now was Mahomet the Turkish emperor this yeare also, no lesse troubled with the proceedings of the Scrimano in CARAMANIA and NATOLIA, than with the euill successe of his affaires in TRANSYLAVANIA and HUNGARIE. For the Scrimano by his last yeares victorie growne into great credit with the common people, and still by them more and more followed; to maintaine the reputation of his credit, came now againe this yeare with a great power into the field, to meet with Mahomet the great Bassa and Generall of the Turkes armie; who with fiftie thousand good souldiours (a power thought sufficient to haue repressed him) was ready to encounter him. With whom the Scrimano joyning battell, in a great fight cut in funder a great part of the Bassaes armie, and so became master of the field, foraged all the countries adjoyning almost as farre as ALBRO, still calling the people vnto libertie; and causing himselfe to be proclaimed the true defender of the Mahometane faith, and of the liberties of those countries with him combined: in such sort, as that it now stood the great Turke vpon to send another great armie to the aid of Mahomet the discomfited Bassa. With whom also the Scrimano (presuming of his former fortune) comming to a day of battell, and ouercharged with the multitude of his enemies, was at the first encounter with his people put to the worke: but forthwith by his good direction hauing repaired his disordered battell, and thereby giuen as it were new courage to his fainting souldiours, he with a great slaughter disordered also the Bassaes armie. Yet hauing not any other firme state or stay to rest vpon, more than the fauour and reputation he held with these his rebellious followers, of whom he had now lost a great many, he thought it not best to aduventure too far (not knowing how presently to repaire his losses) but contenting himselfe with that he had already done, retired with his armie into the strength of the mountaines; there that winter to liue vpon the spoile of the countries adjoyning; and the next yeare to do more harme than euer he had done before.

Aquia overthrowne by Ferrante Gonzaga.*

Beside all which former troubles, the plague also this yeare fore raged both in CONSTANTINOPLE and many other places of the Turkish empire. At which time also the Ianizaries at CONSTANTINOPLE having received some disgrace by some of the great Sultans fauourites, and with great insolencie requiring to haue their heads, caused their Aga well accompanied presumptuously to enter into the Seraglio to preferre this their request: Whom Mahomet to the terror of the rest, caused for his presumption to be taken into the midst of the Spahi, and so by them to be cut in pieces; which was not done without the great slaughter of the Spahi themselves also, slaine by the Ianizaries. Whereupon the other Ianizaries arising vp in armes also, and euen now readie to haue reuenged the death of their captaine, were yet by the wisedome of Cigala Bassa bestowing amongst them a great summe of money, againe appeased without further harme doing. Which their so great insolencie Mahomet imputing vnto their excessive drinking of wine, contrarie to the law of their great Prophet; by the persuation of the Muffie, commanded all such as had any wine in their houses in CONSTANTINOPLE or PERA, vpon paine of death to bring it out and to stauie it, except the embassadours of the Queene of ENGLAND, the French king, and of the State of VENICE: so that (as some report) wine for a space ran down the channels of the streets in CONSTANTINOPLE, as if it had been water after a great shower of raine.

1602 Sigismund the Tranſylvanian prince now of late againe poſſeſſed of TRANSYLVANIA (as is before declared), could not yet well aſſure himſelfe of the keeping thereof: for that he with the Tranſylvanians of his faction alone, was not able to withſtand the force of Baſſa; who ſtill ſtrengthened with new ſupplies both of men and all things elſe neceſſarie for the warres from the Emperour; was now with a great power alreadie entred into TRANSYLVANIA: the Poloniaus buſied in the warres of SUBVIA; and the Turkes with their other greater affaires, nei-

A ther of them sending him their promised aid, the greatest hope and stay of himselfe in that newnesse of his state. Wherfore seeing himselfe euerie day to looke one place or other, and fearing also least his souldiors for want of pay should in short time quite forsake him and go ouer to Bassa: he thought it best betimes and whilst he had yet something left, and was not yet altogether become desperat, otherwise to prouide for his estate, especially hauing small trust in the Turkes, to whom he had before been so great an enemy. Wherfore he dealt with Bassa for a truce or cessation from armes, vntill embassadours might be sent vnto the emperour, to entreat with him for some good attonement. Wherewith Bassa being content, and the embassadours sent, the matter was so handled with the Emperour, that Sigismund to make an end of all these troubles, was contented to the behoofe of his Imperiall maiestie, to resigne vnto Bassa his lieutenant all
B such places as he yet held in TRANSYLAVANIA, vpon much like conditions he had about three yeares before made with him: and so in all and for all, to submit himselfe vnto his maiestie. Which intended surrender of the princes being bruted in TRANSYLAVANIA, Zachell Moyses his lieutenant (and now in field with the princes forces) not able to endure or to heare that that noble prouince should againe fall into the hands of the Germanes; encouraging his souldiors, went vpon the sudden to assaile Bassa, in hope to haue found him vnprovidid, and so discumfiting his armie, to haue driuen the Imperials quite out of TRANSYLAVANIA: But he an old and expert commander, perceiuing euen the first mouing of the Transyluanians, with great sceleritie put his armie in good order, and so joynd battell with them: wherein hee with the losse of some five hundred men ouerthrew Moyses, with his armie of Transyluanians, Turkes, and Tartars, C hauing slaine about three thousand of them, and put the rest to flight: Moyses himselfe with some few others being now glad to take their refuge into the frontiers of the Turkes territories towards TEMESVAR. But when Sigismund vnderstood what his lieutenant had without his knowledge done, he in token of his owne innocencie went himselfe vnto the Imperiall campe, accompanied only with certaine of his Gentlemen, and there vnto Bassa excused himselfe of that which was by his lieutenant against his will, and without his priuite done; frankly offering to performe whatsoever was on his part to be performed, according to the agreement made betwixt the Emperour and him. And so presently calling his garrisons out of all such strong places as were yet for him holden, he surrendered them to Bassa; and so forthwith honourably accompanied, put himselfe vpon his way towards the emperour. After whose departure out of D TRANSYLAVANIA, all that prouince voluntarily and without more ado yeclded to Bassa as to the emperours lieutenant: who presently called an assembly of all the Nobilitie of the countrey, taking of them an oath for their obedience and loyaltie vnto the emperour. Thus by the wisdome and prowesse of this worthy commander, is the countrey of TRANSYLAVANIA once againe brought vnder the emperours obeyssaunce; a matter of far greater importance, than to haue woon the strongest citie the Turke holdeth in HVNOARIE.

the strongest citie the Turke holdeth in HUNGARIE.
 But whilst things thus passed in TRANSYLAVIA, great troubles arise also in VALACHIA, Great troubles in Valachia.
 (the country next adjoyning) for that the people of that prouince not able longer to endure the great insolencie of the Turkes (who after the death of Michaell had by their power made one Hieremias Vayvod there) by a generall consent tooke vp armes, and proclaiming one Radol (a fauourit of the Emperours) Vayvod, chased Hieremias (before placed by the Turkes) quite out of the country: who flying vnto Simon Palatine of MOLDAVIA, his friend, by his meanes and the helpe of the Turkes returning into VALACHIA, draue out thence Radol againe: who being now at this present with Bassa, with about ten thousand Valachians his followers, earnestly requested of him (now that hee was so quietly possessed of TRANSYLAVIA) to helpe him with his forces for the recouerie of VALACHIA. And Bassa well considering how much it concerned the quiet and sure keeping of the possession of TRANSYLAVIA for the Emperour, to haue that so neere a prouince to friend, easily yielded to his request; and gaue him a great regiment of his old approoued fouldiors, and so sent him away to recouer his estate: with whom (at his entrance into VALACHIA) the Moldauian meeting with a great power both of his owne and of the Turkes, come thither in the fauour of Hieremias, there was fought betwixt them a most terrible and bloudie battell, the glorie whereof fell vnto Radol, he carrying away the victorie. In which battell two of the Turkes Bassaes were there slaine, with a great numbers of others both of the Moldauians and Turkes. After which victorie Radol recoafter with the same aid cut in peeces a great power of the Tartars, that were coming to haue G aided the Moldavian.

Now in the meane time in HUNGARIE also passed many an hor skirmish betwixt the Christians and the Turkes, whose garrisons at BVDA and other places in the lower HUNGARIE, attempting to haue surpris'd ALBA REGALIS, and discouered by the Christians, were with great slaughter enforced to retire. At which time also, Countie Serinus vnderstanding by his espials, that the Turkes with two hundred waggons with munition and victuals were going to CANISIA; vpon the sudden set vpon them, and hauing slaine and put to flight the conuoy that guarded them, carried the waggons with all that was in them away with him. And shortly after the free Haiduckes of COMARA in a great partie going out towards BVDA to seeke after bootie, and haneing taken threescore Turkes prisoners, and so with them about to haue returned H home; vnderstanding by the way, that Ali sometime the Bassa of BVDA, and now gouernour of PESTH, was with a small retinue about to come downe the riuer Danubius from BVDA towards BELGRADE, there to meet the Visier Bassa, but then coming into HUNGARIE, they slew all their prisoners; and hauing got two small boats, about fifteene miles beneath BVDA lay in wait for the Bassa: who according to their expectation coming downe the riuer, was by these aduenturers fiercely assailed, and of his thirtie followers hauing foureteene slaine, being himselfe also shot in two places of his bodie, was there with a great bootie taken, and so brought to COMARA, and shortly after presented vnto Matthias the archduke at VIENNA: who amongst other things certainly enformed him, that Hassan Bassa was with a great armie by the commandement of the great Sultan Mahomet coming to besiege ALBA REGALIS, and that he was now vpon his way as farre as BELGRADE; presently sent thither the Countie Isolan gouernour thereof, who with much adoe got into the citie, the Turkes hauing already taken all the passages, to haue hindered the Christians from putting either men or munition, more than was therein already. Howbeit the Countie now got in there, and being no lesse good engineer than a valiant commander, caused all them in the citie to labour vpon the rampiers: so that beside the naturall situation thereof, which was very strong, hee had in short time so fortified it, as that in most mens judgement it seemed a place almost impregnable. This Ali Bassa was sometime the Great Turkes butler, but after the taking of AGRIA made Bassa of BVDA; which great place he held but three moneths, being by the enuie and ambition of some, but especially of Amurath Bassa, remoued thence, and made gouernour of PESTH: from whence now going downe K the riuer to BELGRADE, it was his fortune to be thus taken by the Haiduckes, vnto whom hee offered for his ranfome three hundred thousand Sultanines; and had with him when he was taken seuentie thousand duckats.

A great ranfome
offred by Ali Bassa.

Mahomet the great Sultan not a little troubled with the losse of ALBA REGALIS (taken from him by the Christians the last yeare) and now resolved for the recouerie of the same to engage if need should be a great part of his forces; had caused an armie of about an hundred thousand strong to meet together at HADRIANOPLE, for that purpose, vnder the leading of Mahomet Bassa (otherwise called Sardar Bassa, an Albanois, and one of the chiefe Visiers) to bee sent into HUNGARIE. Who by the way of BELGRADE coming to BVDA, and from thence to ALBA REGALIS, there the twelfth of August encamped (as he had oftentimes before threat- L ned) with the multitude of his tents couering all the countrey round about, as if it had beene a white snow: where hauing well entrenched himselfe, and planted his artillerie, he began a most terrible and furious batterie, in such sort as if he had not meant to haue made a breach onely, but to haue beaten the citie euen from the face of the earth, which seemed now to tremble vnder his feet, and the clouds to rent with the thundering of his great ordinance: and for that the marish and deepe ditches were a great let vnto his men for to come vnto the assault, he caused them with this men to assault the counterscarfe, which the gouernour had caused to be made before the citie for the better defence thereof: which assault cost him much blood; by reason of the wonderfull valour of the defendants: yet in the end the great number of the Turkes preuailing, the Christi- M ans were enforced to forsake it and to retire into the citie. But shortly after falling out againe, they with such force assailed the Turkes now got within the counterscarfe, that hauing slaine most part of them that were entered, they forced the other out againe: at the brute whereof, an alarum being raised throughout the campe, infinit numbers of the barbarous enemies came running

Turkes.

A ning thither with such beastly furie, that without regard of their liues they as desperat men pressing still on, fell twice as many as before: insomuch that the Christians wearie of that long and bloudie fight, and on euery side charged or rather ouerwhelmed with the enemies shot, were glad againe, but not without great losse, to abandon the place. With which skirmishes and diuers others that they had, the number of the defendants was greatly diminished: yet was not the courage of the valiant Gouernour any whit therewith abated, but by his letters gaue the Archduke Matthias to vnderstand in what case things stood with them in the citie, requesting him with all speed to send them reliefe, for that otherwise the citie would be in danger to be lost; as well for that many of the garrison souldiours were already slaine in the defence thereof, as also that diuers of the Hungarians forsaking the wals, daily fled vnto the Turkes campe: promising yet B neuerthelesse himselfe to doe the vttermost of his deuoir. Vpon the receipt of which letters, the Archduke gaue order vnto the lord Russworm (master of his campe) to goe forthwith to COMARA, and there with such forces as were from diuers places come thither, to go forth and to proue if by any meanes the weake garrison of ALBA REGALIS might so be relieved, by putting in some good supplie of fresh souldiours: According vnto which command, Russworm coming thither, without delay tooke the field with twelue thousand men which he found there, to see if he might with them put into the citie the desired reliefe. But whilst the matter was in the per- formance thereof too long delayed, by discord arising betwixt him and the other colonels, about the command, the Bassa had time to effect his purpose: who the eight and twentieth of the same moneth of August, after a long and terrible batterie, caused a generall assault to be giuen C vnto the citie: which the Turkes from time to time renewing, continued all that day and the next night, with some part of the day following also, without intermission: so that the defendants now brought to a small number, and they also so wearied or wounded, as that they were not well able to make any longer resistance (and the Countie himselfe, who gaue as it were life vnto them all, being now also carried away, dangerously hurt in the thigh with a musket shot) gaue vnto the enemy a signe of their yeelding. VV hereupon the furie of the assault being staied, whilst they were yet talking with the enemy from the wall about the conditions of their yeelding, a renegade Christian which knew the citie well, in the meane time conducted a great squadron of the Turkes vnto a place but weakly defended; who forcing the wals, entered the citie, and with a great crie gaue signes of their entrance vnto the rest of the armie on the other side: D who thereupon breaking off the parley, presently renewed the assault, and by force gained the wals: where the few Christians that were left, now both before and behind enclosed with their fierce enemies, were there valiantly fighting for the most part slaine, the Countie onely with some few others found wounded in their lodgings (the furie ouerpast) being taken prisoners and spared. So the Bassa hauing in eightene daies taken ALBA REGALIS (now being eleuen months possessed by the Christians) caused the breaches he had made to bee againe repaired, and the citie well provided for both of victuals and munition, leaving therein a strong garrison of six thousand good souldiours: and with his people hauing ouerun all the countrey as farre as STRIGONIVM, rise with his armie, and retired againe to BVDA: where as he was making a bridge of boats ouer the Danubius betwixt BVDA and PESTH, for the more easie transpor- E ting of victuall, and better relieuing of the one the other as need should require; and hauing brought that worke to passe, and was about to haue gone to the siege of STRIGONIVM, commandement came from the great Sultan, That he should with all speed returne to CONSTANTINOPLE; for that Mahomet accounting of him as of a most valiant man, was now minded to employ him in his warres against his rebels in NATOLIA, where things now went not well (as shall hereafter be declared.) Vpon which commandement the Bassa gaue leaue to all such in his armie as had charge of any place, forthwith to returne to their severall places of govern- ment: appointing some others with thirtie thousand souldiours in the companie of Zachael Moises (but of late prince Sigismund his lieutenant) to goe with him into TRANSYLVANIA; who after the ouerthrow he had there receiued by Bassa, was come vnto this great Bassa, offering vn- F to him (with such an aid as was now appointed for him, and the helpe of such other his friends as he had in TRANSYLVANIA) to chase Bassa with his Germanes from out thence, and to reduce that prouince againe vnto the deuotion of the Othoman emperours, as it had in former time beene. And so by the way of BELGRADE halted himselfe with the rest of his armie towards CONSTANTINOPLE: which hee was thought the more willingly to doe, for that the great a thousand of them being lost; the capitaines considering how much the losse of so many braue, G souldiours concerned the whole enterprise taken in hand, and that the breach could not be gained without the losse of the greatest part of them, they caused a retreat to be sounded, and so the assault for that time to be giuen ouer.

But long it was not that the Visier Bassa (thus retired as aforesaid) had lien before P^{ESTH}, but that by reason of his so sudden returne, great wants began to arise in his campe; his souldiors for want of food being glad to eat their dead horses, a pound of bread being sold for two Hungarian duckats, and a bushell of oates for five; and yet hardly so to bee gotten: which wants in that so wasted a cuntry still more and more encreasing, and many of his souldiours secretly stealing away from him, he had much adoe by all the meanes he could vse, to persuaide them there to stay eight dayes longer. VVhich time expired, and nothing more done, than some H few weake attempts giuen, and some light skirmishes made, rather for fashions sake than for any hope of preuailling, and the want of all things still encreasing; he with the rest of the commaunders fearing some sudden mischiefe to bee done them by the hungrie and discontented souldiours, the second of Nouembet causing his baggage to bee trusted vp in the dead time of the darke and silent night, rise with his armie, and so in hast retired directly to B^{ELGRADE}, leauing behind him in his campe three hundred dead horses, not yet eaten by his hunger-starued souldiours. Immediately after whose departure, the lord Nadasti and some other of the commaunders in the armie, with five thousand souldiours and certaine great pieces of artilerie, some by land, some by water, went downe alongst the riuer to A^{DOM}, a faire well built towne vp-on the banke of Danubius, about foure Hungarian miles from B^{UDA}, and seruing as it were I for a store-house for the garrison there: which towne Nadasti summoned by his Hussars sent before, requiring to haue it deliuered vnto him. VVhich they of the towne at the first refused to doe: but afterwards seeing a faire greater power come, prouided of great ordinance and all things els requisite for a siege, they with the sight thereof discouraged, without more adoe offered to yeld the towne, so that they might with bag and baggage in safetie depart: which they did, the Christians conducting them as farre as F^{ELDVAR}, which castle was also at the first summons, by the persuation of them of A^{DOM} deliuered vnto them: for they of the castle, by them enformed of the great strength of the Christians, and of the store of great ordinance they had brought with them, and that they staid therewith but fast by, were easily persuaaded to hearken to their friends, and so yelded. VVhich done, the free Haiduckes the same night surprised K also the castle of Pax: from whence the Christians still marching on alongst the riuer, tooke in also the citie of T^{OLNA}.

But whilest Nadasti with the rest were thus busied in taking these castles and townes alongst the South side of Danubius, they in the campe at B^{UDA} were aduertised of the new designs of the Turkes lieutenants and capitaines thereabouts, for the reliefe of the besieged: as that the Bassa of B^{OSNA}, with the Gouvernours of C^{ANISIA}, S^{IGETH}, and others, had assembled an armie of thirtie thousand for the raising of the siege. VVherefore the Christians doubting as they lay at the siege disperfed, to be by them oppressed; leaving their tents in their trenches, gathered themselues together into the W^{ATER} citie: which the Turkes out of the vpper citie quickly perceiuing, as feeling themselues now at some more libertie, presently falling out, tooke L both the trenches and the tents so left, with no small slaughter of such as were left for the keeping of them: and so possessed of the trenches and tents, held them by the space of two houres, vntill they were by strong hand by the Christians beaten out, and so with some losse enforced again to retire into the citie. The lord Nadasti also, with the rest that had taken the aforesaid castles and townes vpon the side of Danubius, making a rode towards A^{LBAREGALIS}, in their returne within a mile of B^{UDA} light vpon a thousand Turkes there gathered together, most part of whom they slew, and hauing put the rest to flight, tooke some fiftie of them prisoners. At which time also another of the Imperiall colonels meeting with certaine other companies of the Turkes comming to the reliefe of the besieged, not farre from B^{UDA}, slew most part of them, tooke an hundred and threescore of them prisoners, with a number of horses and M much other rich bootie, all which he brought into the campe. Neither were they at the siege in the meane time idle, their great artilerie still thundering against the wals both of the castle and the citie: so that by the furie of the cannon hauing beaten downe a strong towne next vnto the Danubius, not farre from the kings stable, they were a little before night about to haue there

A there entered, when suddenly such a tempest of wind and raine arise, as that they could not possibly vse their pieces, or well any other weapon: so that the heauens as it were then fighting for the enimie, they were enforced for that time to giue ouer the assault begun. VVhich storme was no sooner ended, but that two thousand of the Turkes both horse and foot, to keepe the Christians otherwise busied, suddenly issuing out of the citie, charged vpon the Stirian horsemen; who presently relieued by the men at armes, so welcommed them, that hauing lost an hundred and threescore of their men, they were glad with more speed to retire than they came out. But seeing some of the Christians that so hardly pursued them, some slaine and some hurt from the wals, taking heart againe, the next day (being the eleuenth of Nouember) they sallied out againe; where albeit that a great number of them were slaine, yet fell they out againe the B third day also, and were againe by the Countie Thurn with great losse of their men beaten backe into the citie: where in pursuing of them, the Christians were by certaine Ianizaries (laid close for that purpose) suddenly assailed and dangerously gauled, the Countie himselfe being hurt in his left arme, and some other capitaines slaine. In all which sallies, although the Turkes were still put to the worse, yet thereby they gained time in some good sort to repaire againe their breaches.

Shortly after, the Imperials thus lying at the siege, certainly enformed that a world of the fierce and rude Tartars by the incitement of the Turke (hauing made themselues way through V^{ALACHIA}) were comming as farre as T^{EMESVAR} to relieue B^{UDA}; thought it not best (especially now that W^{INTER} was come) to abide the comming of that so great a Northern tem-C pest, but betimes whilest they had yet space, to raise their siege and be gone: VVhich they did the sixteenth of Nouember, leauing the W^{ATER} citie, with all that they had got about B^{UDA} againe vnto the enimie: onely P^{ESTH} they furnished with victuals and all things else necessarie, leauing therein almost ten thousand souldiours in garrison, for the defence thereof against the Barbarous enimie. As for A^{DOM}, it was strengthened with a garrison of Hungarians only, with their wages offered to be paid before hand; which for all that they refused to accept, alledging that for the great danger this place was exposed vnto aboue others, they could not safely take their oath for the defence thereof: yet offering withall to vndertake the charge, and to doe what befecomed valiant souldiours, in such sort, as that all men should well vnderstand, that nothing euill should happen thereunto through their default or negligence.

D The siege of B^{UDA} for feare of the Tartars thus giuen ouer, and the Imperials departed and gone, the Turkes forthwith came downe out of the higher citie into the lower, declaring their joy for the recouerie thereof, by the often thundring of their great ordinance, with diuers other signes of triumph. But whilest in their jollitie they spared not by the mouth of the cannon to send commendations to them of P^{ESTH}, they from them againe received the like; but in such rude manner, that the Turkes wearie of such greetings, requested them to spare their shot and powder, and quietly to liue by them as became neighbours for that W^{INTER} vntill the next Spring, at which time it was to be thought that this strife should be ended by their Emperours, the weaker yeelding vnto the stronger either the one or the other citie. Yet for all this their great joy, their cheere in B^{UDA} was not great, victuals by this siege being become so scarce, that E it was by the Turkes feared, That if the Christians had there longer lien, they should for verie want haue been enforced to haue yeelded the citie. Of which their need their friends not ignorant, and hauing made what prouision they were able for their reliefe, were with a great conuoy bringing the same towards B^{UDA}: whereof the garrisons of C^{OMARA} and S^{TRIGONIUM} hauing intelligence, went presently out; and meeting with the Turkes in the midway betwixt A^{LBAREGALIS} and B^{UDA}, overthrew the conuoy, and carried away all that prouisi-on of victuall, like vnbidden guests making themselues merrie with that which was neuer provided for them.

resorted vnto his campe) had this yeare ouerrun a great part of the Turkes dominions in ASIA, G putting all to fire and sword that stood in his way, ransacking also diuers walled and fenced cities by the way as he went: VVhich hee might the more easily doe, for that the Ianizaries of ALEPPO and DAMASCO, with many other their partakers and fauourits which might greatly haue hindered his proceedings, were at the same time also vp in armes and together by the eares amongst themselves, to the great benefit of the Scrimano: who in the midst of the course of these his desired fortunes, fell sicke of a naturall diseafe and so died. By whose death the rebellion was no whit appeased (as commonly in like case it falleth out, and as was then of many expected) but in short time grew to be both farre greater and more dangerous than before: for the Scrimano was no sooner dead, but that a yonger brother of his, no lesse warlike and courageous than himselfe (to the great contentment of the rebellious) stept vp in his place, fiercely prosecuting the warres his brother had before him taken in hand. Against whom Hassan Bassa by commandement from the Grand signior with a great armie setting forward, with hope in that newnesse of his command to haue oppressed him, and so to haue quenched that so spreading a fire: at length met with him that was easie enough to be found, and joyning battell with him, was by him in a great and bloudie fight ouerthrowne and slaine together with his whole armie, except such as by speedie flight sau'd themselves from the furie of their fierce enemies. So that Mahomet the great Sultan now enforced to employ his best commanders and souldiours into those parts for the subduing of him, hath for that cause called Mahomet the Visier Bassa out of HUNGARIE, to serue against this new rebell: but with what successe, I leaue it to be hereafter told by my selfe, if God giue life, or by some other that better can, as time shall reueale the same. The rebell in the meane time following the course of his victorie, made hauocke of all as he went, taking vnto his owne vse all such tribute as was in those countries and others also further off, due vnto the great Sultan; hauing of late exacted onely of the citie of ANCYRA and the countrey thereabout, three hundred thousand duckats: so by exacting of great summes of money from the countrey people (such as be his enemies) heaping vp great treasures for the maintenance of his warres.

Now though Mahomet the Turkish emperor had called home Mahomet the Visier Bassa out of HUNGARIE to goe against the rebels into ASIA (as is aforesaid) yet had hee before provided, that for the better assurance of his townes and territories in HUNGARIE, the Tatar Han with a great power of his Crim Tartars should euen against that time come downe into that countrey. VVhich rough and needie people (dwelling neere vnto the fennes of MARIUS) for pay or prey, alwaies readie to doe the Othoman emperours seruice, setting forward vnder the leading of their great Han himselfe, and of his two sonnes; and by plaine force breaking through VALACHIA, though not without great losse of their men (being fought with by the Valachians and free Haiduckes a whole day) were now in the latter end of December with their huge companies come into HUNGARIE; the Han himselfe with fortie thousand to QVINCQUE ECCLESIA, and his sonnes with twentie thousand moe into POSSEGA (a fertile countrey lying betwene the great riuers Saues and Dräus:) where they spoiled as well the Turkes as the other poore Christians, pretending all that frontier countrey with the whole command thereof to be giuen vnto them by the Turkish emperor in reward of their seruice. But long they lay not there quiet, but that to shew for what they came, they enforced the Christians thereabout to victuall CANISIA for the Turkes: and so breaking into STIRIA, not farre from CORAMANT, the neerest fortresse of the Christians towards CANISIA, carried away about two thousand Christians captiues: and shortly after surprising KETSCHMET, a great and populous towne, slew most part of the inhabitants, and carried away the rest prisoners. Other some of them also at the same time making an inrode to SHARVAR, and hauing burnt twentie countrey villages downe to the ground, carried away thence about a thousand soules into most miserable captiuitie and thraldome. They also at their first comming relieved them of BUDA, the lord Nadasi with his Hussars, who before kept them from victuals, not being able (for the great number of them) now longer so to doe. By them also the Turkes encouraged, M tooke and burnt certaine places possessed by the Christians neere vnto BUDA, putting them all to the sword that they found therein. So that the poore countrey of HUNGARIE (neuer to be sufficiently pitied) with the rest of the countreys and prouinces belonging vnto the house of AVSTRIA, and confining vpon the Turke, were not so much eased by the calling home of the Hassan Bassa slaine, and his armie ouerthrowne by the rebels.

Diuers incursions of the Tartars into the frontiers of the emperor, terrified, and much harme by them there done.

A the Visier Bassa with his armie, as they were now annoyed by the comming of these roagish Tartars, a people wholly euen from their infancie giuen to the spoile. Against whom for all that, the Christians besides their ordinarie garrisons began now euen in the depth of Winter to oppose some other of their forces also: the Palatine of RHENE sending ten companies of horsemen to POSSONIVM from thence to be sent to SHARVAR, for the defence of STIRIA: and Colloitz (but lately knighted by the emperor) for his part raising foure hundred horse, a thousand Hussares, and three thousand of the free Haiduckes, for the repelling of those Tartars: the duke of BRUNSVVICK also at that time for the same seruice sending thither a thousand horse, with two thousand foot, against those sworn enemies of the Christian Religion.

B The troubles of this yeare thus ouerpast, ALBA REGALIS being by the Christians lost, 1603 PRUTH with some other places woon, TRANSYLVANIA recouered, BUDA besieged, the Visier Bassa returned, and the Tartars come into HUNGARIE: Ianuarie with a sharpe frost began to open the next yeare (euen this which now is, viz. 1603) by force whereof the riuers in many places, but especially in those more Easterly countries, were not onely frozen ouer, but seemed rather wholly turned into yse, Danubius that great riuier (for all his swift course) being then also (as it is often) so hard frozen, that men and carts might safely passe too and fro thereupon. In which so hard a season, the Turkes in garrison at BUDA hauing once vpon the frozen riuier braued the Christians in PRUTH, and the two and twentieth of Ianuarie comming out the second time in like brauerie, were by two hundred of the Christian souldiours of PRUTH put to flight: vpon whom the Turkes in greater number returning, chased them likewise backe againe euen to the bridge whereby they were to haue passed the ditch into the citie; which now drawne vp, for feare of greater harme from such a number of the Turkes as were now come out, the poore souldiours so shut out, and too weake for so great a power of their enemies; were there all euery man slaine, the Turkes themselves with little harme returning to BUDA. But within a few daies after, one Lehner (a capitaine of the Christian garrison) grieved more than the rest with this so great a dishonour, and certainly vnderstanding that certaine of the chiefe of the Turkes of BUDA, with two captainies and a great traine of gallant gendewomen were for their pleasure gone to the hoat bathes neere vnto BUDA; taking with him threescore muskietiers, went in hast ouer the riuier vpon the ice to salute them in their bath, and to wish it might be vnto D them wholesome: who comming suddenly vpon them, as they were merrie and bathing of themselves, and not dreaming of any such danger, slew all the men except one boy; the gentlewomen in the time of the conflict naked as they were, running as fast as they could vnto the citie, feare hauing in them overcome the modestie of their sex. VVhich exploit done, the captiue leauing the Turkes slaine in the bath, now become red with their blood, returned with his souldiours the same way he came to PRUTH: after whom they of BUDA (stirred vp with the crye of the fearefull women) sent out certaine of their garrison after them, but to no purpose, for why they were in safetie before got home. By continuance of this frost, by reason that victuals could not be sent downe the riuier, the souldiours in garrison at PRUTH were driuen to such wants, as that dogs and cats were accounted good meat amongst them.

E About this time also, the Ianizaries and Spahi, the Turkes best souldiours, perceiving the warres against the rebels in ASIA not to haue bene so well managed as they could haue wished, and as in truth they might haue bene, many of their captainies and commanders (as it was thought) secretly fauouring and furthering the rebels proceedings, whereby much of their blood had bene spilt, and many a good man through their carelesse lost, to the small good of their Sultan; rise now vp in a tumult, and so as men enraged, beset the house of the chiefe of the Visier Bassas: VVho much dismayed therewith, and vnderstanding the cause of their discontentment, went in hast vnto Mahomet, requesting him for the speedie appeasing of so dangerous a sedition to haue the hearing of the matter himselfe, and with exemple punishment to chastise such as were by those his worthie souldiours suspected. VVho forthwith called (as they were by them named) were without more adoe in their presence beheaded, and others placed in their stead: who with what fortune they haue for these five moneths last past managed the said warre, Time (which all reuealeth) shall in short time make knowne.

The Tartars also, beside the great harme by them before done, this moneth breaking into the lesser WARDENIA, ransacked and spoiled five and twentie countrey villages, carrying away with them them a great bootie both of men and cattell, no man resisting of them. At which time also another companie of them at diuers intodes by them made into Countie Serinus his island, and so to RACKENSVORGE, carried away ten thousand men prisoners: For remedie of which mischiefs, Collonitz hauing gathered an armie of ten thousand strong, came at length into the frontiers of HUNGARIE, to haue a sight of these Tartars, and to welcome them: who not willing to come to any set battell with him, would in no place abide his coming; but went still picking vp and downe the countrey, as the manner of their seruice is; alwaies fitter to spoile than to fight. The dead time of this yeare (vnfit for great armies to keepe the field) thus passing, Graninus (one of the emperours great commanders) hauing before sent out diuers spies to BELGRADE, TEMESVVAR, and such other places, to take view of the Tartars forces, was by one of them (which was sent to TEMESVVAR, and had serued the Tartar three yeares) in March certainly enformed, That the Tartar Han had with him about fife and fortie thousand Tartars, beside others which lay here and there dispersed vpon the frontiers: and that Zachell Mäffes hauing requested of him fiftene thousand horsemen for the foraging of TRANSYLVANIA, could obtaine of him but ten thousand onely, the Han himselve purposing with the rest as occasion should serue to make an inrode into AUSTRIA, expecting still for the coming of a new supplye of threecore thousand Tartars moe, which he daily looked for.

Buda victualled.

This moneth also they of BUDA making shew as if they would haue made an expedition towards ADOM, vnder the colour thereof, receiued into their citie a conuoy of fife hundred waggons laden with victuals and munition. And thereupon in great iollitie with their thundering shot saluted their ouerthwart neighbours at PASTREIN; which doing, fire by chance falling into their powder, did themselues much more harme, than had they with their shooting done their enemies. And shortly after, the same garrison souldiours of BUDA going forth, thought to haue vpon the sudden surprised PALOTTA; but being in good time discouered, were deceiued of their hope, and with great losse enforced to retire: vnto whom the capitaine of the castle, by a countrey peasant before sworne to doe the errand, sent a saucer full of salt, and a botle of wine, willing them in derision with that salt to salt the flesh they had gotten at his castle, to keepe it from putrifying, and of that botle of wine in kindnesse to drinke an health vnto him. Collonitz also much about the same time, viz. the one and twentieth of March, going betimes in a morning with his armie towards CANISIA, lay close in a wood about a mile from the towne with his scouts, conueniently placed halfe a mile neerer; vpon whom fife of the Turkes coming out of the towne by chance lighting, were three of them slaine, the fourth taken, the fift by good hap escaping through the marshes backe againe into the towne: Who telling there what had happened, told withall; That they were but certaine stragling Haiducks that lay there in the wood in hope of some bootie: for the oppressing of whom, foure hundred of the Turkes there in garrison, going out, and entering into the wood, fell before they were aware, into the danger of Collonitz his armie, and were there two hundred of them slaine, and an hundred and thirtie of them moe taken, the rest by speedie flight sauing themselues.

Foure hundred of the Turkes got into Canis intercepted by the Christians.

The Conclusion.

Thus with many sharpe skirmishes (the common exercises of the Turks, and those warlike people in HUNGARIE and the other frontier countries) passed the dead time of the yeare, with a good part of this last Spring also; no great armie either of the Christians or of the Turkes (more than the roaming Tartars, and such small forces as the Christians had, as is aforesaid, opposed against them) yet appearing in the field. Since which time what hath happened, especially in these two or three moneths last past; or what is euen at this present in doing (being the time of the yeare that the Turkes vse commonly to set forth with their great armies, and to vndertake their greatest exploits in) is not as yet come to my knowledge. So that hauing farre beyond my hope and the strength of my weak and sickly bodie, by the power of the Almighty passed through the Historie of this the greatest Monarchie now on earth, I must

A must now here needs make an end: beseeching his omnipotent maiestie, for his onely Sonne our Sauour Christ his sake, in mercie to turne the hearts of this mightie and froward people vnto the knowledge of his Sonne crucified, and the loue of his truth: or otherwise in his iustice, (for the more manifesting of his glorie) to root out their most bloud-thirstie and wicked empire, with all the rest of the blasphemous Mahometanes; so by prooffe to confirme the truth of that hath long agoe been foretold, and for many ages beleueed; as also by the Turkes themselves not a little feared, That the Mahometane superstition, by the sword begun, and by the sword maintained, shall at length by the Christian sword also be destroyed: in such sort, as that the name of Gog and Magog be no more heard of vnder heauen, but that all may be one blessed flocke vnder one great shepherd Christ Iesus: At the greatnesse of which worke all the world wondering, may with joy sing

Vnto him in Trinitie, and Trinitie in Vnitie, be all honour and glorie world without end.

C A brieue discourse of the greatnesse of the Turkish empire: as also wherein the greatest strength thereof consisteth, and of what power the bordering princes, as well Mahometanes as Christians are in comparision of it.

He Historie of the Turkes (being indeede nothing els but the true record of the wofull ruines of the greater-part of the Christian commonweale) thus as before passed through, and at length brought to end; and their empire (of all others now vpon earth farre the greatest) as a proud champion still standing vp as it were in defiance of the whole world: I thought it good for the conclusion of this my labour, to propose vnto the view of the zealous Christian, the greatnesse thereof; and so neere as I could to set downe the bounds and limits within the which it is (by the goodnesse of God) as yet continued, together with the strength and power thereof, as also in what regard it hath the neighbour princes bordering or confining vpon it, with some other particularities tending vnto the same purpose. All or most part whereof, although it be by the considerat well to be gathered out of the whole course of the Historie before going, yet shall it more plainly here together in the full thereof appeare, than by the long and particular consideration of the rising and encrease thereof be perceiued: not much vnlike the ouergrowne tree, at the greatnesse whereof euerie man wondereth, no man in the meane time either perceiuing or marking how by little and little in tract of time it grew vp to that bignesse, as now to ouertop all the rest of the wood. The imperiall seat of this so great and dreadfull an empire, is the most famous citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, sometime the glorie of the Greeke empire, but now the place where Mahomet the third of that name, and thirteenth of the Othoman emperours, acknowledging no man like vnto himselfe, triumpheth ouer many nations: a citie fatally founded to commaund, and by the great conquerour Tamerlan of all others thought to be the best seated for the empire of the world. In which citie (taken from the Christians by Mahomet the second, by the Turkes surnamed Great, and the Greeke empire by him subuerted) as the Othoman emperours haue euer since reared themselves, so haue they wonderfully euen to the astonishment of the world, out of the ruins of that so glorious a State encreased both their strength and empire, almost altogether fixed euen in the selfesame kingdomes, countries, and regions, as was sometimes that; though not as yet (God be thanked) able to attaine to the vitermost bounds that that empire sometimes had, especially especially in EVROPE; albeit that it haue oftentimes in pride thereof most mightily swolne, and in some few places thereof somewhat also exceeded the same. Amongst the rest of the Othoman emperours, this great Monarch of whom we speake (namely Mahomet the third, which now raigneth in that most stately and imperiall citie) hath at this present vnder his commaund and empire, the chiefe and most fruitfull parts of the three first knowne parts of the world: onely AMERICA remaining free from him, not more happie with the rich mines thereof, than in that it is so farre from out of his reach. For in EVROPE he hath all the sea coast from the confines of EPIDAVRVS (the vttermost bound of his empire in EVROPE Westward) vnto the mouth of the riuer Tanais, now called Don, with whatsoeuer lieth betwixt BVDA in HUNGARIE, and the imperiall citie of CONSTANTINOPLE: in which space is comprehended the better part of HUNGARIE, all BOSNA, SERVIA, BVLGARIA, with a great part of DALMATIA, EPIRVS, H MACEDONIA, GRÆCIA, PELOPONESVS, THRACIA, the ARCHIPELAGO, with the rich islands contained therein. In AFRICA he possesseth all the sea coast from VELEZ (or as some call it BELIS) DE GOMERA, or more truly to say, from the riuer Muluia (the bounder of the kingdome of FUZ) euen vnto the Arabian gulf or red sea Eastward, except some few places vpon the riuage of the sea holden by the king of SPAIN, viz. MERSALCARI, MELILLA, ORAN, and PENNON: and from ALEXANDRIA Northward vnto the citie of ASNA, called of old SIENE, Southward: in which space are contained the famous kingdomes of TREMIZEN, ALGIERS, TYNES, and ÆGYP, with diuers other great cities and provinces. In ASIA all is his from the straits of Hellepontus Westward, vnto the great citie of TAVRIS Eastward: and from DERBENT neere vnto the Caspian sea Northward, vnto ADENA vpon the gulf of ARABIA Southward. The greatnesse of this his empire may the better be conceiued by the greatnesse of some parts thereof: the meere of MEOTIS, which is all at the Turkish emperours command, being in compasse a thousand miles; and the Euxine or Blacke sea in circuit two thousand and seuen hundred; and the Mediterranean coast which is subiect vnto him, containing in compasse about eight thousand miles. But to speake of his whole territorie together, he goeth in his owne dominion from TAVRIS to BVDA, about three thousand two hundred miles. The like distance is from DERBENT vnto ADENA. From BALSER vpon the Persian gulf vnto TREMISENA in BARBARIE, are accounted little lesse than foure thousand miles. He hath also in the sea the most noble islands of CYPRVS, EVBOA, RHODVS, SAMOS, CHIOS, LESBOS, and others of the ARCHIPELAGO. In this so large and spacious an empire are contained many great and large countries, sometime most famous kingdomes, abounding with all manner of worldly blessings and natures store: For what kingdome or countrey is more fruitfull than ÆGYP, SYRIA, and a great part of ASIA? What countrey more wealthie or more plentifull of all good things than was sometime HUNGARIE, GRÆCIA, & THRACIA? In which countries he hath also many rich and famous cities, but especially foure, which be of greatest wealth and trade: namely CONSTANTINOPLE, CAIRE, ALEPPO, and TAVRIS. CONSTANTINOPLE for multitude of people exceedeth all the cities of EVROPE; wherein are deemed to be about seuen hundred thousand men: which if it be so, is almost equall to two such cities as PARIS in FRANCE. ALEPPO is the greatest citie of SYRIA, and as it were the centre whereunto all the marchandise of ASIA repaire. TAVRIS of late the royall seat of the Persian kings, and one of the greatest cities of that kingdome, from whom it was in this our age taken by Amurath the third, hath in it about two hundred thousand men. CAIRE amongst all the cities of AFRICA is the chiefe, leauing all others farre behind it (although that some make the citie CANO equall vnto it in greatness) being as it were the store-house not of ÆGYP onely and of a great part of AFRICA, but of INDIA also; the riches whereof being brought by the red sea to SUBS, and from thence vpon cammels to CAIRE, and so downe the riuer Nilis to ALEXANDRIA, are thence dispersed into all these Western parts: albeit that this rich trade hath of late time bene much empaired, and so like more to be, the Christians (especially the Portingals) trafficking into the East Indies; and by the vast Ocean transporting the rich commodities of those Easterne countries into the West, to the great hinderance of the Grand signior his customes in CAIRE.

The Othoman government in this his so great an empire is altogether like the government of the master ouer his slaue, and indeed meere tyrannicall: for the great Sultan is so absolute a lord of all things within the compasse of his empire, that all his subjects and people be they neuer so great, doe call themselves his slaues and not his subjects: neither hath any man power ouer himselfe,

the greatnesse of the Turkish Empire.

- A selfe, much lesse is he lord of the house wherein he dwelleth, or of the land which he tilleth, except some few families in CONSTANTINOPLE, vnto whom some few such things were by way of reward and vpon speciall fauour giuen by Mahomet the second, at such time as he wooon the same. Neither is any man in that empire so great or yet so farre in fauour with the great Sultan, as that he can assure himselfe of his life, much lesse of his present fortune or state, longer than it pleaseth the Grand signior. In which so absolute a souerainetie (by any free borne people not to be endured) the tyrant preferueth himselfe by two most especiall meanes: first by taking of all arms from his naturall subjects; and then by putting the same and all things els concerning the state and the government thereof into the hands of the Apostata or renegade Christians, whom for most part euery third, fourth, or fift year (or oftener if his need so require) he taketh in their childhood from their miserable parents, as his tenths or tribute children. Whereby he gaineth two great commodities: first, for that in so doing he spoileth the provinces hee most feareth of the flower, sinewes, and strength of the people, choice being still made of the strongest youths and fittest for warre: then, for that with these as with his owne creatures he armeth himselfe, and by them assureth his state: for they in their childhood taken from their parents laps, and deliuered in charge to one or other appointed to that purpose, quickly and before they be aware become Mahometanes; and so no more acknowledging father or mother, depend wholly of the great Sultan, who to make vse of them, both feeds them and fosters them, at whose hands only they looke for all things, and whom alone they thanke for all. Of which frie so taken from their Christian parents (the onely seminarie of his warres) some become horsemen, some footmen, and so in time the greatest commanders of his state and empire next vnto himselfe, the naturall Turkes in the meane time giuing themselves wholly vnto the trade of marchandise and other their mechanical occupations: or els vnto the feeding of cattell, their most auient and naturall vocation, not intermeddling at all with matters of government or state. So that if vnto these his souldiors, all of the Christian race, you ioine also his fleet and money, you haue as it were the whole strength of his empire: for in these fourt, his horsemen, footmen, his fleet, and money, especially consisteth his great force and power: whereof to speake more particularly, and first concerning his money, it is commonly thought that his ordinarie reuenue exceedeth not eight millions of gold. And albeit that it might seeme, that he might of so large an empire receiue a farre greater reuenue, yet doth he not, for that both he and his men of warre (in whose power all things are) haue their greatest and almost onely care vpon armes, fitter by nature to waite and delstroy countrey than to preserue and enrich them: infomuch, that for the preseruacion of their armies, and furtherance of their expeditions (euery yeare to doe) they most grieuouly spoile euen their own people and provinces whereby they passe, scarce leauing them necessaries wherewith to liue; so that the subjects despairing to enjoy the fruits of the earth, much lesse the riches which by their industrie and labour they might get vnto themselves, doe now no further endeavour themselves either to husbandrie or traffique than they must needs, yea theri very necessitie it selfe enforce them: For to what end aualeth it to sow that another man must reape? or to reape that which another man is readie to deuour? Whereupon it commeth, that in the territories of the Othoman empire, yea euen in the most fruitfull countries of MACEDONIA and GREECE are scene great forrests, all euery where wast, few cities well peopled, and the greatest part of those countreys lying desolate and desert: so that husbandrie (in all well ordered commonweales the principall greatest store) decaying, the earth neither yeeldeth her encrease vnto the painefull husbandman, neither he matter vnto the artificer, neither the artificer wares to furnish the marchant with, all together with the plough running into ruine and decay. As for the trade of marchandise, it is almost all in the hands of the Iewes, or the Christians of EVROPE, viz. the Ragufians, Venecians, Genouaies, French, or English; the naturall Turkes hauing therein the least to doe, holding in that their so large an empire no other famous cities for trade, more than the foure abouenamed, viz. CONSTANTINOPLE, TAVRIS, ALEPPO, and CAIRE: whereunto may be added CAFFA and THESSALONICA in EVROPE, DAMASCVS, TRIPOLIS, and ADEN in ASIA: ALEXANDRIA and ALGIERS in AFRICK. In our countries here in this West part of EVROPE, of the abundance of people oftentimes ariseth dearth; but in many parts of the Turkes dominions, for want of men to manue the ground: most part of the poore countrey people drawne from their owne dwellings, being enforced with victuals and other necessaries to follow their great armies in their long expeditions, of whom scarcely one of ten euer returne home home to their dwellings againe, there by the way perishing, if not by the enemies sword, yet by G wants, the intemperatnesse of the aire, or immoderate paines taking. But to come neerer vnto our purpose, although the great Turkes ordinarie reuenues be no greater than is aforesaid, yet are his extraordinarie escheats to be greatly accounted of, especially his confiscations, forfeitures, fines, amercements (which are right many) his tributes, customes, riches and tenths of all preyes taken by sea or land, with diuers other such like, far exceeding his standing and certaine reuenew:

his Bassaes and other his great officers like rauening Harpies as it were sucking out the blood of his poore subjects, and heaping vp inestimable treasures, which for the most part fall againe into the Grand signior his coffers. Ibrahim the Visier Bassa (who died but the last yeare) is supposed to haue brought with him from CATRE to the value of six millions: and Mahomet another of the Visiers was thought to haue had a farre greater summe. His presents also amount vnto a great H matter: for no embassadour can come before him without gifts, no man is to hope for any commodious office or preferment without money, no man may with emptic hands come vnto the presence of him so great a prince, either from the prouince he had the charge of, or from any great expedition he was sent vpon; neither vnto so great and mightie a prince are trifles presented. The Vayvoods of MOLDAVIA, WALACHIA, and TRANSYLVANIA (before their late reault) by gifts preferred themselves in their principalities, being almost daily changed, especially in WALACHIA and MOLDAVIA: for those honours were by the Grand signior still gi-uen to them that would giue most; who to performe what they had offered, miserably oppressed the people, and brought their prouinces into great pouertie. In briefe, an easie thing it is for the great tyrant to find occasion for him at his pleasure to take away any mans life, together with his I wealth, be it neuer so great: so that he cannot well be said to lacke money, so long as any of his subjects hath it. Neuerthelesse, the late Persian warre so emptied the most couetous Sultan A- murath his offers, and exhausted his treasures, that all ouer his empire the value of his gold was beyond all credit enhaunfed, inso much that a Checcine was twice so much worth as before: beside that, the metall whereof his gold and siluer was made, was so embased, that it gaue occasion vnto the Ianizaries to set fire vpon the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE, to the great terror not of the vulgar fort onely, but of the Grand signior himselfe also. And in the citie of ALEX- PO onely were in the name of the great Sultan threescore thousand Checcines taken vp in prest of the marchants there, which how well they were repayed, we leaue for them to report.

The Turkish Timarioris of greater value than his reuenues.

Now albeit that the Turks reuenues be not so great as the largenesse of his empire and the K fruitfulnesse of his countries might seeme to affoord, all the soile being his owne; yet hath he in his dominion a commoditie of greater value and vse than are the reuenues themselves: which is the multitude of the Timariots or pensioners, which are all horsemen, so called of Timaro, that is, a stipend which they haue of the great Sultan, viz. the possession of certaine villages and townes, which they hold during their life, and for which they stand bound for euery threescore duckats they haue of yearly reuenew to maintaine one horseman, either with bow and arrowes, or els with targuet and lance; and that as well in time of peace as warre: for the Orthoman emperours take vnto themselves all such lands as they by the sword win from their enemies, as well Mahometanes as Christians, all which they deuide into Timars, or as we may call them Com-mendams, which they giue vnto their souldiors of good desert for tearme of life, vpon condi- L tion, that they shall (as is aforesaid) according to the proportion thereof keepe certaine men and horses fit for seruice alwaies readie whensoever they shall be called vpon. Wherin consisteth the greatest pollicie of the Turks, and the surest meane for the preservation of their empire. For if by this meane the care of manuring the ground were not committed vnto the souldiors, for the profit they hope thereof, but left in the hand of the plaine painefull husbandman, all would in that so waile an empire lie wast and desolate; the Turks themselves commonly saying, That wherefoeuer the Grand signior his horse setteth his foot; the grasse will there no more grow:
meaning, the destruction that their great armies bring in all places where they come. The institution of these Timariots, and the taking vp of the Azamoglan (for so they call those children M which are taken vp from their Christian parents to be brought vp for Ianizaries) are the two chiefe pillars of the Turkes empire, and the strength of their warres: both which seeme to be de-uised vnto the imitation of the Romanes, as are diuers things moe in the Turkish government; for the Romane emperours vsed their owne subjects in their warres, and of them consisted the Prætorian armie, which neuer departed from the emperours side, but were still to guard his person,

the greatnesse of the Turkish Empire.

- A son as doe the Ianizaries the great Turke. And in the Romane empire lands were giuen vnto souldiors of good desert for them to take the profit of during their liues, in reward of their good seruice and valour, which were called Beneficia, and they which had them, Beneficiarij, or as wee tearme them, Benefices, and Beneficed men. Alexander Seuerus graunted vnto such souldiors heires that they might enjoy those lands and commendams, vpon condition also, that they themselves should serue as had their fathers, otherwise not. Constantine also the great gaue vnto his captaines that had well deserved of him, certaine lands for them to liue vpon during the tearme of their life. The like sees in FRANCE which they called Fendes, were of temporaries made perpetuities by these their late kings. These Timariot horsemen in the Turkish empire serue to two great and most notable purposes: whereof the first is, that by them the Grand sig-nior as with a bridle keepeth the rest of his subjects in euery part of his great empire in awe, so that they cannot so soone moue, but that they shall haue these his Timariots as faulcons in their neckes; for to that purpose they are dispersed all ouer his dominions and empire: The other vse of them (and no lesse profitable than the former) is for that out of them he is alwaies able at his pleasure to draw into the field an hundred and fiftie thousand horsemen well furnished, readie to goe whether soeuer he shall commaund them: with all whom he is not at one farthing charge.
Which so great a power of horsemen cannot be continually maintained for lesse than foureene millions of duckats yearly. Wherefore it is to be maruelled, that some comparing the Turkes reuenues with the Christians, make no mention of this so great a part of the Orthoman emperours wealth and strength, seruing him first for the suppressing of all such tumults as might arise C in his empire, and then as a most principall strength of his continuall warres, alwaies readie to serue him in his greatest expeditions. The number of these Timariot horsemen is now growne very great, taking encrease together with the Turkes empire. It is reported that Amurath the third, father to this Mahomet that now reigneth, in his late warres against the Persian, subdued vnto himselfe so much territorie as serued him to erect therein fortie thousand Timariots: and appointed at TAVRIS a new receit, which was yearly worth vnto him a million of gold. These Timariots are in all accounted to bee seuen hundred and nineteene thousand fighting men: of whom two hundred fiftie seuen thousand haue their abode and dwelling in EVROPE; and foure hundred sixtie two thousand in ASIA and AFRICKA. Beside these Timariots, the Grand signior hath a great number of other horsemen also vnto whom he giueth pay, which are his Spahi, D Vlufagi, and Carapici of his Court, being indeed the nurseries and seminaries of the great officers and gouernours of his empire: for from among them are ordinarily chosen the Sanzacks, which afterwards through their good deserts or the Sultans great fauour, become Visiers, Beglerbegs, and Bassaes, the chiefe rulers of that so mightie a Monarchie. He hath also still in his armies a great multitude of other horsemen called Acanziz, being indeed but rural clownes, yet for certaine priuiledges which they haue are bound to goe vnto the warres, being euen of the Turkes themselves accounted of small worth or value in comparison of the Timariots. He receiuech great aid also from the Tartars in his warres, as also from the Valachians and Moldauians (vntill that now of late by the example of the Translyuanians they haue to the great benefit of the rest of the Christian commonweale reuolted from him): all which are to be accounted as the E Romanes Auxiliarij, that is to say, such as come to aid and assilt him. And thus much for his horsemen.
- Another great part of his strength consisteth in his footmen, and especially in his Ianizaries: The in which two things are to be considered, their Nation, and Dexteritie in arms. Concerning their Nation, such of the Azamoglan as are borne in ASIA, are not ordinarily enrolled in the number of the Ianizaries, but such as are borne in EVROPE: for they of ASIA are accounted more effeminate, as they haue bene alwaies, more readie to flie than to fight: whereas the people of EVROPE haue euen in the East bene accounted for better and more valiant souldiours, hauing there to their immortal glorie set vp the notable trophees of their most glorious victories. The souldiors of ASIA be called Turkes after the name of their nation, and not of their country (no country being indeed so properly called) and they of EVROPE Rumi, that is to say, Romani or F Romanes, as the country especially about CONSTANTINOPLE, is called by the name of ROMANIA. Now as concerning their Dexteritie, such lonies therein, knowyn by the name of ROMANIA. Now as concerning their Dexteritie, such male children are culled out from the Christians, as in whom appeareth the greatest strength,

strength, actiuitie, and courage: for these three qualities are in a souldier especially required. This choice is made every third yeare, except necessitie enforce it to be made sooner, as it happened in the late Persian warre: wherein not onely oftener choice was made, but they were glad to use the Azamogians also, a thing neuer before by them done. For those youths, the children of Christian parents, being by them that haue taken them vp brought to CONSTANTINOPLE, are taken view of by the Aga of the Ianizaries, who causeth to be registred the name of the youth, with the name of his father and countrey wherein he was borne: which done, part of them are sent into the lesser ASIA (now called NATOLIA) and other prouinces, where learning the Turkish language and law, they are also infected with the vices and maners of them with whom they liue, and so in short time become right Mahometanes. Another part of them, and those of the most towardliest, is deuoted into cloisters which the Grand signior hath at CONSTANTINOPLE and PERA, of whom the fairest and most handsome are appointed for the Serraglio of the great Sultan himselfe. All the time that these youths thus sent abroad, liue in the lesser ASIA or other the Turkes prouinces, they are not appointed to any certaine exercises, but still kept busied some at husbandrie, some in gardening, some in building, some in other domestick seruices, neuer suffered to be idle, but alwaies occupied in painefull labour; where after certaine yeares they haue bene thus euerted to labour and paines taking, they are called thence into the cloysters of the Azamogians (for so they are called all the time vntill they bee enrolled into the number of the Ianizaries) and are there deliuered vnto certaine speciall gouernours appointed to take charge of them: who keepe them still exercised in painefull worke and labour, entreating them euill ynough, as well in their diet, as in their apparell and lodging: they sleepe together in large roumes like vnto the religious Dormitories, wherein are lampes still burning, and tutors attending, without whose leaue they may not stirre out of their places. There they learne to shoot both in the Bow and Peece, the vse of the Scimitar, with many feats of actiuitie: and being well trained in those exercises, are enrolled amongst the Ianizaries or Spahi: of whom, the Ianizaries receiue not lesse than five aspers, nor more than eight for their daily pay, and the Spahi ten. Being recorded among the Ianizaries; they are either sent away into the warres, or into some garrison, or els attend at the Court. These last haue for their dwelling three great places like vnto three monasteries in the citie of CONSTANTINOPLE: there they liue vnder their gouernours, to whom they are deputed, the younger with great obedience and silence seruing the elder in buying of things for them, in dressing of their meat, and such like seruices. They that be of one feat or calling, liue together at one table, and sleepe in long walkes. If any of them vpon occasion chance to lie all night abroad without leaue, the next euening hee is notably beaten, with such nurture and discipline, that after his beating he like an Ape kisseth his gouernours hands that so corrected him. These Ianizaries haue many large priuiledges, are honoured, although they be most insolent, and are feared of all men, yea euen of the great Sultan himselfe, who is still glad to make faire weather with them. In their expeditions or trauell they rob the poore Christians cottages and houses, who must not say one word to the contrarie. When they buy any thing, they giue for it but what they list themselves. They can be judged by none but by their Aga: neither can they be executed without danger of an insurrection, and therefore such execution is seldome done, and that very secretly. They haue a thousand royalties: some of them are appointed to the keeping of embassadours sent from forraine princes: other some of them are assigned to accompanie strangers, traouellers, especially them that be men of the better sort, to the intent they may safely passe in the Turkes dominions, for which seruice they are commonly well rewarded. They haue made choice of their prince, namely of Selymus the first, his father Baiazer yet liuing; neither can any the Turkes Sultans account themselves fully instituted in their imperiall dignitie, or assured of their estate, vntill they be by them approued and proclaimed. Every one of their Sultans at his first comming to the empire doth giue them some great largesse; and sometime the better to please them, encreaseth also their pay. In euery great expedition some of them goeth forth with their Aga or his lieutenant, and are the last of all that fight. There is no office among the Turkes that moe enuieat, than at the office of the Aga of the Ianizaries, for the greatnesse of his authoritie and command: onely he and the Beglerbeg of GRACIA chuse not their owne lieutenants, but haue them nominated vnto them by the Grand signior. Vnto this great man the Aga of the Ianizaries, nothing can portend a more certaine destruction, than to be of them beloued, for then is he of the great Sultan straightway feared

A red or mistrusted, and so occasion sought for to take him out of the way. The number of the Ianizaries of the Court is betwixt ten and foureteene thousand. This warlike order of souldiers is in these our daies much embased: for now naturall Turkes are taken in for Ianizaries, as are also the people of ASIA; whereas in former times none were admitted into that order, but the Christians of EVROPE onely: beside that, they marrie wiues also, contrarie to their ancient custome, which is not now forbidden them. And because of their long lying still at CONSTANTINOPLE (a citie abounding with all manner of pleasure) they are become much more effeminate and slouthfull, but withall most insolent, or more truly to say intollerable. It is commonly reported the strength of the Turkish empire to consist in this order of the Ianizaries, which is not altogether so, for albeit that they be indeed the Turkes best footmen and surest guard of the great Sultans person, yet vndoubtedly the greatest strength of his state and empire resteth nothing so much in them, as in the great multitude of his horsemen, especially his Timariots. Beside these Ianizaries, the Turkish emperor hath a wonderfull number of base footmen, whom the Turkes call Asapi, better acquainted with the spade than with the sword, seruing rather to the wearying of their enemies with their multitude, than the vanquishing of them with their valour: with whose dead bodies the Ianizaries vse to fill vp the ditches of townes besieged, or to serue them for ladders to climbe ouer the enemies wals vpon. But as the Romanes had both their old Legionarie, and other vntrained souldiers, which they called Tirones; of whom the first were the chiefe strength of their warres, and the other but as it were an aid or supplic: euen so the Turke accounteth his Timariot horsemen the strength of his armie, and the Acanziz (which is another sort of base and common horsemen) but as an accessorie: and so amongst his footmen he esteemeth of his Ianizaries, as did the Romanes of their Pratorian legions, but of his Asapi as of shaddowes. The Ianizaries are by none to be commaunded, more than by the great Sultan himselfe, and their Aga; as for the Bassaes, they much regard them not, but in their rage oftentimes foule entreate euen the greatest of them. The Asapi as they are but base and common souldiers, so haue they also their ordinarie captaines and commaunders, men of no great place or marke.

The whole state of the great empire of the Turkes is commaunded by the great Sultan, by the graue aduice and counsell of his Visier Bassaes, which were not wont to be in number aboute foure, so prouiding for his high designs or important resolutions, hardly by a greater multitude to be concealed: howbeit that the Sultans of later times haue had sometimes more, sometimes fewer, as their pleasure was. These men are of all others in that empire the greatest, and for their high places most honoured: vnto them euen the greatest princes that haue any thing to doe in the Turkes Court, sue and send their honourable presents. By their aduice the great Sultan taketh his warres in hand, neither without them concludeth he any peace. They giue the greatest honours and preferments (which are many in that so great and large an empire) are all by their meanes to be obtained: which maketh them of all others to be sought vnto. Some one or other of them are still Generals ouer the great armies of the Turkes, especially in these their late wars, their three last emperours neuer themselves going forth into the field (excepting once that this Mahomet which now reigneth for the maintenance of his credit with his men of warre, came downe into HUNGARIE, and there woon the citie of AGRIA:) which leading of such mightie armies is still with great emulation and ambition of the Visier Bassaes amongst themselves fought after, as well for the great profit thereby vnto them arising, as for the honour thereof, which is of all other the greatest. But leauing these great ones, the chiefe counsellours for his state: the whole bodie of his so large and mightie an empire (all in the hands of martiall men) is gouerned by other great Bassaes, whom they by a most proud barbarous name call Beglerbegs, that is to say, Lords of Lords, euery one of them hauing vnder him certaine Begs or Sanzackes, who are lords and rulers also ouer some particular cities and countries, with the Timariots there: in; yet all still at the command and becke of their Beglerbeg. In auient time there was wont to be but two of these proud Beglerbegs in all the Turkes empire: the one commaunding ouer all the prouinces the Turke had in EVROPE: and the other ouer all that he had in the lesser ASIA, now of the Turkes called NATOLIA: But the Turkish empire greatly augmented in ASIA by Selymus the first, and also afterwards much enlarged both in EVROPE and ASIA by Solyman his sonne, the number of the Beglerbegs were by him encreased, and in some part also changed:

ged: who although that they be all Beglerbeks, and that one of them (especially in time of peace) G in the managing of his souldiors and affaires of his countrey, is not subject to any other, but is onely at the commaund of the great Turke; yet notwithstanding in time of warre, where the Beglerbek of ROMANIA is, all are obedient vnto him, as the chiefe of the rest: insomuch that none of them but onely he and the Bassa of NATOLIA are called by the stately name of Beglerbeks, the others being then onely called the Bassas of such and such places, as of BVDA, ALB-PO, and such like, although indeed they are in nature Beglerbeks, and so written in their records.
For the more manifesting of which their gouernment, as also that they which come hereafter, may by comparing of that which is here written, with the state that then shall be, see how much this great empire in the mean time encrease or diminisheth: I haue thought good here briefely to set downe all the said Beglerbeks with their Sanzackes and Timariots, and as neere as I H could (either by reading or the credible relation of others well trauelled in those countries) together, and as it were at one throw set forth the whole strength and power of this so mightie an empire, as also in what countries and prouinces the same is especially placed.

The Beglerbeks or great Commanders of the Turkes Empire in EVROPE.

I The first and chiefe of all the Beglerbeks in the Turkish empire, is the Beglerbek of ROMANIA
OF GRÆCIA, called of the Turkes RVM-ILI (or as wee say, the Romane countrey) the principall residence of whose Beglerbegship, is at SOPHIA, a citie of BVLGARIA; so appointed I for the commodious situation thereof, for the better commaund of the rest of the prouinces of EVROPE: howbeit that he for the most part or rather altogether abideth at the Court, which the other Beglerbeks cannot doe, for that they are bound not to depart from the gouernment of their prouinces: in which charge they ordinarily continue but three yeares only, the great Sultan still changing and altering them at his pleasure. This Beglerbek hath vnder his owne ensigne and commaund fortie thousand Timariots alwaies readie at his call, vnder the conduct of these one and twentie Sanzackes following, namely, the vnder his charge eight thousand Timariots, beside twelue thousand other souldiors, which in continuall pay lie still readie in garrison in the confines of HUNGARIE, CROATIA, STIRIA, and other places bordering vpon the Christians, but especially the territories belonging to the house of AVSTRIA. He had of late vnder his ensigne and commaund these fiftene Sanzackes, viz. the and beside the countrey thereabout, commaundeth ouer all the Sanzacks neere vnto the great riuer Tanais, and the fennes of Mæotis. It was at first but a Sanzackeship, subject to the Beglerbek of GRÆCIA, and is in truth rather a Beglerbeks place in name than in strength and power.

The Beglerbeg of

- 16 Cyprus, who lieth at Nicosia or Famagusta, commaunding ouer all that great G island, sometime of it selfe a kingdome.
- 17 Scheherezul in Assyria, bordering vpon the Persian, who hath vnder his gouernment ten thousand Timariots.
- 18 Wan, a citie in the confines of the greater Armenia towards Media, who hath vnder him twelue thousand Timariots.
- 19 Artzerum or Erzerum, in the borders of Armenia towards Capadocia, about foure daies journey from Trapezonde, who commaundeth ouer twentie thousand Timariots.

- 21 Siruan or Media, erected by the same Mustapha, and at the same time, commaundeth ouer all that great countrey, sometime a famous kingdome.
- 22 Temir-Capi or Derbent, neere vnto the Caspian sea; taken by Osman Bassa the same yeare 1578, who hauing slaine Schehemet Chan his father in law, reduced that countrey into the forme of a Beglerbegship.
- 23 Cars, a citie of Armenia the greater, distant from Artzerum foure daies journey, by Mustapha Bassa made a Beglerbegship in the yeare 1579.
- 24 Tschilder or Tzilder in the confines of the Georgians, erected by the same Generall Mustapha the same yeare 1579.
- 25 Fassa or Phasis in Mengrelia, neere vnto the Georgians, erected by Fluzales the I Turkes Admirall the same yeare 1579.
- 26 Sochum, in the borders of the Georgians, erected by the great Bassa Sinan in the yeare 1580.
- 27 Batin, there erected also by the same Sinan Bassa.
- 28 Reiman, erected by Ferat Bassa, Generall of the Turkes armie, taken from Tocmaz Chan the Persian in the yeare 1582, whereof Cicala Bassa was the first Beglerbeg.
- 29 Somachia, in the countrey of Media, erected by Osman Bassa in the yeare 1583.
- 30 Tauris, a most famous citie of Armenia the greater, sometime the regall seat K of the Persian kings, but of late taken from them by Osman Bassa, and conuerted into a Beglerbegship in the same yeare 1583, as it is by them yet holden.

But these late erected honours; namely the Beglerbegships of TIFLIS, SIRVAN, TEMIR-CAPI, CARS, TSCHILDER, FASSA, and the rest gained by Amurath from the Persians and the Georgians, although they containe a great territorie, are not of themselves any of them worthe of those proud titles, or yet able to maintaine the same, SIRVAN, REIVAN, and TAVRIS onely excepted: but were by the great Bassaes; Mustapha, Sinan, Ferat, and Osman, Amurath his lieutenants, for their owne greater honour, and the encouraging of them which were to defend those their new conquests, erected; being indeede nothing either in power or strength comparable with the other more auncient Beglerbegs either in EVROPE or ASIA. But hauing thus passed through the great kingdomes and prouinces by the Turkes holden in EVROPE and ASIA, with their proud honours therein, let vs goe forward toward the South, to see what great kingdomes and territories they at this present hold in AFRICKA also.

The Beglerbegs or great Commanders of the Turkes Empire in AFRICKA.

- 1 Misfir, who still making his abode at the great citie of Caire, hath vnder his commaund all the kingdome of Egypt, with sixteene Sanzackes, and an hundred M thousand Timariots.
- 2 Cefair (in auncient time called Iulia Caesaria) but now commonly Algiers, where the Beglerbeg still residing, commaundeth ouer all that kingdome, wherein are fortie thousand Timariots.

3 Tunis.

the greatnesse of the Turkish Empire.

- A The Beglerbeg of
- 3 Tunis, where he still remaining as a Viceroy commaundeth all that great and large kingdome.
 - 4 Tripolis, the seat of his Beglerbegship, by Sinan Bassa taken from the knights of Malta in the yeare 1551.

There are beside these other two kingdomes in AFRICKA enrolled in the Turkes records as their owne, although they be not as yet by them brought into the forme of Beglerbegships: namely the kingdomes of FAS and MAROCO, but are as yet holden by them as their tributaries and vassales.

- But hauing thus as it were taken view of the greatnesse and forces of this so mightie a monarchs Empire by land, and so in some sort bounded it out: let vs consider also his power by sea.
- B With the great Ocean he much medleth not, more than a little in the gulfes of PERIA and ARABIA: most of his territories lying vpon the Mediterranean & Euxine seas, or els more inwardly into the heart of ASIA, neere vnto no sea. Now for these seas, no prince in the world hath greater or better meanes to set forth his fleets than hath he: for the ouergrowne woods of EPYRVS and CILICIA; and more than they, those of NICOMEDIA and TRAPZONDE, are so great and so thicke, and so full of tall trees fit for the building of ships and gallies of all sorts, as is almost incredible. Neither wanteth he store of shipwrights and other carpenters for the framing of that so great store of timber, large pay drawing euen the Christian skilfull carpenters and workemen into his Arsenals at CONSTANTINOPLE, SINOPE, CALLIPOLIS, and others. For prooofe whereof it is worth the noting, that Selymus the second in our fresh remembrance, the next yeare C after that notable ouerthrow by him receiued at the ECINADES (commonly called the battell of LEPANTO) rigged vp a fleet wherewith Fluzales his Admirall was not afraid to face the whole power of the confederat Christian princes at CERIGO. Neither hath the Turke euer wanted good store of expert seamen, after the manner of those seas: for beside those he hath in store at CALLIPOLIS and SINOPE, out of his gallies which he hath alwaies in readinesse in LESBOS, CHIOS, RHODVS, CYPRVS, and ALEXANDRIA, and from the pyrats which he continually receiue into the ports of TUNIS, BUGIA, TRIPOLIS, and ALGERS, he can and doth from them when need is chuse captaines, mariners and rowers sufficient for the manning and storing of his fleet. What he is able to do in those seas, was well seene in our time, by those fleets which he had at MALTA, CYPRVS, the ECINADES, and GVLETTA. He hath beside of all necessarie and D watlike prouision abundant store, and of great ordinance to furnish himselfe withall both by sea and land an infinit quantitie. Out of HUNGARIE he hath caried away aboute fise thousand great pieces, out of CYPRVS fise hundred, and few lesse from GVLETTA, not to speake what he hath more got from the Christians in diuers other places also. What store he hath of shot and powder, he shewed at MALTA, where he discharged aboute 60000 great shot; at FAMAGUSTA, where he bestowed 118000; and at GVLETTA, where in the space of 39 daies he by the furie of his great ordinance ouerthrew the fortifications which the Christians had been 40 years in building. So that to returne againe vnto our purpose, the great Turke so well provided of men, money, shipping, and great ordinance, and hauing done so great matters at sea as is before rehearsed, is not in reason otherwise to be accounted of than as of a most mightie and puissant prince, as well by sea as land: which to be so, the greatnesse of his Denizi Beglerbeg or great Admirall (commonly called Captan Bassa, of whom we haue not yet spoken) well declareth. This great man hauing charge of all the Grand signior his strength at sea, is alwaies one of the Visier Bassaes, not bound still to follow the Court, as the other Visier Bassaes be, but alwaies or for most part resident at CONSTANTINOPLE or CALLIPOLIS, so to be the neerer vnto his charge. He that now hath this honorable place, is called of the Turkes Cigala Bassa, descended of an honorable familie of that name in GENOVA: who commonly residing at CONSTANTINOPLE or CALLIPOLIS, hath vnder him foure- teene Sanzacks, all of them great commanders and men of great place, namely, the

The great power of the Turke in the Mediterranean and Euxine seas.

From whence he hath his chiefe sea-men.

6 The Denizi Beglerbeg, the Turke great Admirall, so be accounted of the Beglerbegs in Europe.

A briefe Discourse of

The princes as well Mahometanes as Christians, upon whom the great Empire of the Turke consisteth, and of what power they be in comparison of the Turke.

The Persian too weak for the great Turke.

The Portugals too strong for the Turke in the East Indies.

The king of Morocco and the Turke both in doubt of the king of Spaine.

The greatnesse, wealth, and strength of this so mightie an Empire, as well by sea as land, thus in some sort declared: let vs now see vpon what princes it also consisteth, and of what power euery one of them is in comparison of it, so great and ouergrowne a State. The Turkes toward the East border vpon the Persians, according to a right line, drawne by imagination toward TAVRIS to BALSARA: vpon the Portingals at the Persian gulfe, and so there likewise toward the South: at the red sea, vpon the great Aethyopian king Preianes, commonly called Prester Iohn: towards the West, in AFRICK vpon the king of MAROCO: and in EUROPE vpon the kingdome of NAPLES, with some part of the Venetian signorie: towards the North vpon the Polonians, and the territories of the house of AVSTRIA. Now to begin with the Persian, the great Turke no doubt is in field too strong for him, as by prooffe hath bene oftentimes seene: For Mahomet the Great in plaine battell ouercame the valiant Vsun-Cassanes: Selymus the first, and after him Solyman his sonne, put to flight the noble Hyfmaell and Tamas, the two great and famous Persian kings: and now of late in our time Amurath the third by his lieutenants hath taken from the Persians all MEDIA, with the greater ARMENIA, both sometimes famous kingdomes, together with the regall citie of TAVRIS. That the Turke so preuaileth, is by reason of his footmen, which the Persian wanteth; and of his great ordinance, whereof the Persian hath neither store nor vse: and although the Persians by valour of their horsemen hath sometime in open field foiled the Turke, yet haue they still lost some part of their countrey, Solyman taking from them MESOPOTAMIA; and Amurath MEDIA and ARMENIA. Neither did the Persians alone feele that harme, and loose their owne, but vndid their confederats also: Selymus the first spoiling the Mamalukes of EGYPT and SYRIA, and vtrely rooting them from off the face of the earth; and Amurath by his lieutenants hauing brought to a low ebbe the warlike Georgians, both of them the Persian kings friends and confederats. Now is not the Turke so much too strong at land for the Persian, but that hee is as much too weak at sea for the Portugals: in those seas I meane where their forces haue more than once to the Turkes cost met together in the East Indies. The Portugals hauing in those rich but remote countries many sure harbours and ports, yea faire countries and territories abounding with victuals and all prouision necessarie for shipping, with some also of those great Eastern princes their allies and confederats: whereas the Turke on the other side hath nothing in the Persian gulfe strong, beside BALSARA; the sea-coast of ARABIA, which might stand him in best stead, hauing no more but foure townes, and those but weak and of small worth. So that there, as also in the red sea, it is a matter of exceeding charge and difficultie for him to set out any great fleet into those seas: for that those countries are vtrely destitute of wood fit to make ships of. For which cause, those few times that he prepared his fleets in the red sea (to haue cut off the Portugals trade into the East Indies) being not able to performe the same in the Persian gulfe, he was enforced to bring the timber for the building of his gallies out of the ports of BITHYNIA and CILICIA (out of another world as it were) vp the Nile vnto CAIRE, and from thence vpon cammels by land to SVBS, where he hath his Arsenall, a thing almost incredible. And yet hauing done what he could, as oft as he hath made any expedition against them, he neuer gained any thing but losse and dishonour: as in the yeare 1538 at the citie of DIVM; and in the yeare 1552 at the island of ARMVZ; and after that at MOMBASA, where foure of the Turkes gallies with one galliot which by the fauour of the king of MOMBASA had thought to haue staid in those seas, were by the Portugals taken: who still haue an especial regard and care that the Turkes settle not themselves in those seas, but as soone as they perceiue them to prepare any fleet, they forthwith set vpon them, and to that end oftentimes without resistance enter into the red sea. Prester Iohn, of whom although men speake much, yet is he nothing in strength to be compared vnto the Turke, but farre inferior vnto him both for commanders and souldiours, as also for weapons and munition: for that great prince hath a great kingdome without fortification, and a multitude of souldiours without armes: as appeared by the ouerthrow of Barnagasso his lieutenant towards the red sea; who hauing lost all that sea-coast vnto the Turkes, was brought to that extremitie, that to haue peace with them, he yeelded to pay vnto them a yearly tribute of a thousand ounces of gold. In AFRICK the Turke hath more territories than hath the king of MAROCO, otherwise called the Xerife: For he possesseth all that there lieth betwixt the red sea and the kingdome of FES; but the Xerife hath the better part, the richer, stronger, and more vnitied: yet dare neither of them well make war vpon the

the other, for the neerenesse of the king of SPAINNE, enemy vnto them both. Now then there remaineth the rest of the Christian princes bordering vpon the Turke: and first the king of POLONIA. What these two princes can doe the one against the other, hath bene seene in former expeditions, wherein the Polonian had still the worse: Yet it should seeme that of late time the Turke hath not bene greatly desirous to moue the Polonian too farre: For that being prouoked by diuers occasions (namely in the raigne of Henry the third in the warres that John the Vayuod of VALACHIA had with the Turkes, many Polonian horsemen serued the said Vayuod, though not indeed sent from the king: and in the time of Sigismund the third, which now reigneth, the Polonian Cossackes haue with diuers incursions not a little troubled them: beside the late motions of John Zamofski the great Chancelour and Generall of the Polonian forces, for the staying of the Tartars by the Turke sent for; he hath bene content to com-pert the same, and not with his wonted pride sought to be thereof reuenged; as hee hath for farre lesse vpon some other princes. And on the other side the Polonians since the vnfortunate expedition of king Ladislaus, neuer tooke vpon them any warres against the Turkes: neither gaue such aid as they should vnto the Valachians their confederats, but suffered to bee taken from themselves, whatsoever they had towards the Euxine or Blacke sea: a thing imputed rather vnto the want of courage in their kings, than in the nobilitie of that kingdome. Sigismund the first being by Pope Leo the tenth inuited to the warres against the Turkes, answered him in these few words: Set you the Christian princes at vnicie amongst themselves, and I for my part will not be wanting. Sigismund the second so abhorred the warres, that he not onely declined the Turkes, but prouoked by the Muscovites, neuer sought to reuenge the same. King Stephen (by the commendation of Amurath chosen king of POLONIA) an indifferent esteemer both of his enemies forces and his owne, thought it a most dangerous thing to ioine battell with the Turke: and yet in priuat talke with his friends would oftentimes say, That with thirtie thousand foot joyned vnto his Polonian horsemen, he durst well to vndertake an expedition against the Turke: which hee was supposed oftentimes to haue thought vpon. The Emperour with the rest of the princes of the house of AVSTRIA, are by a longer tract of ground joyned vnto this great Empire of the Turkes, than any one other prince of the world, and be-slow in fortifications and the maintenance of their garrisons (wherein they haue continually aboute twentie thousand horse and foot) the greatest part of their reuenues euen in the time of peace, much more in these their long warres: and with the Germane forces joyned vnto their owne, are more carefull how to defend that they yet haue left, than how to recouer that they haue already lost, or to enlarge their Empire. The Emperour Ferdinand with greater force than successe vndertooke the vnfortunate expeditions of BUDA and POSSEGA: which so euill fell out, not for that his forces were not sufficient or strong enough; but for that they wanted agilitie and dexteritie. The truth is, those his armies were strong ynough, and sufficiently furnished with all things necessarie, but consisted for the most part of Germanes and Bohemians, slow and heauie people, vnfit to encounter with the Turkes, a more readie and nimble kind of souldiours. The Venetians also confontier the Turkes by many hundred miles both by sea and land, and defend themselves rather by peaceable policie than by force of armes: notably fortifying their strong holds vpon their frontiers, declining by all meanes the dangers and charges of warre, by embassages and rich presents; leaving nothing vnattempted (their libertie and State preserued) rather than to fall to warres. To say the truth of them, although they had both coynne and warlike prouision sufficient, yet want they men and victu-als answerable to so great a warre against so puissant an enemy. There remaineth onely the king of SPAINNE of all other the great princes either Christians or Mahometanes (bordering vpon him) the best able to deale with him; his yearly reuenues so farre exceeding those of the Turkes, as that they are also probably thought to counteruaile the greatest part of his Timariots: and his great dominions in SPAINNE, PORTINGALL, NAPLES, SICILIA, MILLAINE, SARDINIA, and the Low Countries (if they were with him at vnicie) able to affoord vnto him so great and powerfull a strength both by sea and land, as might make him dreadful euen vnto the Great Turke when he swelleth in his greatest pride: But considering how his forces are distracted for the maintenance of his warres at once in diuers places; as also for the necessarie defence and keeping of his so large and dispersed territories, not all

The Emperour with the rest of the princes of the house of Austria, together with the aid of the Germanes haue much ado to defend themselves against the Turke.

A brieue Discourse of the best of themselves affected to the Spanish government, he is not to be thought of himselfe strong ynough against the vnited forces of the great Turke, whensoever they should chance to be employed vpon him. So that by this we haue already said is easily to be gathered how much the Turke is too strong for any one the neighbour princes, either Mahometanes or Christians, bordering vpon him, and therefore to be of them the more feared. Yet least some mistaking me, might thinke, What is then the Turke inuincible? Farre be that thought from me, to thinke any enemy of Christ Iesu (be his arme neuer so strong) to be able to withstand his power, either quite to deuour his little flocke, rage he neuer so much about it. As for the Turke, the most dangerous and professed enemy of the Christian commonweale, be his strength so great, yea and happily greater too than is before declared (the greatnesse of his dominions and empire considered) yet is he not to be thought therefore either inuincible, or his power indeed so great as it in shew seemeth for to be: his Timariot horsemen (his greatest strength) dispersed ouer his whole Empire, being neuer possibly the one halfe of them by him to be gathered into the bodie of one armie: neither if they so were, possible in such a multitude long to be kept together, liuing vpon no pay of his, but vpon such store and prouision only as they bring with them from their Timari, neuer sufficient long to maintaine them. Besides that, the policie of his state hardly or neuer suffereth him to draw about a third part of his Timariots out of his countreies where they dwell, for feare least the rest of the people by them still kept vnder, should in their absence take vp armes against him in defence of themselves and their auntient libertie: whereafter the greatest part of those poore oppressed soules, as well Mahometanes as Christians in every province of his Empire awaiting but the opportunitie, most desirously longeth: so that more than two parts of them being alwaies to bee left at home for the necessarie defence of the spacious borders of his so large an Empire, as also for the keeping in obedience of so many discontented nations; it is a great matter, if hee euen in his greatest warres draw together of these kind of souldiours the full number of an hundred and fiftie thousand strong, making vp the rest of his huge multitude with his Acanzij, liuing of no pay of his, but vpon the spoile of the enemy onely, the fift part whereof they pay vnto him also. All which put together, what manner of men they be, and of what valour, not onely the small armies of the Christians vnder the leading of their worthie chieftaines Huniades, Scanderbeg, king Matthias, and others, haue to their immortal glorie in former times made good prooffe: but euen in this our age, and that as it were but the other day, the Transylvanian prince with diuers other valiant captaines and commanders yet liuing, haue done the like also: as well witnesse the late battell of AGRIA, wherein the Christians, in number not halfe so many as the Turkes, by plaine valour draue the great Sultan Mahomet himselfe (with Ibrahim Bassa his lieutenant Generall) out of the field, and had of him had the most glorious victorie that euer was got against that enemy, had they not by too much carelesnesse and vntimely desire of spoile, themselves shamefully interrupted the same. But thus to let his horsemen passe, the chiefe strength of his footmen are his Ianizaries, neuer in number exceeding twelue or foureteene thousand, yea seldome times halfe so many euen in his greatest armies, except he himselfe be there in person present in the midst of them: who beside the small number of them, in the time of these their late voluptuous and effeminate emperours corrupted with the pleasures of CONSTANTINOPLE, and for want of their wonted discipline, haue together with their auntient obedience and patience lost also a great part of their former reputation and valour: all the rest of his footmen filling vp the great bodie of his populous armie, being his Asapi, rather pioners than souldiours, men of small worth, and so accounted of both of the Turkes and their enemies also. So that all things well considered, his best souldiours being the least part of his greatest armies, and they also farre vnlike their predecessors, the sterne followers of the former Othoman kings and emperours, but men now giuen to pleasure and delight: it is not otherwise to be thought, but that he bringeth into the field farre more men than good souldiours, more brauerie than true valour, more shew than worth, his multitude being his chiefe strength, his supposed greatnesse the terrour of his neighbour princes, and both together the very majestic of his Empire. Which although it be indeed very strong (for the reasons before alleadged) yet is it by many probably thought to bee now vpon the declining hand, their late emperours in their owne persons farre degenerating from their warlike progenitors, their souldiours generally giuing themselves to vnwonted pleasures, their Auntient discipline of warre neglected, their superstition not with so much zeale as of old regarded, and rebellions in diuers parts of his Empire of late strangely raised, and mightily supported: all the signes of a declining state. Which were they not at all to be feared, as indeed they be very pregnant, yet the greatnesse of this Empire being such as that it labourath with nothing more than the weightinesse of it selfe, it must needs (after the manner of worldly things) of it selfe fall, and againe come to nought, no man knowing when or how so great a worke shall be brought to passe, but he in whose deepe counsels all these great reuolutions of empires and kingdomes are from eternitie shur vp: who at his pleasure shall in due time by such meanes as he seeth best accomplish the same, to the vnspokeable comfort of his poore afflicted flocke, in one place or other still in danger to bee by this roaring lyon deuoured. Which worke of so great wonder, he for his sonne our Saviour Christ his sake, the glorie of his name, and comfort of many thousand oppressed Christians fed with the bread of care-fulnesse amidst the furnace of tribulation, in mercie hasten, that we with them, and they with vs, all as members of one bodie, may continually sing, Vnto him be all honour and praise world without end.
